therein seated (a Citie in beauty and riches, little, at that time, inferiour to Carthage, and farre superiour to Rome it selfe) might become theirs; the safetie of their owne estate spake for these Mamertines: who, if they (driuen to despaire by the Romans) should deliuer vp Messana, with those other holds that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing stand betweene Carthage, and the Lordship of Sicil: for Syracuse it selfe could not, for want of succour, any long time subsist, if once the Carthaginians, that were Masters of the Sea, did fasten vpon that passage from the maine Land. It was further considered; that the opportunity of Messana was such, as would not onely debarre all succours out of the continent, from arriuall in Sicil; but would serue as a bridge, whereby the Carthaginians might haue entrance into Italie, at their owne pleasure.

These considerations, of profit at hand, and of preuenting dangers, that threatned from a-farre, did so preuaile, aboue all regard of honestie, that the Mamertines were admitted into Confederacie with the Romans, and Ap. Claudius the Consull, presently dispatcht away from Messana: into which he entred, and vnder-tooke the protection of it, as is shewed before. The besiegers were little troubled with his arriuall; and lesse moued, with his requiring them to desist from their attempt. For they did farre exceede him in number of men; The whole Iland was ready to relieue them in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Towne. All this Appius himselfe well vnderstood: and against all this he thought the stiffe mettall of his Roman Souldier, a sufficient remedie. Therefore, he resolued to issue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his comming vvas to send them away from the Towne; not to be besieged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficiall to him, that the enemie lay encamped in such sort, as one quarter was not well able to relieue another in distresse. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, wherein to he had wilfully cast his owne mutinous followers, not long before: onely he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his owne quarter, without helpe of others. Against him Ap. Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by vnexpected sallie, to surprize his trenches) arranged his men in order of battaile, wherewith he presented him. The Syracusian wanted not courage to fight; but surely, he wanted good aduice: else would he not haue hazarded all his power against an enemie, of whom he had made no triall; when it had beene easie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his owne Campe. It may be, that he thought to get honor, wherewith to adorn the beginning of his reigne. But he was well beaten, and driuen to saue himselfe within his Trenches: by which losse, he learned a point of wisedome, that stood him and his Kingdom in good stead, all the daies of his life. It was a foolish desire of reuenge, that had made the Syracusians so busie, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamertines.

Had Messana bin taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse it selfe must haue sought helpe from Rome, against those friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had (in respect of those two mightie Cities) but a small stocke, which it behooued him to gouerne well: such another losse would haue made him almost bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake vp his Campe, and retired home: intending to let them stand to their aduentures, that had hope to be gainers by the bargaine. The next day, Claudius perceiuing the Sicilian Armie gone, did with great courage, and with much alacritie of his souldiers, giue charge vpon the Carthaginians: wherein he sped so well, that the enemie forsooke both field and campe, leauing all the Countrie open to the Romans; who hauing spoyled all round, without resistance, intended to lay siege vnto the great Citie of Syracuse.

These prosperous beginnings, howsoeuer they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes, of attaining to greater matters, than at the first they had expected: Yet did they not imprint any forme of terrour in the Citie of Carthage, that had well enough repaired greater losses than this; in which no more was lost, than what had bin prepared against the Mamertines alone, vvithout any suspition of Warre from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it seasonable, to consider of those grounds, whereupon the Romans entred into this warre; not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honesty (for questionlesse the enterprize was much to their benefit, though as much to their shame) but how allowable in strict tearmes of lawfulnesse; whereupon they builte all all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yeeld themselues, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, distressed by the Samnites, had done) I cannot finde: neither can I finde, how the messengers of those folke, whereof one part had already admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any such surrendrie, in the publike name of all.

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawfull surrendrie of themselues and their possessions, were become subiect vnto Rome, by what better title could the Romans assist the Mamertines, against their most ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might haue aided the Campanes, against the Samnites, without the same condition; which was (as they themselues confessed) by none at all. But let it be supposed, that some point seruing to cleare this doubt, is lost in all Histories. Doubtlesse it is, that no company of Pyrates, Theeues, Out-lawes, Murderers, or such other malefactors, can by any good successe of their villanie, obtaine the priuiledge of ciuill societies, to make league or truce, yea or to require faire warre: but are by all meanes, as most pernicious vermine, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take vpon me, to maintaine that opinion of some Ciuilians, that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith with one of these; it were a Position of ill consequence: This I hold; that no one Prince, or State, can giue protection to such as these, as long as any other is vsing the sword of vengeance against them, without becomming accessary to their crimes. Wherefore, we may esteeme this action of the Romans, so farre from being iustifiable, by any pretence of Confederacie made with them; as that contrariwise, by admitting this nest of Murderers and Theeues, into their protection, they iustly deserued to be warred vpon themselues, by the people of Sicil; yea, although Messana had bin taken, and the Mamertines all slaine, ere any newes of the Confederacie had beene brought vnto the besiegers. The great Alexander was so farre perswaded heerein; that he did put to sword all the Branchiade (a people in Sogdiana) and raced their Citie, notwithstanding that they ioyfully entertained him as their Lord and King, because they were descended from a Companie of Milesians, who to gratifie king Inxes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Towne and Countrie, which these of their posteritie enioyed. Neuertheless, in course of humane iustice, long and peaceable possession giues ius acquisitum, a kind of right by prescription, vnto that which was first obtained by wicked meanes: and doth free the descendants, from the crime of their Ancestors, whose villanies they doe not exercise. But that the same generation of Theeues, which by a detestable fact hath purchased a rich Towne, should be acknowledged a lawfull companie of Citizens, there is no shew of right. For euen the Conquerour, that by open warre obtaineth a Kingdome, doth not confirme his title, by those victories which gaue him first possession: but length of time is requisite, to establish him, vnlesse by some alliance with the ancient inheritors, he can better the violence of his claime; as did our King Henrie the first, by his marriage with Maude, that was daughter of Malcolme, King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Neece of Edmund Ironside. Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had so good) of iustice, in this quarrell, than had the Gothes, Hunnes, Vandalls, and other Nations, of the warres that they made vpon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her selfe, in the time of her visitation, was burnt to the ground.

Of the Iland of Sicil.

†. I.
The qualitie of the Iland: and the first inhabitants thereof.

THe defence of the Mamertines, or the possession of Messana, being now no longer, since the first victories of Appius Claudius, the obiects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Scicil being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage, are about to contend: it will be agreeable vnto the order, which in the like cases wee haue obserued, to make a briefe collection, of things, concerning that noble Iland, which hath beene the stage of many great acts, performed, as well before and after, as in this present Warre.

That

That Sicil was sometimes a Peninsula, or Demie-Isle, adioyned to Italie, as a part of Brutium in Calabria, neere vnto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempest seuered from the same: it is a generall opinion of all antiquitie. But at what certaine time this diuision happened, there is no memoriall remaining in any ancient writer. Strabo, Plin. l. 2. c. 91. Pliny, Sil. l. 5. and Dionysius, affirme, that it was caused by an earthquake; Silius and Cassiodorus, doe thinke it to haue beene done by the rage and violence of the tide, and surges of the Sea. Either of these opinions may be true; for so was Eubœa seuered from Bœotia; Atalante and Macris, from Eubœa; Sillie here in England, from the Cape of Cornwall; and Britaine it selfe (as may seeme by Verstegans arguments) from the opposite continent of Gaule. But for Sicil, they which lend their eares to fables, doe attribute the cause of it to Neptune (as Eustathius witnesseth) who with his three-forked Mace, in fauour of Iucasta, the sonne of Æolus, diuided it from the maine land, and so made it an Iland, which before was but a Demie-Isle; that by that meanes, he might the more safely inhabite, and possesse the same. Diodorus Siculus, moued by the authoritie of Hesiodus, ascribeth the labour of sundring it from Italie, to Orion: who, that he might be compared to Hercules (cutting through the rocks and mountains) first opened the Sicilian streights, as Hercules did those of Gibralter. Orion. l. 4. c. 14. Diod. l. 6. Ouid de Fast. 4.

They which value the Ilands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantitie and content, doe make this the greatest, as Eustathius and Strabo, who affirme this, not onely to excell the rest for bignesse, but also for goodnesse of soyle. As concerning the forme of this Iland, Pomponius Mela saith, it is like that Capitall letter of the Greeke, which they call Delta, namely, that it hath the figure of a triangle; which is generally knowne to be true. That the whole Iland was consecrated to Ceres and Proserpina, all old writers with one consent affirme. To Ceres it was dedicated, because it first taught the rules of setting and sowing of Corne: to Proserpina, not so much, for that she was from hence violently taken by Pluto, as because (which Plutarch and Diodorus do report for truth) that Pluto, as soone as she, vncouering her selfe, first shewed her selfe to be seene of him, gaue her the Dominion thereof.

Of the fertilitie and riches of this Countrie, there is a famous testimonie written by Cicero, in his second Oration against Verres, where he saith, that Marcus Cato did call it the Granarie, and Store-house of the Common-wealth, and the Nurse of the vulgar sort. The same Cicero doth adde in that place; that it was not onely the store-house of the people of Rome: but also that it was a well-furnished treasurie. For without any cost or charge of ours (saith he) it hath vsually cloathed, maintained, and furnished, our greatest Armies, with leather, apparell, and corne. Strabo reporteth almost the same thing of it. Whatsoeuer Sicilie doth yeeld (saith Solinus) whether by the Sunne, and temperature of the aire, or by the industrie and labour of man, it is accounted next vnto those things that are of best estimation: were it not that such things, as the earth first putteth forth, are extreamely ouer-growne with saffron. Diodorus Siculus saith, that in the fields neere vnto Leontium, and in diuers other places of this Iland, wheat doth grow of it selfe without any labour, or looking to of the husbandman. Martianus sheweth, that there were in it sixe Colonies, and sixtie Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the names are found scatteringly in many good Authors. Strabo. l. 6.

Now besides many famous acts, done by the people of this Iland, as well in peace as warre; there be many other things, which haue made it very renowned, as the birth of Ceres; the rauishing of Proserpina; the Giant Enceladus; the mount Ætna, Scylla, & Charybdis, with other antiquities, and rarities; besides those learned men, the noble Mathematician Archimedes, the famous Geometrician Euclides, the painfull Historian Diodorus; and Empedocles the deepe Philosopher.

That Sicil was at first possessed and inhabited by Giants Lestriogones, and Cyclopes, barbarous people, and vnciuill; all histories and fables doe ioyntly with one consent auerre. Yet Thucydides saith, that these sauage people dwelt onely in one part of the Iland. Afterward the Sicani, a people of Spaine, possessed it. That these Sicani were not bredde in the Isle (although some so thinke,) Thucydides and Diodorus doe very constantly auouch.

Of these it was named Sicania. These Sicani were inuaded by the Siculi; who, inhabiting that part of Latium, whereon Rome was afterward built, were driuen by the Pelasgi from their owne seates, and finding no place vpon the Continent, which they were able to master maſter and inhabite, paſſed ouer into this Iland, three hundred yeeres before the Greeks ſent any Colonies thither: and (ſaith Philiſtus) eighty yeers before the fall of Troy. Theſe Siculi gaue the name of Sicilia, to the Iland; and making warre vpon the Sicani, draue them from the Eaſt and Northerne part thereof, into the Weſt and South. At their landing, they firſt built the Citie Zancle, afterward called Meſſena; and after that, Catana, Leontium, and Syracuſe it ſelfe, beating from thence the Ætolians, who long before had ſet vp a Towne in that place. As for the name of Syracuſe, it was not knowne, till ſuch time as Archias of Corinth (long after) wonne that part of the Iland from the Siculi. Neither did the Siculi at their firſt arriuall diſpoſſeſſe the Ætolians thereof, but ſome hundred yeeres after their deſcent, and after ſuch time as they had founded the Cities before named, with Nex, Hybla, Trynacia, and diuers others.

After theſe Siculi came another nation out of Italy, called Morgetes, who were thence driuen by the Oenotrians. Theſe ſate downe in that part of Sicil, where they afterward raiſed the Cities of Morgentum, and Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were diuided, and by a ciuill war greatly infeebled. Among theſe ancient ſtories, we finde the laſt voiage and the death of Minos, King of Creet. Thucydides, an Hiſtorian of vnqueſtionable ſincerity, reports of Minos, that he made conqueſt of many Ilands: and ſome ſuch buſineſſe, perhaps drew him into Sicil. But the common report is, that he came thither in purſuit of Dædalus. The tale goes thus: Dædalus fleeing the reuenge of Minos, came into Sicil to Cocalus, king of the Sicani, & during his abode there, he built a place of great ſtrength, neere vnto Megara, for Cocalus, to lay vp his treaſure in; together with many notable works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the reſt, he caſt a Ramme in gold, that was ſet vp in the Temple of Venus Erycina, which hee did with ſo great Art, as thoſe that beheld it, thought it rather to bee liuing, than counterfeit.

Now Minos, hearing that Cocalus had entertained Dædalus, prepares to inuade the Territorie of Cocalus; but when he was arriued, Cocalus doubting his owne ſtrength, promiſeth to deliuer Dædalus. This he performes not, but in the meane while, kils Minos by treaſon, and perſwades the Cretans, Minos his followers, to inhabite a part of Sicil; the better (as it ſeems) to ſtrengthen himſelfe againſt the Siculi. Hereunto the Cretans (their King being dead) gaue their conſent, and builded for themſelues the Citie of Minoa, after the name of their King Minos. After, they likewiſe built the Towne of Engium, now called Gange: and theſe were the firſt Cities, built by the Greekes in Sicil, about two ages before the warre of Troy; for the grand-children of Minos ſerued with the Greeks at the ſiege thereof.

But after ſuch time as the Cretans vnderſtood, that their King had by treaſon beene made away; they gathered together a great Armie, to inuade Cocalus: and landing neere vnto Camicus, they beſieged the ſame fiue yeeres, but in vaine. In the end (being forced to returne, without any reuenge taken) they were wrackt on the coaſt of Italie; and hauing no meanes to repaire their ſhips, nor the honour they had loſt, they made good the place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, betweene the two famous Ports of Brunduſium & Tarentum. Of theſe Cretans came thoſe Nations, afterward called Iapyges and Meſſapii.

After the taking of Troy, Ægeſtus and Elymus, brought with them certaine troops into Sicil, and ſeated themſelues among the Sicani; where they built the Cities of Ægeſta and Elyma.

It is ſaid, that Æneas viſited theſe places in his paſſage into Italie: and that ſome of the Troianes, his followers, were left behinde him, in theſe Townes of Sicil: whereof there want not good Authors, that make Æneas himſelfe the founder.

About the ſame time, the Phœnicians ſeized vpon the Promontories of Pachinus, & Lilybæum, & vpon certaine ſmall Iſles adioyning to the maine Iland: which they fortified, to ſecure the trades that they had with the Sicilians; likeas the Portugals haue done in the Eaſt India, at Goa, Ormus, Moſambiq, and other places. But the Phœnicians ſtaied not there; for after they had once aſſured their deſcents, they built the goodly Citie of Panormus, now called Palerma.

Thus we finde, more the Nations that inhabited the Iſle of Sicil, before the warre of Troy, had ere the Greekes in any numbers began to ſtraggle in thoſe parts.

This may perchance ſeeme ſtrange to the Reader, that in all ancient ſtorie, he findes one and the same beginning of Nations, after the flood; and that the first planters of all parts of the World, were said to be mighty and Giant-like men; and that, as Phœnicia, Ægypt, Lybia, and Greece, had Hercules, Oreſtes, Antæus, Typhon; and the like; as Denmarke had Starcharterus, remembred by Saxo Grammaticus; as Scythia, Britanie, and other Regions, had Giants for their first Inhabitants; so this Isle of Sicil had her Leſtrigones and Cyclopes. This diſcourſe I could alſo reiect for fained and fabulous; did not Moſes make vs know, that the Zamzummims, Emims, Anakims, and Og of Basan, with others, which sometime inhabited the Mountaines and Deſarts of Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding ſtrength and ſtature, and of the races of Giants: and were it not, that Tertullian, S. Auguſtine, Nicephorus, Procopius, Iſidore, Plinie, Diodore, Herodotus, Solinus, Plutarch, and many other Authors, haue confirmed the opinion. Yea, Veſputius, in his ſecond Nauigation into America, hath reported, that himſelfe hath ſeene the like men in those parts. Againe, whereas the ſelfe-ſame is written of all Nations, that is written of any one; as touching their ſimplicitie of life, their meane fare, their feeding on acorns and rootes, their poore cottages, the couering of their bodies with the skins of beaſts, their hunting, their armes and weapons, and their warfare, their first paſſages ouer great Riuers & armes of the Sea, vpon rafts of trees tied together; and afterward, their making boats, first, of twigs and leather, then of wood; first, with Oares, & then with Saile; that they eſteemed as gods, the first finders out of Arts; as of Husbandrie, of Lawes, and of Policie: it is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they all liued in the ſame newneſſe of time, which we call Old time, and had all the ſame want of his inſtruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankinde. For other teaching had they none, that were remooued farre off from the Hebrewes, (who inherited the knowledge of the first Patriarchs.) than that from variable effects they beganne, by time and degrees, to finde out the cauſes: from whence came Philoſophie Naturall; as the Morall did from diſorder and confuſion; and the Law from cruelties and oppreſſion.

But it is certaine, that the Age of Time hath brought forth ſtranger and more incredible things, than the Infancie. For wee haue now greater Giants, for vice and iniuſtice, than the World had in thoſe daies, for bodily ſtrength; for cottages, and houſes of clay and timber, we haue raiſed Palaces of ſtone; we carue them, we paint them, and adorne them with gold; inſomuch as men are rather knowne by their houſes, than their houſes by them; we are fallen from two diſhes, to two hundred; from water, to wine and drunkenneſſe; from the couering of our bodies with the skinnes of beaſts, not onely to ſilke and gold, but to the very skinnes of men. But to conclude this digreſſion, Time will alſo take reuenge of the exceſſe, which it hath brought forth; Quam longa dies peperit, longior, auxit, longiſſima ſubruet; Long time brought forth, longer time increaſed it, and time, longer than the reſt, ſhall ouerthrow it.

* Syracuſe, as Cicero relateſs, was the greateſt, and moſt goodly Citie of all that the Greeks poſſeſt. For the ſituation is both ſtrong, and of an excellent proſpect from euery entrance, by Land, or Sea. The Port was (for the moſt part) enuironed with beautiful buildings: and that part which was without the City, was on both ſides bank'd vp, and ſuſtained with beautiful walls of Marble. The Citie it ſelfe was one of the greateſt of the World: for it had in compaſſe (as Strabo reporteth) without the treble wall thereof, 180. furlongs, which make of our miles about 18. It was compounded of foure Cities, (Strabo ſaith, of fiue) to wit, Inſula, Acradina, Tyche, and Neapolis: of which greatneſſe, the ruines & foundations of the walls doe yet witneſſe.

§. II.

The plantation of the Greekes in Sicill.

WHen the first inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicil: it happened, that one Theocles, a Greeke, being driuen vpon that coaſt by an Eaſterly wind; and finding true the commendations thereof, which had beene thought fabulous, being deliuered onely by Poets; gaue information to the Athenians of this his diſcouerie, & propoſed vnto them the benefit of this eaſie conqueſt, offering to become their guide. But Theocles was as little regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the Engliſh. Wherfore he took the ſame courſe that Columbus afterwards did. He ouer-laboured not himſelfe in perſwading the Noble Athenians (who thought themſelues to be well enough already) to their owne profit; but went to the Chalcidians, that were needie and induſtrious, by whom his proiect was gladly entertained. By theſe was built the Citie of Naxus, and a Colony planted of Eubœans.

But the reſt of the Greekes were wiſer than our weſterne Princes of Europe: for they had no Pope, that ſhould forbid them, to occupie the voide places of the World. Archias of Corinth followed the Eubœans, & landed in Sicil, neere vnto that Citie, called afterward * Syracuſe, of which, that part onely was then compaſſed with a wall, which the Ætolians called Homothermon; the Greeks, Naſos; the Latines, Inſula. He with his Corinthians hauing ouercome the Siculi, draue them vp into the Country; and after a few yeares, their multitudes increaſing, they added vnto the City of the Iland, that of Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis. So as well by the commodity of the double Port, capable of as many ſhips, as any Hauen of that part of Europe, as by the fertility of the ſoyle, Syracuſe grew vp in great haſte, to be one of the goodlieſt Towns of the world. In ſhort time the Greeks did poſſeſſe the better part of all the Sea-coaſt; forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themſelues into the faſt and mountainous parts of the Iland, making their Royall reſidence in Trinacia.

Ætolians

After ſuch time as the Dores of Peloponneſus had driuen out the Sicilians, this goodly city for a long time became the ſeat of Tyrants. The firſt whereof was Gelo: The ſecond, Hiero the elder: the third Thraſybulus: the fourth and fift, Dionyſius the elder, and younger: the ſixt Dion: the ſeuenth Agathocles: the eighth Pyrrhus: the ninth, Hiero the younger: the tenth and laſt, Hieronymus: who being ſlaine at Leontium, at length the Romans conquered it vnder the conduct of Marcellus.

Some ſeuen yeares after the arriuall of Archias; the Chalcidians, encouraged by the ſucceſſe of the Corinthians, did aſſaile, and obtaine the city of Leontium, built and poſſeſt by the Siculi. In briefe, the Greeks win from the Siculi, and their Aſſociates, the cities of Catana and Hybla, which, in honour of the Megarians that forc't it, they called Megara.

About 45. yeares after Archias had taken Syracuſe; Antiphemus and Entimus, the one from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Army into Sicil, and built Gela; whoſe Citizens, one hundred and eight yeares after, did erect that magnificent and renowned city of Agrigentum, gouerned according to the Lawes of the Dorians.

The Syracuſians alſo, in the ſeuentieth year after their plantation, did ſet vp the city of Acra, in the Mountaines; and in the ninetieth year Caſmena, in the Plaines adioyning; and againe in the hundred and thirtieth yeare of their dwelling in Syracuſe, they built Camerina; & ſoon after that, Enna, in the very Center of the Iland. So did the Cumani about the ſame time, recouer from the Siculi the city of Zancle, which they had founded in the ſtreight between Sicil and Italy. They of Zancle had beene the founders of Himera.

Not long after this, Dorieus the Lacedæmonian built Heraclia; which the Phœnicians, and Carthaginians, fearing the Neighbourhood of the Spartans, ſoon after inuaded and ruined, though the ſame were againe ere long re-edified.

Selinus alſo was built by a Colony of Megara: and Zancle was taken by the Meſſenians; who hauing loſt their owne Country, gaue the name thereof vnto this their new purchaſe. Such were the beginnings of the greateſt cities in this Iland.

†. III.

Of the gouernment and affaires of Sicil, before Dionyſius his Tyranny.

THe moſt part of the cities in Sicil, were gouerned by the rule of the people, till ſuch time as Phalaris began to vſurpe the ſtate of Agrigentum, and to exerciſe all maner of tyranny therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a deteſtable Engine, gaue an hollow Bull of braſſe, wherein to incloſe men, and ſcortch them to death: praiſing the deuiſe with this commendation; That the noiſe of one tormented therein, ſhould bee like vnto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gaue a due reward to the Inuentour; by cauſing the firſt triall to be made vpon himſelfe. He reigned one and thirty yeares, ſaith Euſebius; others giue him but ſixteene: Howſoeuer it were, one Telemachus in the end, fell vpon him with the whole multitude of Agrigentum, and ſtoned him to death; being thereto animated by Zeno, euen whileſt the Tyrant was tormenting the ſame Zeno, to make him confeſſe ſome matter of conſpiracy.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recouered their liberty, and enioyed it long, till Thero vſurped the gouernment of the Common-weale: at which time alſo Panatius made himſelfe Lord of Leontium; & Cleander, of Gela: but Cleander, hauing ruled 7. yeares, was ſlaine by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his brother Hyppocrates ſucceeded in his roome, & greatly afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle, or Meſſena, and of Leontium; whom with diuers others of the ancient inhabitants, he forced to acknowledge him their Lord. He alſo made warre with the Syracuſians, and, in the end, got from them by compoſition, the City of Camerina. But when hee had reigned ſeuen yeares, he was ſlaine in a battell againſt the Siculi, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracuſians change their forme of gouernment, from Popular to Ariſtocratical; a preparation towards a Principality, wherinto it was ſoon after changed.

After the death of Hippocrates, Gelon (descended from the Rhodians, which together with the Cretans had long before, among other of the Greeks, seated themselues in Sicil) that had commanded the forces of Hippocrates, in the former warre, with notable successe, became Lord of Gela. He, after his Masters death, breaking the trust committed vnto him by Hippocrates ouer his children, and being in possession of Gela, tooke the occasion and aduantage of a contention in Syracuse, betweene the Magistrates and the People. For comming with a strong Armie to the succour of the Gouernours, driuen out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the first; and (indeed) the most famous, that Paus. l. 6. euer gouerned the Syracusians. This change happened in the second yeere of the three-score and twelfth Olympiad; wherin the better to establish himselfe, he took to wife the Daughter of Thero, who had also vsurped the state of Agrigentum.

Now this Gelon, the sonne of Dinomenes, had three brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and Thrasybulus: to the first of which he gaue vp the Citie of Gela, when hee had obtained the Principalitie of Syracuse. For, after that time, all his thoughts trauelled in the strengthening, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracuse. He defaced Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracusians who built it, and brought the Citizens to Syracuse. The Megarians that had moued a warre against him, he ouercame; the richer sort he brought vnto Syracuse; and the people he sold for slaues. In like manner dealt hee with other places vpon the like occasion. Not long after this, Thero, a Prince of the Agrigentines, hauing dispossest Terillus, of his Citie Himera; the Carthaginians were drawne into the quarrell by Anaxilus, Lord of Messena, Father-in-law to Terillus: and Gelon was also solicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after diuers conflicts, the Carthaginians, and other Africans, led by Amilcar, Herod. & Dio. were ouerthrowne by Gelon: and an hundred and fiftie thousand of them left their bodies in Sicil.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedæmonians sent for succour, when Xerxes with his huge Armie past the Hellespont. He, for their reliefe hauing armed thirty thousand Souldiers, and two hundred ships, refused neuertheless to send them into Greece, because they refused him the commandement of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or Land. So hee vsed to their Embassadors onely this saying, That their Spring was withered; accounting the Armie, by him prepared, to be the very flower of the Greeke Nation.

The Carthaginians, after this great losse receiued, fearing the inuasion of their owne Countrie, sent to Gelon by their Embassadours, to desire peace; who grants it them on these conditions; That from thenceforth they should not sacrifice their children to Saturne; That they should pay him 2000. talents of siluer, and present him with two armed ships, in signe of amitie. These conditions the Carthaginians, not onely willingly accepted, but with the two thousand talents, and the ships for warre, they sent vnto Demarata, Gelons wife, a crowne, valued at an hundred talents of gold, with other presents. Whereby we see, that some Nations, and some Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The warres ended; and Sicil in peace, Gelon beautified the Temples of the gods, and erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloued and honoured of his Subiects, he left the World, and left for his Successor his brother Hiero. Philistus and Plinie report, That, when his body was burnt, according to the custome of that Age, a Dogge of his, which alwaies waited on him, ranne into the fire, and suffered himselfe to be burnt with him.

To Gelon, Hiero his brother succeeded, a man rude, cruell, couetous, and so suspicious of his brethren Polyzelus, and Thrasybulus, as hee sought by all meanes to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this; by the conuersation which he had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the studie of good Arts. Diuers quarrels he had, as well with Theron of Agrigentum, as with other Cities: all which he shortly after compounded, and gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to inuade Sicil, fearing the succours which Gelon had prepared, to aide the Grecians, against him. Hee also ouerthrew in battaile Thrasydæus, the sonne of Theron, and thereby restored the Agrigentines, to their former libertie. But in the end, hee lost the loue of the Syracusians; and after he had reigned 11. yeeres, he left the kingdome to his brother Thrasybulus, who became a most vniust & bloudy Tyrant. Thrasybulus inioyed his Principalitie no longer than ten moneths. For, notwithstanding the force force of mercenary Souldiers, which he entertained for his guards, hee was beaten out of Syracuſe by the Citizens, to whom being beſieged in Acradina, he reſtored the gouernement, and was baniſhed the Iland. From whence he ſailed into Greece, where he died a priuate man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracuſians recouered againe their former liberty, as all the reſt of the Cities did, after which they had neuer ſought, had the Succeſſors of Gelon inherited his vertue, as they did the Principality of Syracuſe. For in all changes of Eſtates, the preſeruation ought to anſwer the acquiſition. Where a liberall, valiant, and aduiſed Prince, hath obtained any new Signiory, and added it to that of his owne, or exalted himſelfe from being a priuate man, to the dignity of a Prince; it behooueth the Succeſſour to maintaine it by the ſame way and art by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuſe (though not without blowes, ere that ſhee could cleanſe her ſelfe of the creatures and louers of Gelon) was now againe become Miſtreſſe of her ſelfe, and held her ſelfe free, well neere threeſcore yeares, to the time of Dionyſius; though ſhe were in the meane while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her owne, called Tindarion.

Now, to preuent the greatneſſe of any one among them, for the future, they deuiſed a kinde of baniſhment of ſuch among them, as were ſuſpected; taking patterne from the Athenian Oſtraciſme. They called this their new deuiſed iudgement of exile, Petaliſmus, wherein euery one wrote vpon an Oliue leafe (as at Athens they wrote vpon ſhells) the name of him, whom hee would haue expelled the City. Hee that had moſt ſuffrages againſt him, was baniſhed for fiue yeares. Hereby in a ſhort time, it came to paſſe that thoſe of iudgement, and beſt able to gouerne the Common-weale, were by the worſt able either ſuppreſt, or thruſt out of the City. Yea, ſuch as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themſelues as ſecretly as they could; ſeeking ſome place of more ſecurity, wherein to maintaine themſelues. And good reaſon they had ſo to doe, ſeeing that there is nothing ſo terrible in any State, as a powerfull and authorized ignorance. But this Law laſted not very long. For their neceſſity taught them to aboliſh it, and reſtore againe the wiſer ſort vnto the Gouernement; from which, the Nobility hauing practiſed to baniſh one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being inuaded by Ducetius, king of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Iland (who had already taken Enna, and ſome other of the Grecian Cities, and ouerthrowne the Army of the Agregentines) the Syracuſians ſent forces againſt him, commanded by an vnworthy Citizen of theirs, called Bolcon. This their Captaine made nothing ſo much haſte to finde out Ducetius, againſt whom he was imployed, as he did to flee from the Army he led, as ſoone as Ducetius preſented him battell. So for want of conduct, the greateſt number of the Syracuſians periſhed.

But making better choice among thoſe whom they had baniſhed, they leuie other troupes: by whom, in concluſion, Ducetius being beaten, ſubmitteth himſelfe, and is conſtrained to leaue the Iland for a time. Yet it was not long ere he returned againe, and built the City Collatina on the Sea-ſide.

Ducetius being dead; all the Greek Cities did in a ſort acknowledge Syracuſe: Trinacia excepted, which alſo by force of armes, in the foureſcore and fift Olympiad, they brought to reaſon.

But they doe not long enioy this their Superintendencie. For the Citizens of Leontium, being oppreſt by them, ſeek aide from the Athenians, about the ſixt yeare of the Peloponneſian Warre. In this ſuite they preuailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator, and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to ſuccour them, vnder the leading of Laches and Charœdes. To this fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one hundred more, with which forces, and with ſome ſupplies brought by Sophocles, Pythodorus, Eurymedon and other Athenian Captains, they inuaded the Territories of the Syracuſians, and their Partiſans, wanne and loſt diuers places, tooke Meſſana, and in the ſeuenth yeare of the Peloponneſian Warre, loſt it againe. They alſo at the ſame time, attempted Himera, but in vaine. The fire of this quarrell tooke hold vpon many Cities, which did inuade each others Territory with great violence. But when they had wearied themſelues on all hands, & yet could ſee none iſſue of the warre, the Leontines, without the aduice of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracuſians, and were admitted into their ſociety, with equall freedome. So the Athenians, who hoped to haue greatned themſelues in Sicil, by the diuiſion and ciuill warre, were diſappointed of their expectation, by the good agreement of the Sicilians, and faine to be gone with the broken remainder of their fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the cuſtome of popular Eſtates) by taking reuenge vpon their owne Commanders. So they banniſhed Pythodorus, and Sophocles, and laid an heauie fine vpon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the moſt memorable war, that euer was made by the Greeks in Sicil: which was that of the Athenians, againſt the Selinuntines & Syracuſians, in fauour of the cities of Egeſta, Leontium, & Catana. They of Selinus had oppreſt the Egeſtans; & they of Syracuſe the Leontines, & the Catanians: which was the ground of the war. For, the Athenians vndertooke the protection of their old friends: and, in hatred of the Athenians, aide from Lacedæmon was ſent to the Syracuſians. The Lacedæmonians dealt plainly, hauing none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to help a people of their owne Tribe, that craued their ſuccour, being in diſtreſſe. The Athenians ſcarce knew what to pretend: for their preparations were ſo great, as diſcouered their intent to be none other, than the conqueſt of the whole Iland. Yet they which had called them in, were ſo blinded with their owne paſſions, that they would not beleeue their owne eies, which preſented vnto them a Fleet, and Army, far greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this expedition, the city of Athens had engaged all her power; as regarding, not onely the greatneſſe of the enterpriſe, but the neceſſity of finiſhing it in a ſhort ſpace of time. For the Lacedæmonians (as hath already been ſhewed in due place) ſtood at that time in ſuch broken terms of peace with Athens, as differed not much from open war. Wherefore it was thought neceſſary, either to ſpare coſt in this great expedition, or altogether to forbeare it; which was likely to be hindred by warres at home, if their proceedings were ſlacke abroad. And ſurely, had not the deſire of the Athenians bin ouer paſſionate, the arguments of Nicias had cauſed them to abſtaine from ſo chargeable a buſineſſe, and to reſerue their forces for a more needfull vſe. But young counſailes preuailed againſt the authority of ancient men, that were more regardfull of ſafety than of honour.

Of this buſineſſe, mention hath beene already made, in that which wee haue written of the Peloponneſian war. But what was there deliuered in generall termes, as not concerning the affairs of Greece, otherwiſe than by conſequence, doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherin the whole State of Sicil was like to haue felt a great conuerſion.

Though Alcibiades had preuailed againſt Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voyage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades, and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chiefe Commanders therein.

Theſe had commiſſion & direction, as well to ſuccour the Segeſtans, & to re-eſtabliſh the Leontines, caſt out of their places by the Syracuſians; as alſo by force of armes, to ſubiect the Syracuſians, and all their adherents in Sicill, and compell them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their ſupreme Lords. To effect which, the fore-named Captaines were ſent off, with an hundred and thirty Gallies, and fiue thouſand one hundred Souldiers, beſides the thirty ſhips of burden, which tranſported their victuals, engines, and other munitions for the war: and theſe were Athenians, Mantineans, Rhodians, and Candians: there were, beſides theſe, ſixe thouſand Megarians light-armed, with thirty horſe-men. Thucid. l.6. c.9.

With theſe troups & fleets they arriue at Rhegium, where the Rhegians refuſe to giue them entry; but ſell them victuals for their money. From thence they ſent to the Egeſtans, to know what treaſure they would contribute towards the warre, ſeeing for their ſakes they had entred thereinto. But they found by their anſwers, that theſe Egeſtans were poore, and that they had abuſed the Athenian Embaſſadours with falſe ſhewes of gold, hauing in all but 30. talents. The Athenians further were diſcouraged, when they found that the Rhegians, their ancient friends, and allied vnto the Leontines, refuſed to truſt them within their Walls. Hereupon Nicias aduiſeth to depart towards the Selinuntines, and to force them, or perſwade them to an agreement with the Egeſtans; as likewiſe to ſee what diſburſements the Egeſtans could make, and ſo returne againe into Greece, and not to waite Athens in a needleſſe war. Alcibiades, on the other ſide, would follicite the cities of Sicil to confederacy against the Syracusians & Selinuntines, where-by to force them vnto restitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus perswades them to assaile Syracuse it self, before it were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of diuers Cities) they surprize Catana: & there they take new aduise, how to proceede. Thence they imploied Nicias to those of Egesta, who receiued from them thirty talents towards his charges, & one hundred and twentie talents more there were of the spoiles they had gotten in the Iland. Thus, the Summer being spent in idle consultations, & vain attempts, the Athenians prepare to assaile Syracuse. But Alcibiades hauing been accused at home, in his absence, was sent for back by the Athenians, to make his answer: and the Army was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtaine a landing place very neere vnto Syracuse, by this deuice.

They imploy to Syracuse an inhabitant of Catana, whom they trust, & instruct him, to protnise vnto the Syracusians, that he would deliuer into their hands all the Athenians within Catana. Hereupon the Syracusians draw thitherward with their best forces. But in the mean while, the Athenians, setting saile from Catana, arriue at Syracuse, where they land at faire ease, & fortifie themselues against the Towne. Shortly after this, they fight, & the Syracusians had the losse: but the Athenians, wanting horse, could not pursue their victory to any great effect. They then retire themselues, with a resolution to winter their Army at Catana, for the winter-season. From thence they made an attempt vpon Messana, hoping to haue taken it by an intelligence, but in vain. For Alcibiades had discouered such as were Traitors within the City to the Messenians. This he now did, in despight of his own Citizens, the Athenians, because they had recalled him from his command, with a purpose either to haue put him to death, or to haue banished him: whereof being aduised by his friends, he tooke his way towards the Lacedæmonians, & to them hee gaue mischieuous counsaile against his country. While this Winter yet lasted, the Syracusians send Embassadors to Lacedæmon, and Corinth, for aide: as likewise the Athenian Captaines in Sicil, send to Athens, for supplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth yeare of the Peloponnesian war) the Athenians in Sicil, saile from the Port of Catana, to Megara, for sake of the Inhabitants; from whence forraging the Country, they obtaine some small victories ouer the straggling Syracusians: & at their returne to Catana, they receiue a supply of two hundred men at armes, but without horse, which they hoped to furnish in the Iland, from the Segestans, and other their adherents; they were also strengthened with a company of Archers, and with three hundred talents in mony.

Hereupon they take courage, and incamp neere Syracuse, vpon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracusians, that sallied to impeach their intrenchments. They also receiued from their Confederates foure hundred horse-men, with two hundred other horse, to mount their men at arms. Syracuse was now in effect blockt vp, so as hardly any succours could enter, but such as were able to force their passage: yet the Athenians receiue diuers losses; among which it was not the least, that Lamachus, one of their best Commanders, was slaine.

In the mean while, Gylippus, & Pythen, with the Lacedæmonian and Corinthian forces arriue, and take land at Hymera. The Citizens of Hymera, and of Gela, together with the Selinuntines, ioyne with them; so that with these and his own troupes, Gylippus aduanced to march ouer land toward Syracuse. The Syracusians send a part of their forces to meet him, & conduct him. The Athenians prepare to encounter them, expecting his approach neere vnto the City, vpon a place of aduantage. At the first encounter they had the better of their enemies, by reason that the Syracusian horse-men could not come to fight in those streights; but soone after, Gylippus charging them againe, brake them, and constrained Nicias to fortifie himselfe within his Campe. Whereupon Nicias made the state of his affaires known vnto, by his letters to the Athenians; shewing that, without great supplies by Sea & Land, the enterprise would be lost, together with the whole Army remaining. These letters receiued, the Athenians appoint two other Generals, Eurymedon and Demosthenes, to ioyne with Nicias: the one they dispatch presently with some supply, the other they send after him in the Spring following.

In the mean while, Gylippus at Syracuse, fights with the Athenians both by Sea and Land, Land, ſometimes with ill, and at other times with good ſucceſſe: but in concluſion, he took from their Fort, neere vnto Syracuſe, at the Promontory, called Plemmyrium; wherein the Athenians loſt their treaſure, and a great part of all their prouiſions. Notwithſtanding which loſſe, & that the Athenians themſelues, in Greece, were (in effect) beſieged within Athens, by the Lacedæmonians; yet were they moſt obſtinate in proſecuting the Warre in Sicil, & diſpatched away Demoſthenes with new ſuccours. Demoſthenes, in his way towards Sicil, encountred with Polyanthes the Corinthian, with his fleet: both the Captaines being bound for Sicil, the one to ſuccour Nicias, the other Gylippus. The loſſe betweene them was in effect equall; and neither ſo broken, but that each of them proſecuted the enterpriſe they had in hand. But before the ſuccours arriued to either, Gylippus and Ariſtus had aſſailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracuſe, and in a Sea-fight put them to the worſt, to the great diſcouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demoſthenes arriued with threeſcore and thirteen Gallies, charged with fourmen; and (blaming the ſloath of Nicias) he inuaded the Syracuſians, the ſame day that he arriued. But he made more haſte than he had good ſpeed, being ſhamefully beaten, and repulſed with great loſſe. Hereupon Demoſthenes and Eurymedon, determine to riſe vp from before Syracuſe, and returne to the ſuccour of Athens: but Nicias diſputed to the contrary, pretending that he had good intelligence within Syracuſe, whereby he learned, that the Towne could not long hold out.

Whatſoeuer Nicias his intelligence was; vpon the arriuall of a new ſupply into the Towne, the Athenians had all conſented to depart, & to lodge at Catana: had not an Eclipſe of the Moone, boding (as was thought) ill ſucceſſe, cauſed them to defer their departure. But this ſuperſtition coſt them deare. For the Syracuſians, Lacedæmonians, & Corinthians, with threeſcore and ſeuenteen ſaile of Gallies, entred the great Port of Syracuſe, wherein the Athenians kept their fleet, and wherein they had fortified themſelues. The Athenians, in the ſame Port encountred them with foureſcore & ſixe Gallies, commanded by Eurymedon, in which the Athenian fleet was beaten, by the leſſer number, & Eurymedon ſlaine. Now, though it were ſo, that the Syracuſians receiued the more loſſe by land (for the fight was generall) yet when the Athenians were beaten by ſea, in which kinde they thought themſelues inuincible, they were wonderfully caſt downe. For it was well ſaid of Gylippus, to the Syracuſians, Whoſo any people doe finde themſelues vanquiſhed in that manner of fight, and with thoſe weapons, in which they perſwade themſelues that they exceede all others, they not onely loſe their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, beſides the Gallies ſuncke and wracke, had ſeuenteene taken, and poſſeſt by the enemy: and with great labour and loſſe they defended the reſt from being fired, hauing drawn them within a Paliſado, in one corner of the Port, vnaduiſedly: for it is as contrary to a Sea-war, to thruſt ſhips into a ſtreight roome and corner, as it is to ſcatter foot in a plaine field againſt horſe; the one ſubſiſting, by being at large; the other by cloſe imbattailing.

The Syracuſians, hauing now weakned the Athenian fleet, reſolue to impriſon them within the Port. And to that purpoſe they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Hauen, being about a mile ouer, and there they came to Anchor, filling the out-let with all manner of Veſſels, which they man moſt ſtrongly, becauſe the Athenians, being now made deſperate, ſhould not with double ranks of Gallies breake through the Syracuſian fleet; which lay but ſingle, becauſe they were forced to range themſelues ouer all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore, not onely moored themſelues ſtrongly by their Anchors, but chained the ſides of their Gallies together, and laid behinde them againe certaine ſhips, which ſerued in the former warre for victuallers: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were ſunke, or the chaine, which ioyned them to their fellowes, broken, the Athenians might yet find themſelues a ſecond time entangled and arreſted. To diſorder alſo thoſe Athenian Gallies, which came on in forme of a wedge, to breake through, and force a paſſage, the Syracuſians had left within theſe Gallies & Ships, inchained together, a certain number of looſe ones, to ſtop their courſe and fury. For where the way of any Veſſell, vſing oare or ſailes, is broken, and their ſpeede fore-ſlowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the reſiſtance oppoſing.

On the other ſide, the Athenians knew that they were vtterly loſt except with an inuincible reſolution, they could make their way, and breake downe this great bridge of boats; or (at leaſt) force a paſſage through them at ſome part or other: which they reſolue ſolue to hazard, with all their ſhipping (to the number of one hundred & ten, of all ſorts) and with all the ſtrength of their Land-armie, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did ſo diſorder the Athenian fleet, ere they came to force the bridge, as, albeit ſome few of them had broken through the chaines, yet being ſtopt with the ſhips without; and aſſailed by other looſe Gallies of the Syracuſians, which were purpoſely left at large in the Sea, they were either taken or ſunk. Three great diſaduantages the Athenians had: the firſt, that fighting within a Hauen, and (as it were) in a ſtreight, they had no room to turne themſelues, nor to free themſelues one from another, being intangled; the ſecond, that hauing ouer-peſtered their Gallies with Souldiers, who vſed offenſiue armes of darts and ſlings, they had not place vpon the decks to ſtretch their armes: the third was, the diſcomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a paſſage, by which they might ſaue themſelues by running away. To bee ſhort, the fight was no leſſe terrible than the confuſion; the ſlaughter great on all ſides; and the noiſe, and the cries, ſo lowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as ſuruiued, were beaten backe to the Land, with loſſe of threeſcore of their Gallies, broken, ſunke, or abandoned. The Syracuſians did alſo loſe twenty of theirs, with Python, Commander of the Corinthians. The reſt of the Athenian Gallies, running themſelues into the bottome of the Port, ſaued themſelues by the helpe and countenance of the Land-armie, there fortified. In this deſperate eſtate, the Athenian Commanders goe to counſell. Demoſthenes perſwades them, to furniſh with freſh Souldiers thoſe few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracuſians were triumphing, and made ſecure by their preſent victory, to ſet vpon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to returne to Athens. This was no ill counſaile. For, as wee haue heard of many great Captaines (yea, the greateſt number of all that haue beene victorious) that haue neglected the ſpeedy proſecution of a beaten enemy; ſo might wee produce many examples of thoſe, who, hauing ſlept ſecurely in the boſome of good ſucceſſe haue beene ſuddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of a broken Armie, and haue thereby loſt againe all the honour, and aduantage, formerly gotten. But Nicias oppoſeth the aduice of Demoſthenes: Others ſay, that the Sea-men were againſt it. Whereupon abandoning their Gallies, they all reſolue to march ouer land to the Cities of their Confederates, till ſome more fauourable fortune ſhould call them thence. On the other ſide, Gylippus, & other the Lacedæmonian & Corinthian Captains, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracuſians to put themſelues preſently into the field, & to ſtop all the paſſages, leading to thoſe Cities of their enemies, to which the Athenians might make retrait. But many were weary, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the preſent. Which humour in ſome of our Commanders at Cadez, loſt vs both the Indian fleet, and the ſpoiles of many other Neighbour-places. Hermocrates, the Syracuſian, finding it a loſt labour, to perſwade his Countrimen to any haſtie proſecution, deuiſed this good ſtratagem, thereby to gaine time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, he ſhould draw them willingly out. He ſent two or three horſe-men out of Syracuſe by night, willing them to finde Nicias, and (after they had aſſured him, that they were of the Athenians faction) to giue him aduice not to march away ouer-haſtily from the place, wherein he was fortified; alledging that the Syracuſians had lodged their Armie, which could not long ſtay there, vpon the paſſages and places of aduantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. Theſe tidings Nicias eaſily beleeued, and put off his iourny to the third day. For men newly beaten, are (for the moſt part) more fearefull than wiſe; and to them, euery thiſtle in the field, appeares, by night, a man at armes.

The third day (leauing all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remoue; being pierced and purſued with the lamentable out-cries of thoſe that were ſicke and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies ſwords. The reſt march away, to the number of fortie thouſand; and make their firſt paſſage by force, ouer the Riuer of Anapus, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of their enemies. But being euery day charged in their marches, & by the Syracuſian horſe-men, beaten in from forraging and prouiſion of food, they grow weake and heartleſſe. The Syracuſians alſo poſſeſſe the Mountaine Lepas, by which they were to paſſe towards Camerina, and thereby force them to fall backe againe towards the Sea-coaſt, and to take what way they could: being vnable to proceed in their iourney intended. Many hard ſhifts they made, in difficult paſſages,

and blinde marches by night; which they were faine to endure, as hauing none other meanes to escape from the enemy that pursued them, and held them waking with continuall skirmishing. To keep all in order, Nicias vndertooke the leading of the Vaunt-guard; & Demosthenes conducted the Reare. At the Riuer Erineus, Nicias takes the start of a whole nights march, leauing Demosthenes to make the retrait: who being incompassed, and ouerprest with numbers, in the end renders himselfe. The conditions he obtained, were farre better than he could haue hoped for; and the faith of his enemies farre worse than he suspected. For he vvas afterward, with Nicias, murdered in prison. The Army of Demosthenes being dissolued, they pursue Nicias with the greater courage: who being vtterly broken, vpon the passage of the Riuer Assinarus, rendred himselfe to Gylippus, vpon honest conditions. Gylippus sought to preserue him, and to haue had the honour, to haue brought these two to Sparta; Nicias, as a Noble Enemy to the Lacedæmonians, and who, at the ouerthrow, which they receiued at Pylus by the Athenians, had saued the liues of the vanquished; Demosthenes, as one that had done to Lacedæmon the greatest hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusian Army, dissvvaded the rest, by all the art he had, from vsing any barbarous violence, after so noble a victory. But the cruell, and the cowardly sort, (cowardise and cruelty, being inseparable passions) preuailed, and caused these braue Captaines to bee miserably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to be starued in loathsome prisons; and the rest, sold for slaues. This was the successe of the Sicilian warre: vvhich tooke end at the riuer Assinarus, the foure and twentieth day of May, in the foure-score and eleuenth Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicil; the Egestans (for whose defence, against the Selinuntines, this late war had beene taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syracusians, sought helpe from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered themselues, and their Citie, as their vassals. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicil, yet considering the prosperity of the Syracusians, & their late victories ouer the Athenians, they stayed a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse or accept the offer made vnto them: for the Selinuntines were streightly allied to the Syracusians, as may appeare by what is past. In the end, the Senators of Carthage resolue vpon the enterprise; & (by a tricke of their Punick wit) to separate the Syracusians from the Selinuntines, they send Embassadors to Syracuse: praying that City, as in the behalfe of the Egestans, to compell the Selinuntines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the lands in question, as they of Syracuse should thinke meet to allow them. The Syracusians approued the motion; for it tended to their owne honour. But the Selinuntines would make no such appointment: rather they took it ill, that the Syracusians, with whom they had run one course of fortune, in the Athenian war, should offer to trouble them, by interposing as Arbitrators, in a businesse, that themselues could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would haue it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace craue aide of Syracuse; and the Syracusians as ill grant it vnto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrement, which the Carthaginians would haue put into their hands. Hereupon, an Army of three hundred thousand men is set out from Carthage, vnder the conduct of Hannibal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you haue heard before) was ouerthrowne with the great Carthaginian Army at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedy of this emploiment, that he might take reuenge as well of his Vncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of them hauing bin slaine by the Himerans, the other by those of Selinus. Both the Cities, Hannibal, in this war, won by force of armes, sackt them, and burnt them; and hauing taken three thousand of the Himerans prisoners, he caused them to be led vnto the place, where Amilcar was slain, and buried them there.

After this followed some trouble at Syracuse, occasioned by the banishment of Hermocrates, who had lately bin Generall of the Syracusian forces, against the Athenians. The malice of his enemies had so farre preuailed with the ingratefull multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meer vertue, at such time, as he was aiding the Lacedæmonians, in their warre against Athens; wherein he did great seruice. All the honester sort within Syracuse were sorry for the iniury done vnto him, and sought to haue him repealed. Hermocrates himselfe, returning into Sicil, gathered an Army of sixe thousand; with which he began to repaire Selinus; & by many noble actions laboured to win the the loue of his Citizens. But the faction that oppoſed him was the ſtronger. Wherefore he was aduiſed to ſeize vpon a Gate of Syracuſe, with ſome ſtrength of men; wherby his friends, within the Towne, might haue the better meanes to riſe againſt the aduerſe partie. This he did: but preſently the multitude fell to armes, and ſet vpon him; in which conflict he was ſlaine. But his ſonne-in-law, Dionyſius, ſhall make them wiſh Hermocrates aliue againe.

Of Dionyſius the Tyrant: and others following him, in Syracuſe.

THe Syracuſians had inioyed their liberty about threeſcore yeeres, from the death of Thraſybulus, to the death of Hermocrates: at which time Dionyſius was raiſed vp by God, to take reuenge, as well of their cruelty towards ſtrangers, as of their ingratitude towards their owne beſt Citizens. For before the time of Dionyſius, they had made it their paſtime, to reward the vertue of their worthieſt Commanders with death, or diſgrace: which cuſtome they muſt now be taught to amend.

Dionyſius obtained the principality of Syracuſe, by the ſame degrees, that many others, before him, had made themſelues Maſters of other Cities, and of Syracuſe it ſelfe. For, being made Prætor, and commanding their Armies againſt the Carthaginians, and other their enemies, he behaued himſelfe ſo well, that he got a generall loue among the people, and men of warre. Then began hee to follow the example of Piſiſtratus, that made himſelfe Lord of Athens; obtaining a band of fiue hundred men, to defend his perſon: vnder pretence, that his priuate enemies, being traiterouſly affected to the State of Syracuſe, had laied plots how to murder him, becauſe of his good ſeruices. Hee doubled the pay of his Souldiers; alledging, that it would incourage them to fight manfully: but intending thereby to aſſure them to himſelfe. He perſwaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, thoſe that had beene baniſhed, which were the beſt men of Syracuſe; and theſe were afterwards, at his deuotion, as obliged vnto him by ſo great a benefit. His firſt fauour, among the Syracuſians, grew from his accuſation of the principall men. It is the delight of baſe people to reigne ouer their betters: wherefore, gladly did he helpe them to breake downe, as fetters impriſoning their liberty, the bars that held it vnder ſafe cuſtody. Long it was not, ere the chiefe Citizens had found whereat hee aimed. But what they ſaw, the people would not ſee: and ſome that were needy, and knew not how to get Offices without his helpe, were willing to helpe him, though they knew his purpoſes to be ſuch, as would make all the Citie to ſmart. He began early to hunt after the tyranny, being but fiue and twenty yeeres of age when hee obtained it: belike, it was his deſire to reigne long. His firſt work, of making himſelfe abſolute Lord in Syracuſe, was, the poſſeſſion of the Citadell; wherein was much good prouiſion, & vnder it the Gallies were moored. This he obtained by allowance of the people; and hauing obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himſelfe without all ſhame or feare. The Armie, the chiefe Citizens, reſtored by him from baniſhment; all the needy ſort within Syracuſe, that could not thriue by honeſt courſes; and ſome neighbour-townes, bound vnto him, either for his helpe in warre, or for eſtabliſhing the faction, reigning at that preſent, were wholly affected to his aſſiſtance. Hauing therefore gotten the Citadell into his hands, he needed no more, ſaue to aſſure what he had already. Hee ſtrengthened himſelfe by diuers marriages; taking firſt to wife the daughter of of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once; the one a Locrian, Doris, by whom hee had Dionyſius, his Succeſſor; the other, Ariſtomache, the daugther of Hipparinus, and ſiſter to Dion, honourable men in Syracuſe; which bare vnto him many children, that ſerued to fortifie him with new alliances.

Yet it was not long, ere ſome of the Syracuſians (enuying his proſperitie) incited the multitude, and tooke armes againſt him, euen in the noueltie of his Rule. But their enterpriſe was more paſſionately, than wiſely gouerned. He had ſhamefully beene beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Sicilian men at armes, making them ſuſpect that it was his purpoſe to let the Carthaginians waſt al, that he might afterwards take poſſeſſion of the deſolate places; ſo it inflamed them with a deſire to free themſelues from his tyranny. They departed therefore from him, and marched haſtily to Syracuſe, where they found friends to helpe them: there they forced his Palace, ranſaked sacked his treasures, and so shamefully abused his wife, that for the griefe therof she poisoned her selfe. But he followed their heeles apace; and firing a Gate of the Citie by night, entred soone enough to take reuenge, by making a speedy riddance of them. For he spared none of his knowne, no, not his suspected enemies. After that, hee grew so doubtfull of his life, as he neuer durst trust Barber to trim him, nor any person, no, not so much as his brother, to enter into his chamber, vnstript and searched. Hee was the greatest Robber of the people that euer raigned in any State; and withall the most vnrespectiuely cruell.

After this, he separated with fortification that part of the Citie, called the Iland, from the rest; like as the Spaniard did the Citadell of Antwerpe: therein hee lodged his treasures, and his Guards.

He then began to make warre vpon the free Cities of Sicil: but while hee lay before Herbesse, an in-land Towne, the Syracusians rebelled against him; so, as with great difficultie he recouered his Citadell: from whence, hauing allured the old Souldiers of the Campanians, who forced their passage through the Citie, with one thousand and two hundred horse, he againe recouered the masterie ouer the Syracusians. And when a multitude of them were busied in gathering in their haruest, he disarmed all the Towns-men remayning; and new strengthened the Fort of the Iland, with a double wall. Hee inclosed that part also, called Epipoles; which, with threescore thousand labourers, he finished in three weekes, being two leagues in compasse. He then built two hundred new Gallies, and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and fortie thousand Targets, with as many swords, and head-peeces, with fourteene thousand corslets, and all other sutable armes. Which done, he sent word to the Carthaginians, (greatly infeebled by the plague.) That except they would abandon the Greek Towns, which they held in Sicil, he would make warre vpon them: and, not staying for answer, hee tooke the spoile of all the Phœnician ships, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the second did of our English, before the warre in our late Queenes time. Hee then goes to the field with fourescore thousand foot, and three thousand horse, and sends his brother Leptines to sea, with two hundred Gallies, & fiue hundred ships of burden. Most of the Towns which held for Carthage yeelded vnto him; sauing Panormus, Segesta or Egesta, Ancyræ, Motya, and Entella. Of these, he first wan Motya by assault, and put all therein to the sword; but before Egesta he lost a great part of his Armie, by a sally of the Citizens. In the meane while Himilco arriues; but, ere he tooke land, he lost in a fight at Sea, with Leptines, fiftie ships of warre, and fiue thousand Souldiers, besides many ships of burden. This notwithstanding, hee recouered againe Motya vpon his first descent. From thence marching towards Messena, he took Lypara, and (soon after) Messena, and razed it to the ground. Now began Dionysius greatly to doubt his estate. Hee therefore fortified all the places he could, in the Territorie of the Leontines, by which he supposed that Himilco would passe toward Syracuse; and hee himselfe tooke the field againe, with foure and thirtie thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Now, hearing that Himilco had diuided his Armie into two parts, marching with the one halfe ouer-land, and sending Mago with the other by Sea: he sent Leptines, his brother, to encounter Mago. But Leptines was vtterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twenty thousand of his men were slaine, and an hundred of his Gallies lost. It is very strange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authors tell vs; That one Citie should bee able to furnish fiue hundred saile of ships, and two hundred Gallies: (for, so many did Syracuse arme in this warre) and more strange it is, that in a battaile at Sea, without any great Artillerie, or Musket-shot, twenty thousand should bee slaine in one fight. In all our fights against the Turkes, of which that at Lepanto was the most notable, wee heare of no such number lost; nor in any other fight by Sea, that euer happened in our age, nor before vs. When Charles the fift went to besiege Algier, he had in all his fleet, transporters and others, but two hundred and fiftie saile of shippes, and threescore and fiue Gallies: for the furnishing of which fleet, hee sought helpe from all the Cities and Ports of Spaine, Naples, and the rest of Italie. But in old times it was the manner to carry into the field, vpon extremitie, as many as were needfull, of all that could beare armes, giuing them little wages, or other allowance: in our daies it is not so, neither indeede, is it often requisite. Vpon this ouerthrow, Dionysius poastes away to Syracuse, to strengthen it: Himilco followes him, and besiegeth the Towne by Land and Sea. But the Tyrant, hauing receiued aide from the Lacedæmonians, vnder the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himselfe to Sea, to make prouision for his Citizens, who in his absence, take twenty of the Carthaginian Gallies, and sinke foure. Hereupon, finding their owne successe prosperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill: hauing also at the present weapons in their hands; they consult how to recouer their liberty. And this they had done, had not Pharacidas the Lacedæmonian resisted them. It also fel out, to his exceeding aduantage, that the plague was so increased, and so violent, among the Carthaginians; as it is said, that aboue an hundred thousand of them died thereof. He therefore, with the power that he could gather together, sets vpon them both by Sea and Land; and hauing slaine great numbers of them, forceth Himilco to desire peace. This peace Dionysius sold him for a great summe of money; on condition that he should steale away with his Carthaginians onely: which he basely accepted, betraying the rest of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him: for he was pursued, and left many of his Carthaginians behinde him. The rest of the Africans fell vnder the swords of their enemies; onely the Spaniards, after they had a while brauely defended themselues, were (after their submission) entertained, and serued the Conquerour.

Many such examples of perfidious dealing haue I noted in other places, and can hardly forbeare to deliuer vnto memory the like practises, when they meet with their matches: That which hapned vnto Monsieur de Piles, was very suitable to this trecherie, wherewith Dionysius pursued Himilco. I was present, when De piles related the iniurie done vnto him. He had rendered S. Iohn d' Angelie, to the French King Charles the ninth, who besieged him therein. He rendred it, vpon promise made by the faith of a King, that he should be suffered to depart in safety, with all his followers. Yet in presence of the King himselfe, of the Duke of Anion his brother, Generall of his Armie, of the Queene Mother, and of diuers Dukes and Marshals of France, he was set vpon, and broken in his March; spoyled of all that he had; and forced to saue his life by flight, leauing the most of his Souldiers dead vpon the place: the Kings hand & faith, warranting him to march away with ensignes displaid: and with all his goods and prouisions, no whit mailing him. It needs not therefore seeme strange, that an Heathen Tyrant should thus breake his faith, since Kings, professing Christianitie, are bold to doe the like, or command their Captaines to doe it for them.

Dionysius, after this great victorie, tooke care to re-edifie Messena. Mago, who stayed in Sicil, to hold vp the Carthaginians therein, is againe beaten by Dionysius; who is also beaten by the Tauromenians. A new supply of fourescore thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to Mago; but these take egges for their money, and make peace with Dionysius, leauing the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to shift for themselues: whom Dionysius, after a long siege, ouer-came, and gaue their Citie to his mercenarie Souldiers.

He then past into Italie, obtained diuers victories there, brought the Rhegians on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred & fourescore thousand crownes, to furnish him with threescore Gallies, and to put in an hundred pledges, for assurance of their future obseruance of couenants. This he did, not with any purpose to performe vnto them the peace that they had so dearely bought; but that hauing taken from them their Gallies, he might besiege them, and ruine them vtterly, with the more ease. Now to the end he might not, without some colour, falsifie the faith that he had giuen to them; he pretended to want victuall for his Armie, at such time as he seemed ready to depart out of Italie, and sent to them to furnish him therewith; promising to returne them the like qualitie, at his comming home to Syracuse.

His resolution was, that if they refused to furnish him, he would then make their refusall the cause of his quarrell: if they yeelded to aide him with the proportion which he desired, that then they should not be able, for want of food, to endure a siege any long time against him. For, to ruine them he had fully determined, at what price soeuer. And great reason he had to take reuenge of them, if hee had done it fairely; and without breach of faith. For when in the beginning of his reigne, hee desired them to bestow a daughter of some of their Nobilitie vpon him for a wife: they answered, That they had not any one fit for him, saue the Hangmans daughter. Princes doe rather pardon ill deedes, than villanous words. Alexander the great forgaue many sharpe swords, but neuer any sharpe tongues; no, though they told him but truely of his errours.

And certainly, it belongs to those that haue warrant from God, to reprehend Princes: and to none else, especially in publique.

It is said, that Henrie the fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed against the Duke of Biron, for his ouer-bold and biting taunts, that he vsed against him before Amiens, than for his conspiracie with the Spaniard, or Sauoyan: for hee had pardoned ten thousand of such as had gone farther, and drawne their swords against him. The contemptuous words that Sir Iohn Parret vsed of our late Queene Elizabeth, were his ruine, and not the counterfait letter of the Romish Priest, produced against him. So fared it with some other, greater than hee, that thereby ranne the same, and a worse fortune, soone after.

To be short, he made them know new bread from old. Hee assaulted their Towne on all sides, which hee continued to doe eleuen moneths, till hee wonne it by force. Hee vsed his victorie without mercy, specially against Phyton, who had commanded within it.

Some other wars he made with the Carthaginians, after the taking and rasing of this Citie; and those with variable successe. For, as in one encounter he slue Mago, with ten thousand Africans: so the sonne of Mago beat him, and slue his brother Leptines, with foureteene thousand of his Souldiers. After which he bought his peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the aduice of Prosperity and Aduersitie, as all Kings and States doe.

When he had reigned eight and thirty yeeres, he died: some say in his bed, peaceably, which is the most likely, though others report it otherwise. A cruell man he was, and a faithlesse; a great Poet, but a foolish one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for speaking against his tyranny, he gaue order to haue him slaine, or sold for a slaue. For he could endure no man that flattered him not beyond measure. His Parasites therefore filled his crueltie, The hate of euill men; and his lawlesse slaughters, The ornaments and effects of his iustice. True it is, that flatterers are a kinde of vermine, which poyson all the Princes of the World; and yet they prosper better than the worthiest and valianteſt men doe: and I wonder not at it, for it is a world: and, as our Sauiour Christ hath told vs, The world will loue her owne.

To this Dionysius his sonne of the same name succeeded, and inherited both his Kingdome and his Vices. To win the loue of the People, he pardoned, and released out of prison, a great number of persons, by his Father lockt vp, and condemned. Withall, he remitted vnto his Citizens diuers payments, by his Father imposed vpon them. Which done, and thereby hoping, that he had fastned vnto himselfe the peoples affections; hee cast off the Sheepes skin, and put on that of the Woolfe. For being iealous of his owne Brethren, as men of more vertue than himselfe, he caused them all to be slaine; and all the Kindred that they had by their Mothers side. For Dyonysius his Father (as hath been said) had two Wiues; Doris of Locris, and Aristomache a Syracusian, the sister of Dion, which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris he had this Dionysius, who succeeded vnto him: and by Aristomache he had two Sonnes and two Daughters; of which the elder, called Sophrosine, he gaue in marriage to his eldest Sonne, and her halfe-brother, Dionysius; the younger, called Areta, he bestowed on his Brother Theorides: after whose death, Dion tooke her to Wife, being his Neece.

This Dion, a iust, and valiant man, finding that Dionysius had abandoned all exercise of vertue, and that he was wholly giuen ouer to sensualitie, preuailed so much with Plato, whose Disciple he had beene, as he drew him into Sicil, to instruct the young King. And hauing perswaded the King to entertaine him, he wrought so well with him, as Dionysius began to change condition; to change Tyrannie, into Monarchie; and to hold the Principalitie, that he had, rather by the loue of his People, and his Nationall Lawes, than by the violence of his Guards and Garrisons. But this goodnesse of his lasted not long. For Philistus the Historian, and other his Parasites, that hated Dions seueritie, wrought him out of the Tyrants fauour, and caused him soone after to bee banished out of Sicil, to the great griefe of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels betweene him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionysius stood in great feare; or (at least) if they refused it, to furnish him with fiftie Gallies at his owne charge, during the warre against them: his enemies found found meanes, by sinister interpretation, to conuert his good will into matter of treason. They told Dionysius, that all the great commendations, giuen of Plato, had tended to none other end, than to soften his minde, and to make him neglect his owne affaires, by the studie of Philosophie; whilest Dion, in the meane time hauing furnished fiftie Gallies, vnder colour of the Kings seruice, had it in his owne power, either to deliuer to the Syracusians their former libertie, or to make himselfe Lord and Soueraigne of their State.

It is likely, that the honest and liberall offer which hee made, to serue the King with so great a preparation, at his owne charge, begot him many enemies. For they that had serued the King for none other end, than to raise and enrich themselues, and had already beene raised and enriched, thought themselues bound to make the same offer, that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to conceiue it aright. But the couetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring, that Dion had, were bold to stile his Loue and Liberalitie, Pride and Presumption; and heartened the young King, in his oppressing, and eating vp his owne people, of whose spoyles they themselues shared no small portion. I haue heard it, That when Charles the fift had the repulse at Algier in Africa, Ferdinando Cortese, one of the bravest men that euer Spaine brought forth, offered vnto the Emperour, to continue the siege at his owne charge. But hee had neuer good day after it. For they that enuied his victories, and his conquest of Mexico in the West Indies, perswaded the Emperour, that Cortese sought to raise himselfe aboue him; and to haue it said, That what the Emperour could not, Cortes had effected; and was therefore more worthie of the Empire, than hee himself.

When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented, at first, to send him the reuenewes of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his moueables, at his owne pleasure; not without giuing hope, to recall him in short time. Had hee continued in this good moode, like enough it is, that Dion would haue beene well pleased to liue well, as he did at Athens. But after some time, Dionysius made Port-sale of this Noble-mans goods, and thereby vrged him to take another course, euen to seeke the restitution of his Countrie to libertie. The vertues of Dion, especially his great liberalitie, had purchased much loue in Greece. This loue made him suspected and hated of the Tyrant: but stood him in good stead, when he sought to raise men, with whose helpe hee might returne into Sicill. Yet he got not aboue eight hundred (for he carried the matter closely) to follow him in this aduenture. But many of them were men of qualitie, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did hee doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should bee needfull, that would readily assist him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicil, marched to Syracuse, entred the Citie without resistance, armed the multitude, and won all, saue the Castell.

Dionysius was then absent in Italie, but hee quickely had aduertisement of this dangerous accident. Wherefore hee returned hastily to Syracuse: whence, after many vaine treaties of peace, and some forceable attempts to recouer the Towne, hee was faine to depart; leauing yet the Castle to the custodie of Apollocrates his eldest sonne. Vnto hee went, his Minion Philistus, comming with a strength of men to assist him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recouerie of his Countries libertie, had the same reward, that all worthy men haue had from popular Estates. Hee was disgraced, assaulted, and forced to abandon the Citie. Hee retired himselfe to the Leontines, who receiue him with great ioy. Soone after his departure from Syracuse, new troupes enter the Castle: they sallie out, assaile, spoyle, and burne a great part of the Citie. Dion is sent for, with humble request: yet, ere hee could arriue, Dionysius his Souldiers were retired; and the Towne-men, thinking themselues secure, fell to braues against Dion. But the neke night they of the Castle sallie againe, with greater furie than euer; they kill Man, Woman, and Childe, and set fire in all parts of the Towne. In this their extremitie Dion comes the second time to their succour; the loue of his Countrie surmounting all the iniuries that hee had receiued. Hee sets vpon the Garison of the Castle, with the one part of his Armie; and quencheth the fire euery-where kindled, with the other part. In conclusion, after hee had conquered both the fire and the sword, that had well neere burnt to ashes, and depopulated Syracuse, he recouered the Castle, with the munition and furniture thereof, and sent Apollocrates, with after Dionyſius his Father, into Italie. But their malice, of whom hee had beſt deſerued, and whom hee had loued moſt, gaue an vntimely end to his dayes. For hee was ſoone after this his victorie, murdered by Gylyppus; who, after hee had, with ill ſucceſſe, awhile gouerned Syracuſe, was ſlaine with the ſame Dagger, with which hee had murdered Dion.

Ten yeares after the death of Dion, Dionyſius, with the aſſiſtance of his friends in Italy, recouers his eſtate, and returnes to Syracuſe, driuing Nyſæus thence, whom he found Gouernour therein. The better ſort of the Citizens, fearing, more than euer, his cruelty, flee to Icetes, a Syracuſian borne, and then ruling the Leontines. Icetes enters into confederacie with the Carthaginians, hoping by their aſſiſtance, not onely to preuaile againſt Dionyſius; but by the hatred of the Syracuſians towards Dionyſius, to make him alſo Lord of their Citie. The Syracuſians, being deſeruedly afflicted on all ſides, ſend to the Corinthians for ſuccour. Icetes alſo ſends thither, and diſſwades the Corinthians, as well as he can, from intermedling in the buſineſſe. He tells them, by his meſſengers, That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were ſo ſtrong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth, to land any Armie in Sicil. But the Corinthians, being by this treaſon of Icetes, more inraged than diſſwaded, ſent Timoleon with nineteene Gallies, to deliuer Syracuſe from tyrannie. In the meane while, Icetes had entred Syracuſe, and with the helpe of the Carthaginians, driuen Dionyſius into the Caſtle, where he beſieged him.

Icetes, being himſelfe a Tyrant in Leontium, rather ſought how to enlarge his power, than how to deliuer his Countrie. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arriued at Rhegium, he ſent to perſwade him, to returne his fleet; for that all things were (in effect) eſtabliſhed in Sicil. The Carthaginian Gallies were alſo in the ſame Port of Rhegium; whoſe Captaines aduiſed Timoleon, to get him gone in peace. They had farre more Gallies there, than he had, and were like to compell him, if he would not be perſwaded. Timoleon, finding himſelfe ouer-maſtered, makes requeſt to the Carthaginian Captaines, that they would be pleaſed to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open aſſembly of the people, to deliuer vnto him thoſe arguments, for his returne, which they had vſed to him in priuate; that hee might, by publique teſtimonie, diſcharge himſelfe to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, perſwading themſelues, that a victorie, obtained by a few faire words, was without loſſe, and farre more eaſie, than that of many blowes and wounds, yeelded to Timoleons deſire. But while the Orations were deliuering, Timoleon, fauoured by the Rhegians, ſtole out of the preaſſe; and hauing ſet ſaile, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recouered the Port of Tauromenium, where he was ioyfully receiued by Andromachus the Gouernour. From thence he marched toward Adranum, where ſurpriſing Icetes his Armie, he ſlew a part therof, and put the reſt to run. It is the nature of victorie to beget friends. The Adranitans ioyned with him; and ſo did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionyſius alſo ſent to Timoleon, offering to ſurrender the Caſtle of Syracuſe into his hands, as thinking it better to yeeld vp himſelfe, and the places which he could not defend, vnto the Corinthians, than either to Icetes, whom he diſdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who within fiftie dayes, after his arriuall, had recouered the Caſtle of Syracuſe, and ſent Dionyſius to Corinth, to liue there a priuate man, was ſtill inuaded by the Armies, and moleſted by the practices of Icetes. For he beſieged the Corinthians within the Caſtle of Syracuſe, and attempted (but in vaine) the murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians ſend vnto Timoleon a ſupply of two thouſand foot, and two hundred horſe, which are ſtaid in Italie by foule weather. Icetes is ſtrengthned with threeſcore thouſand Africans, brought vnto him by Mago (all which he lodgeth within Syracuſe) and with an hundred and fiftie Gallies, to keepe the Port. This was the firſt time, that euer the Carthaginians had dominion within the walls of that Citie. With this great Armie, Icetes aſſaulteth the Caſtle. Timoleon ſends them victuals, and ſuccour, in ſmall boats, by night, from Catana. Mago and Icetes doe therefore reſolue to beſiege Catana; but they were no ſooner on their way towards it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Captaine of the Corinthians, ſallied out of the Caſtle, and tooke that part of Syracuſe, called Acradina, which he fortified.

In the meane while, the two thouſand Corinthians arriue; with whom, and two thouſand other Souldiers, Timoleon marcheth towards Syracuſe. Mago abandoneth Icetes, being being frighted out of Sicil (which he might easily haue conquered) without idle rumour of treason. This made him returne to Carthage; where the generall exclamation against his cowardize, did so much affright him, that for feare of further punishment, he hanged himselfe. Timoleon enters the Citie, and beats downe the Castle (which he called the nest of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the Citie when the strangers were fled, in effect desolate; foals their horses did feed on the grasse, growing in the market-place. Therefore, hee writes to Corinth, for people to re-inhabite it. Ten thousand are sent out of Greece; many come from Italie; others, from other parts of the Iland.

But a new storme arises. Asdrubal and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arriue about Lilybæum, with threescore and ten thousand Souldiers, transported (with all their prouisions) in a thousand ships of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and incountreth this great Armie vpon the passage of a River.

A tempest of raine, haile, and lightening, with boysterous windes, beating vpon the backs of the Carthaginians, they are vtterly broken: ten thousand slaine, fiue thousand taken, with all their carriages and prouisions: among which there were found a thousand shields of gold and graues. After this, Timoleon gaue an ouerthrow to Icetes, and following his victorie, tooke him, with his son Eupolemus, and the Generall of his horse, prisoners; whom he caused all to be slaine: and afterwards (which was imputed to him for great cruelty) he suffered Icetes his wiues & daughters to be put to death. But this was the reuenge of God vpon Icetes, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Arete, Dions wife and a young childe of his, both Arisbamache his sister, to be cast into the Sea.

He againe preuailed against Mamercus, Tyrant of Catana, and won Catana it selfe. Mamercus fled to Hippon Tyrant of Messena: but Timoleon, pursuing him, won the towne; deliuering Hippon to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The same end had Mamercus, and all other the Tyrants in Sicil.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians, on condition, That they should not passe the River of Lycus. After this, hee liued in great honour among the Syracusians, till his death; and was solemnly buried by them in the market-place of their Citie: the day of his Funerals, being for euer ordained to be kept holy among them.

After such time, as Timoleon had deliuered Syracuse, from the tyrannie of Dionysius, and brought peace to the whole Iland; the Inhabitants enioyed their libertie in peace, eleuen-tie yeeres. The Cities and Temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant sailed in safetie; and the Labouring man enioyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But it was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to gouerne, nor how to obey, which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthy to be Kings, to gouerne them; should any long time subsist.

Twentie yeeres after the death of Timoleon, there started vp one Agathocles among them, a man of base birth, and of baser condition; who from a Beggar, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Captaine; and so from degree to degree, rising to bee a Prætor; finally, became Lord and Soueraigne of the Syracusians. Many fortunes hee run, and vnder-went as many dangers, ere hee obtained the Principalitie. For hee had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banisht. A passing valiant man he was, and did notable seruice, as well for those by whom he was employed, as also for the Syracusians, and against them. For in their warres against those of Enna; and the Campanes, he did them memorable seruice: and on the contrary, as memorable seruice for the Murgantines, against the Syracusians. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made Generall of their forces, he sacke Leontium; and besieged Syracuse so straightly, that the Citizens were driuen to craue aide, euen from their ancient and naturall enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was sent by the Carthaginians, to relieue Syracuse. With him Agathocles wrought so well, that hee got him to make peace betweene himselfe and the Syracusians; binding himselfe by promise and oath, to remaine a friend and seruant to the State of Carthage, for euer after. Amilcar entertained the businesse, and compounded the quarrels betweene Agathocles, and the Syracusians. Agathocles is chosen Prætor; he entertaines fiue thousand Africans, and diuers old Souldiers of the Murgantines, vnder colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the assistance of the poore and discontented Syracusians (the Citie also being diuided into many factions) hee assailes the Senators, kills all his enemies and opposites;

diuides the ſpoile of the rich, among the poore, and giues liberty to his Souldiers, to rob, to raiſh, and to murder, for two whole dayes and nights, without controlement: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and ſtrewed the ſtreets with ten thouſand dead carkaſſes, beſides thoſe that had broken their necks ouer the walls; their furie had no further ſubiect to worke on.

Agathocles, in an aſſembly of the people (being an eloquent knaue) perſwaded them, that, for the violent ſickneſſe, by which the common-wealth was vtterly conſumed, hee found no better, than the violent remedies, which he had adminiſtred; and that hee affected no other thing, than the reducing of the ſtate from an Oligarchie, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magiſtrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democratie, by which it had beene gouerned, from the firſt inſtitution, with ſo great glorie and proſperitie. This he did, to haue the crowne clapt on his head (as it were) perforce. For, as hee knew, that he had left none liuing, within the Citie, fit, nor able, to exerciſe the office of a Magiſtrate: ſo knew he right well, that all they which had aſsiſted, in the murder and ſpoile of their fellow Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the ſupport of a lawleſſe Lord, who had been partaker with them, in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this Rabble, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: againe and againe, ſaluting, and adoring him, by that name, as if it had beene giuen to him by ſome lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a piece of his patterne; but the one was of baſe, the other, of Kingly parents; the one tooke liberty from a common-weale, the other ſought onely to ſucceed in a Monarchie; the one continued his cruelty to the end; the other, after hee had obtained the Crowne, ſought, by making good lawes, to recouer the loue of his people.

The life of this Tyrant, is briefly written by Iuſtine; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the ſumme whereof is this. The ſame Amilcar that had brought him into Syracuſe, and that had lent him fiue thouſand men to helpe in the maſſacre of the Citizens, was alſo content to winke at many wrongs, that hee did vnto the Confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpoſe of Amilcar, to ſettle Agathocles in his tyranny, and to let him vexe and waſte the whole Iland; becauſe it was thereby like to come to paſſe, that hee ſhould reduce all Sicil into ſuch termes as would make it become an eaſie prey to Carthage. But when the cities, confederate with the Carthaginians, ſent their Embaſſadors, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punick faith (ſo much taunted by the Romans, as no better than meere falſhood) ſhewed it ſelfe very honourable, in taking order for the redreſſe. Embaſſadours were ſent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathocles in minde of his couenants; Amilcar was recalled home into Affrick, and a new Captaine appointed to ſucceed in his charge, with ſuch forces, as might compell Agathocles to reaſon, if otherwiſe hee would not hearken to it. All this tended, to ſaue their Confederates, from ſuffering ſuch iniuries in the future. For that which was paſt (ſince it could not be recalled) they tooke order to haue it ſeuerely puniſhed. Amilcar was accuſed ſecretly, and by way of ſcrutinie: the ſuffrages being giuen, but not calculated; and ſo reſerued vntill he ſhould returne. This was not ſo cloſely handled, but that Amilcar had ſoone notice of it. In managing his buſineſſe with Agathocles, it is likely that hee had an eye to his owne profit, as well as to the publike benefit of his Countrie. For he had made ſuch a compoſition with the Syracuſian, as gaue him not onely meanes to weaken others, but to ſtrengthen himſelfe, both in power and authoritie, euen againſt the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the cuſtome of thoſe, that hope to worke their owne ends by cunning practices, thinking to deale ſubtilly and finely, they ſpin their threeds ſo ſmall, that they are broken with the very winde. Amilcar ſaw, that his Carthaginians had a purpoſe to deale ſubſtantially; and that therefore it would bee hard for him, to make them follow his crooked deuices: which if hee could not doe, it was to be expected, that their anger would breake out into ſo much the greater extremitie, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore hee followed the example, which ſome of his fore-goers had taught him; and, for feare of ſuch a death, as the Iudges might award him, he ended his owne life in what ſort he thought beſt. This deſperation of Amilcar ſerued to informe Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. Hee ſaw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore reſolued to get the ſtart of them in action. Hee diſſembled no longer; but, in ſtead of ſpoyle and robbery, made open warre vpon all their Adherents. Hee had made the better part of Sicil his owne, ere the Carthaginian forces arriued: which thinking to haue incountred an ill-eſtabliſhed Tyrant, found him readie, as a King, to defend his owne, and giue them ſharpe entertainement. They were beaten by him, and their Nauie was ſo Tempeſt-beaten, that they could neither doe good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leaue their buſineſſe vndone, and returne into Africke.

The Carthaginians prepare a new fleet: which being very gallantly manned & furniſhed, was broken by foule weather, and the beſt part of it caſt away, euen whileſt it was yet within kenning of their Citie. But Amilcar, the ſonne of Giſco, gathering together the remainders of his ſhip-wracke, was bold to paſſe ouer into Sicil, and landed not far from Gela, where Agathocles was ſoone readie to examine the cauſe of their comming. Many skirmiſhes paſſed betweene them, in which (commonly) the Syracuſian had the better. But his good ſucceſſe begat preſumption, whereby hee loſt a battaile, more important than all the other fights. One aduerſe chance is enough to ouerthrow the ſtate of a Tyrant, if it be not vpheld by great circumſpection. The war was ſoone transferred to the walls of Syracuſe, within which Agathocles was cloſed vp, and driuen to make his laſt defence by their helpe, who may be iudged to haue loued him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracuſe, after that great maſſacre of the principall men, made in the beginning of this new Tyranny, were (for the moſt part) ſuch, as had beene either mercinarie Souldiers, infranchiſed ſlaues, or baſe & needie people, helpers in eſtabliſhing the preſent Gouernment, and Executioners of the murders, and ſpoyle, committed in that change. If there were any other (as ſome there were) they were ſo well obſerued, and (withall) ſo fearefull, that they durſt not ſtirre. But it was enough, that they all agreed in the common defence of themſelues and their Citie; Famine was likely to grow vpon them, and inforce them to change their reſolution. In this neceſſity, Agathocles aduentured vpon a ſtrange courſe, which the euent commended as wiſe. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in thoſe veſſels that rode in the Hauen, and committing the gouernment of the Citie to his brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) hee had bethought himſelfe of a meane, both to raiſe the ſiege, and to repaire all other loſſes. A Carthaginian fleet lay in the mouth of the Hauen, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keepe the beſieged from iſſuing forth.

Now at ſuch time as Agathocles was ready to depart, aduertiſement came, that many ſhips of burden, laden with corne, and other proviſions, were drawing neere vnto Syracuſe. To intercept theſe, the Carthaginians hoiſe ſaile, and lanch forth into the deepe. They were not far gone, when they might behold Agathocles, iſſuing forth of the Port, with purpoſe (as they thought) to giue conuoy vnto his victuallers. Hereupon they wheele about, and make amaine towards him, as thinking him the better bootie. He neither abode their comming, nor fled backe into the Citie, but made all ſpeed towards Africke, and was purſued by the Carthaginians, as long as the day would giue them light. In the meane ſeaſon, the victuallers were gotten to Syracuſe, which was the more plentifully relieued by their comming, for that Agathocles had vnburdened the place of no ſmall number. When the Carthaginian Admirall perceiued, firſt, that by purſuing two fleets at once, he had miſſed of them both; and ſecondly, that Agathocles returned not againe, but was gone to ſeeke his fortune elſewhere, hee thought it good to purſue thoſe that were fled, and to attend ſo well vpon them, that they ſhould not haue leiſure to doe miſchiefe in ſome other part.

The Carthaginian Nauie followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation of ſuch as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and ouer-tooke him after fiue dayes. He had (at the firſt) a great ſtart of them; ſo that (belike) they rowed hard, and wearied themſelues, in ſeeking their owne misfortune. For he fought with them, & beat them, and, hauing ſunke, or taken many, draue the reſt to flie which way they could, laden with ſuch ſtrange tidings of his voyage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did he diſcouer vnto them his project, letting them vnderſtand, That there was no better way to diuert the Carthaginians not only frō Syracuſe, but from all the Ile of Sicil, than by bringing the war to their owne doors. For here (ſaid he) they haue many that hate them, and that will readily take armes againſt them, as ſoone as they perceiue that there is an Armie on foot, which dares to looke vpon their walls. Their Townes are ill fortified, their people vntrained, and vnexperienced in dangers; the mercenarie forces, that they leuie in these parts, will rather follow vs than them, if we offer greater wages than they can giue: which we may better promise and make good, by letting them haue some share with vs in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can doe, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus he talked, as one already Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many braue words encouraged his men so well, that they were contented to set fire on all their ships (reseruing one or two to vse as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remaine, saue onely in victory. In this heat of resolution, they winne by force two Cities; which after they had throughly sacked, they burnt to the ground; as a marke of terrour to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians, hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Armie destroyed in Sicil. This impression so dismaies them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had scaped in the late Sea fight, yet still they feare, and know not what. They suspect Amilcars faith, who had suffered Agathocles to land in Africk: they suspect their principall Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage vnto the enemie; they raise a great Armie, and know not to whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captaines in the Citie, Hanno and Bomilcar, great enemies, and therefore the more vnlikely to conspire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generals of the Armie leuied, which farre exceeded the forces of Agathocles: But it seldome happens, that dissension betweene Commanders produceth any fortunate euent. Necessitie drawe Agathocles to fight: and the courage of his men, resolued to deale with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made easie the victorie against the one halfe of them. For Bomilcar would not stirre: but suffered Hanno to bee cut in pieces.

The reputation of this great victorie, brought ouer a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian society, to take part with Agathocles: who pursuing his victorie wineth many Townes, and sends word to Syracuse of his good successe. The Carthaginians also send into Sicil, willing Amilcar, their Generall, to succour the State of Africk, which was in danger to bee lost, whilest he was trauailing in the conquest of Sicil. Amilcar sends them fiue thousand men: all his forces hee thought it not needfull to transport; as hoping rather to draw Agathocles backe into Sicil, than to be drawn home by one, that could scarce retaine his owne Kingdome. But these good hopes had bad issue. Hee spent some time in winning a few Townes, that adhered vnto the Syracusians: and hauing brought his matters to some good order, hee conceiued a sudden hope of taking Syracuse by surprise. It was a prettie (though tragicall) accident, if it were true, as Tullie relates it. Amilcar had a dreame, which told him that hee should sup the next day within Syracuse. His fancie begot this dreame, and hee verily beleeued it. Hee made more haste than good speed, toward the Citie: and comming vpon it on the sudden, had good hope to carry it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laied an ambush to intrappe him, whereinto hee fell. So hee was carried prisoner into the Citie; in which it was likely, that hee had no great cheare to his supper: for they strucke off his head, and sent it into Africk (a welcome present) to Agathocles.

This good successe of things at home, did put such courage into the Sicilian Armie, that Agathocles was bold to weare a Crowne, and stile himselfe King of Africk. Hee had allured Ophellas, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promises to deliuer the Countrie into his hands: for that (as hee said) it was sufficient vnto himselfe to haue diuerted the Carthaginians from Sicil, wherein (after this warre ended) he might reigne quietly. Ophellas came with a great Armie, and was friendly entertained. But the traiterous Sicilian, taking an aduantage, did murther this his assistant; and afterwards by good words, and great promises, drew all the Cyrenian Armie to follow him in his Warres. Thus his villanie found good successe; and hee so preuailed in Africke, that hee got assure to make a step into Sicil. Many Townes in Sicil had embraced a desire of recouering their libertie; thinking it high time to fight at length for their owne freedome, after that they had so long beene exposed, (as a reward of victorie) either vnto Aliens, or to Tyrants, of their owne Countrie. These had preuailed farre, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cause: when the comming of Agathocles abated their high spirits, and his good successe in many fights, compelled them to Obedience. Out of

Sicil hee returned into Africk, where his affaires stood in very bad termes. Archagathus, his sonne, had lost a battaile; and (which was worse) had ill meanes to helpe himselfe: his Armie being in mutinie for lacke of pay. But Agathocles pacified the tumult, by the accustomed promises of great bootie and spoyle. It had now beene time for him, to offer peace to the Carthaginians: which to obtaine, they would (questionlesse) haue giuen to him, both money enough to pay his Armie, and all that they then held in Sicil. For their Citie had beene distressed, not onely by this his warre, but by the treason of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himselfe Tyrant ouer them. But ambition is blinde. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed vpon the conquest of Carthage it selfe: out of which dreame he was awaked, by the losse of a battaile, not so memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the strange euents following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this warre, had renewed their old sacrifices of children to Saturne: from which they had abstained, euer since they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of some, the goodliest of their prisoners, taken in the battaile, to offer vnto the said Idoll, in way of thankfulnesse for their victorie. The fire, with which these vnarmie men were consumed, caught hold vpon the lodgings neerest vnto the Altar; and spreading it selfe farther through the Campe, with the destruction of many men, caused such a tumult as is vsuall in the like cases. At the same time, the like accident of fire burnt vp the Pauilion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away, each of them beleeuing, that the noise in the aduerse Campe, was a signe of the enemies comming to inuade it. But the Carthaginians had a safe retrait: Agathocles, by a second errour, fell into a new calamitie. In the beginning of this his flight in the darke, hee met with his owne African Souldiers; and thinking them to bee enemies, (as indeed the one halfe of them had reuolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the last battaile) hee began to assaile them, and was so stoutly resisted, that hee lost in this blinde fight, aboue foure thousand of his men. This did so discourage his proud heart; that being fallen from the neere hope of taking the Citie of Carthage, vnto some distrust of his owne safetie, he knew no more how to moderate his present weake feares, than lately he had known how to gouerne his ambition. Therefore hee tooke the way that came next into his head; which was, to steale closely a-boord his shippes, with his younger sonne (the elder hee suspected of Incest, and of Ambition) and so to flie into Sicil, thinking it the best course to hide for himselfe, as wanting vessels wherein to transport his Armie. His elder son, Archagathus, perceiuing his drift, arrested him, and put him vnder custodie: but by meanes of a sudden tumult, hee was let loose, escaped, and fled alone, leauing both his sonnes behinde him. His flight being noysed through the Armie, all was in vprore; and extremitie of rage caused not onely the common Souldier, but euen such as had beene friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold vpon his two sonnes, and kill them. That this flight of Agathocles was extreamely base; I need not vse words to proue: That his feare was vnly, as all feare is said to be, a passion, depriuing him of the succours which reason offered, the sequele doth manifest. His forsaken Souldiers, being now a headlesse company, and no longer an Armie to be feared, obtained neuertheless a reasonable composition from the Carthaginians: to whom they sold those places, whereof they had possession, for nineteene talents. Likewise, Agathocles himselfe, hauing lost his Armie, did neuertheless, by the reputation of this late warre, make peace with Carthage vpon equall termes.

After this, the Tyrant, being deliuered from forraine enemies, discouered his bloudie nature, in most abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants, and his feares, vrged him so violently, that he was not satisfied with the spoyles of the rich, or the death of those whom he held suspected: but in a beastly rage depopulated whole Cities. Hee deuised new engines of torment; wherein striuing to exceed the Bull of Phalaris, hee made a frame of brasse, that should serue to scorch mens bodies, and withall giue him leaue to behold them in their miserie. So deuelish is the nature of man, when reason, that should be his guide, is become a slaue to his bruitish affections. In these mischiefes he was so outragious, that hee neither spared Sexe, nor Age; especially, when he was informed of the slaughter of his children in Africk. But this was not the way to preserue his estate: it threw him into new dangers. They whom hee had chased out of their Countrey, tooke armes against him, and draue him into such feare, that he was faine to seeke the loue of Carthage, which by ruling well hee might haue had in Sicil. Hee finally de-

liuered into the Carthaginians hands, all those Townes of the Phœnicians in Sicil, belonging vnto them, which were in his possession. They requited him honourably, with great store of corne, and with foure hundred talents of gold and siluer. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he preuailed against the Rebells, and setled his estate. Hauing no further businesse left in Sicil, he made a voyage into Italie. There hee subdued the Brutians, rather by terrour of his name, than by any force, for they yeelded at his first comming. This done, he went to the Isle of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when hee had gotten this great summe, hee would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, hee was bold to spoyle the Temples of their gods. Herein (me thinkes) hee did well enough. For how could hee beleeue those to be gods, that had continually giuen deafe eares to his horrible periuries? Then he returned richly home, with eleuen ships loaden with gold: all which, and all the rest of his fleet, were cast away by foule weather at Sea, one Gallie excepted, in which he himselfe escaped, to suffer a more miserable end. A grieuous sickenesse fell vpon him, that rotted his whole bodie, spreading it selfe through all his veines and sinewes. Whilest he lay in this case, all desiring his end, saue only Theoxena (a wife that he had taken out of Egypt) and her small children: his Nephew, the sonne of Archagathus, before mentioned, and a yonger sonne of his owne, began to contend about the Kingdome. Neither did they seeke to end the controuersie by the old Tyrants decision; they regarded him not so much. But each of them laied wait for the others life: wherein the Nephew sped so well that he slue his Vncle, and got his Grandfathers Kingdome, without asking any leaue. These tydings wounded the heart of Agathocles with feare and sorrow. Hee saw himselfe without helpe, like to become a pey to his vngracious Nephew, from whom he knew that no fauour was to be expected, either by himselfe, or by those, whom onely hee now held deare, which were Theoxena and her children. Therefore he aduised her and them to flie before they were surprised: for that otherwise they could by no meanes auoide, either death, or somewhat that would be worse. He gaue them all his treasures and goods, wherewith he euen compelled them (weeping to leaue him desolate in so wretched a case) to imbarke themselues hastily, and make speed into Egypt. After their departure, whether hee threw himselfe into the fire, or whether his disease consumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him; but hee ended his life as basely, as obscurely, and in as much want, as hee first began it.

After the death of Agathocles it was, that the Mamertines his Souldiers traiterously occupied Messana, and infested a great part of the Iland. Then also did the Carthaginians begin to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicil. What the Nephew of Agathocles did, I cannot finde. Likely it is that hee quickly perished. For the Sicilians were driuen to send for Pyrrhus to helpe them, who had married with a daughter of Agathocles. But Pyrrhus was soone wearie of the Countrie (as hath beene shewed before) and therefore left it; propheſying that it would become a goodly champion field, wherein Rome and Carthage should fight for superioritie. In which businesse, how these two great Cities did speed, the order of our storie will declare.

§. V.

A recontinuation of the Roman warre in Sicil. How Hieron, King of Syracuse, forsoke the Carthaginians; and made his peace with Rome.

When Appius Claudius, following the aduantage of his victorie gotten at Messana, brought the warre vnto the Gates of Syracuse, and besieged that great Citie, Hieron found it high time for him to seeke peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reason to bee offended with him, for helping himselfe by what meanes hee could, when they were not in case to giue him assistance; and foreseeing withall, that when once he had purchased his quiet from the Romans, it would be fit for him to sit still, without feare of molestation, whilest Rome and Carthage were fighting for the masterie. In this good mood, the new Roman Consuls, M. Valerius, and M. Otacilius, found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendship. Yet they made

vse of their present aduantage, and sold him peace for an hundred (some say two hundred) Talents.

These Consuls had brought a great Armie into Sicil; yet did they nothing else in effect, than bring ouer Hiero to their side. If the Syracusian held them busied (which I find not, otherwise than by circumstances, as, by the summe of monie imposed vpon him, and by their performing none other peece of seruice) all the whole time of their abode in the Iland; then was his departure from the friendship of Carthage, no lesse to his honour, than it was to his commoditie. For by no reason could they require, that he should suffer his owne Kingdome to run into manifest perill of subuersion, for their sakes, that should haue receiued all the profit of the victorie: seeing they did expose him to the whole danger, without straining themselues to giue him reliefe. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proofe of the strength of Syracuse, in the daies of Agathocles: and therefore knew, that it was able to beare a very strong siege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more slacke, in sending helpe: if (perhaps) it were not some part of their desire, that both Rome and Syracuse should weaken one the other, whereby their owne worke might be the easier against them both. Yet indeed, the case of the besieged Citie was not the same, when the Romans lay before it, as it had been, when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reason, to try the vttermost hazard of war against the Carthaginians, who sought no other thing than to bring it into slauery: not so against the Romans, who thought it sufficient if they could withdraw it from the party of their enemies. Besides, it was not all one to be gouerned by Agathocles, or by Hiero. The former of these cared not what the citizens endured, so long as hee might preserue his owne tyranny: the latter, as a iust and good Prince, had no greater desire than to winne the loue of his people, by seeking their commoditie; but including his owne felicitie within the publique, laboured to vphold both, by honest and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to passe, that he enioyed a long and happy reigne, liuing deare to his owne Subiects, beloued of the Romans, and not greatly molested by the Carthaginians; whom, either the consideration, That they had left him to himselfe, ere he left their societie, made vnwilling to seeke his ruine; or their more earnest businesse with the Romans, made vnable to compasse it.

§. VI.

How the Romans besiege and winne Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintaine a fleet. Their first losse, and first victorie by Sea. Of Sea-fight in generall.

Hieron, hauing sided himselfe with the Romans, aided them with victualls, and other necessaries: so that they, presuming vpon his assistance, recall some part of their forces. The Carthaginians finde it high time to bestirre them; they send to the Ligurians, and to the troopes they had in Spaine, to come to their aide; who being arriued, they made the Citie of Agrigentum, the seat of the war, against the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

The Roman Consuls, hauing made peace with Hieron, returne into Italie; and, in their places, Lucius Posthumus, and Quintus Mamilius, arriue. They goe on towards * Agrigentum: and finding no enemie in the field, they besiege it, though it were stuffed with fiftie thousand Souldiers. After a while, the time of harueſt being come, a part of the Roman Armie range the Countrie to gather corne, and those at the siege grow negligent; the Carthaginians sallie furiously, and indanger the Roman Armie, but are in the end repelled into the towne with great losse; but by the smart felt on both sides, the Assailants redoubled their guards, and the besieged kept within their couert. Yet the

* Agrigentum was a goodly Citie, built by the Geloi, vnder conduct of Ariston and Pyristus. The compasse was nine miles about the walls; and it had sometimes in it eight hundred thousand Inhabitants. This Citie, by reason of the fertilitie of the soyle, and the neighbour-hood of Carthage, grew in a short space from small beginnings, to great glory and riches. The plentie and fertilitie thereof was so great, as it caused Empedocles to say, That the Agregentines built Palaces of such sumptuositie, as if they meant to liue for euer; and made such feasts as if they meant to die the next day. But their greatest pompe and magnificence, was in their goodly temples, and theatres, water-conduits, and fish-ponds: the ruines whereof at this day are sufficient arguments, that Rome it selfe could neuer boast of the like. In the Porch of the temple of Iupiter Olympius, (by which wee may iudge of the temple it selfe) there was set out on one side the full proportion of the Giants, fighting with the gods, all cut out in polished marble of diuers colours; a worke the most magnificent and rare, that euer hath beene seene: on the other side the warre of Troy, and the encounters which hapned at that siege; with the personages of the Heroes that were doers in that warre; all of the like beautifull stone, and of equall stature to the bodies of those men in ancient times: In comparison of which, the latter workes of that kinde, are but petty things, and meere trifles. It would require a volume to expresse the magnificence of the temples of Hercules, Aesculapius, Concord, Iuno Lucinia, Chastitie, Proserpine, Castor and Pollux, wherein the Master-peeces of those exquisite Painters, and Caruers, Phidias Zeuxis, Myron, and Polycletus, were to be seene. But in processe of time it ranne the same fortune that all other great Cities haue done, and was ruined by diuers calamities of warre: whereof this warre present brought vnto it not the least.

Romans

Romans, the better to assure themselues, cut a deepe trench, betweene the walls of the Citie and their Campe: and another on the out-side thereof; that neither the Carthaginians might force any suddenly, by a sallie, nor those of the Countrie without, breake vpon them vnawares: which double defence kept the besieged also from the receiuing any reliefe of victuals, and munitions, whilest the Siracusian supplies the assailants with what they want. The besieged send for succour to Carthage: after they had beene in this sort pent vp fiue moneths. The Carthaginians imbarke an Armie, with certaine Elephants, vnder the command of Hanno; who arriues with it at Heraclea, to the West of Agrigentum. Hanno puts himselfe into the field, and surpriseth Erbesus, a Citie wherein the Romans had bestowed all their prouision. By meanes hereof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agrigentum; and the Roman campe no lesse straightly assieged by Hanno, than the Citie was by the Romanes: insomuch, as if Hieron had not supplied them, they had beene forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this distresse was not enough to make them rise; Hanno determined to giue them battaile. To which end departing from Heraclea, hee makes approach vnto the Roman campe. The Romans resolue to sustaine him, and put themselues in order. Hanno directs the Numidian horsemen to charge the Vantguard, to the end to draw them further on; which done, hee commands them to returne as broken, till they came to the body of the Armie, that lay shadowed behinde some rising ground. The Numidians performe it accordingly; and while the Romanes pursued the Numidians, Hanno giues vpon them, and hauing slaughtered many, beates the rest into their Trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two moneths, but lay strongly encamped, waiting vntill some opportunitie should inuite them. But Annibal that was besieged in Agrigentum, as well by signes as messengers, made Hanno know how ill the extremitie which he endured, was able to brooke such dilatory courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, prouoked the Consuls to fight: But his Elephants being disordered by his owne Vantguard, which was broken by the Romans, he lost the day: and with such as escaped, he recouered Heraclea. Annibal perceiuing this, and remaining hopelesse of succour, resolued to make his owne way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this daies victory, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; hee rusht out of the Towne, with all the remainder of his armie, and past by the Roman campe without resistance. The Consuls pursue him in the morning, but in vaine: sure they were, that hee could not carry the Citie with him, which with little a-doe the Romans entred, and pittifully spoyled. The Romans, proud of this victorie, purposed rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolued in the beginning of this Warre, onely to succour the Mamertines, and to keepe the Carthaginians from their owne coasts: but now they determine to make themselues Lords of all Sicil; and from thence, being fauoured with the winde of good successe, to saile ouer into Africke. It is the disease of Kings, of States, and also of priuate men, to couet the greatest things, but not to enioy the least; the desire of that which we neither haue nor neede, taking from vs the true vse and fruition of what wee haue already. This curse vpon mortall men, was neuer taken from them since the beginning of the World vnto this day.

To prosecute this Warre, Lucius Valerius and Titus Octacilius, two new Consuls, are sent into Sicil. Wherupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many in-land Towns gaue themselues vnto them. On the contrarie, the Carthaginians keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, many maritimate places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to secure their owne coasts, often inuaded by the African fleets, as also to equall themselues in euery kinde of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And herein fortune fauoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant in ship-wrights craft, a storme of winde thrust one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of fiue bankes, to the shore.

Now had the Romanes a patterne, and by it they beganne to set vp an hundred Quinqueremes, which were Gallies, rowed by fiue on euery banke, and twentie, of three on a banke: and while these were in preparing, they exercised their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a strange fashion. They placed vpon the Sea-sands many many seates, in order of the bankes in Gallies, whereon they placed their water men, and taught them to beate the sand with long poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Master, that so they might learne the stroke of the Gallie, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finished, some rigging and other implements excepted, C. Cornelius, one of the new Consuls (for they changed euery yeare) was made Admirall: who being more in loue with this new kinde of warfare, than well aduised, past ouer to Messana with seuenteene Gallies, leauing the rest to follow him. There he staied not, but would needs row along the coast to Lipara, hoping to doe some piece of seruice. Hannibal, a Carthaginian was at the same time Gouernour in Panormus; who being aduertised of this new Sea mans arriuall, sent foorth one Boodes, a Senatour of Carthage, with twentie Gallies to entertaine him. Boodes, falling vpon the Consull vnawares, tooke both him and the fleet he commanded. When Hannibal receiued this good newes, together with the Roman Gallies, and their Consull; he grew no lesse fooliſh hardie than Cornelius had bin. For hee, fancying to himselfe to surprize the rest of the Roman fleet, on their owne coast, ere they were yet in all points prouided; sought them out with a fleete of fiftie saile: wherewith falling among them, he was well beaten, and leauing the greater number of his owne behinde him, made an hard escape with the rest: for of one hundred and twentie Gallies, the Romans vnder Cornelius had lost but seuenteene, so as one hundred and three remained, which were not easily beaten by fiftie.

The Romans, being aduertised of Cornelius his ouerthrow, make haste to redeeme him, but giue the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Duilius. Duilius, considering that the Roman vessels were heauie and slow, the African Gallies hauing the speed of them, deuised a certaine Engine in the prow of his Gallies, whereby they might fasten or grapple themselues with their enemies, when they were (as we call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies sides together. This done, the weightier ships had gotten the aduantage, and the Africans lost it. For neither did their swiftnesse serue them, nor their Mariners craft; the Vessels wherein both Nations fought, being open: so that all was to be carried by the aduantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Besides this, as the heauier Gallies were accidentally likely to crush and cracke the sides of the lighter and weaker, so were they by the reason of their breadth, more steady, and those that best kept their feet, could also best vse their hands. The example may be giuen between one of the long boates of his Maiesties great ships, and a London barge.

Certainely, he that will happily performe a fight at Sea, must be skilfull in making choice of Vessels to fight in: he must beleeue, that there is more belonging to a good man of warre, vpon the waters, than great during; and must know, that there is a great deale of difference, betweene fighting loose or at large, and grappling. The Gunnes of a slow ship pierce as well, and make as great holes, as those in a swift. To clap ships together, without consideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of warre: for by such an ignorant brauerie was Peter Stroſsie, lost at the Azores, when he fought against the Marquesse of Santa Cruz. In like sort had the Lord Charles Howard, Admirall of England, beene lost in the yeere 1588. if he had not beene better aduised, than a great many malignant fooles were, that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Armie aboord them; and he had none: they had more ships than he had, and of higher building and charging; so that, had he intangled himself with those great and powerfull Vessels, he had greatly endangered this Kingdome of England. For twentie men vpon the defences, are equall to an hundred that boord and enter; whereas then, contrariwise, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twentie of ours, to defend themselues withall. But our Admirall knew his aduantage, and held it: which had he not done, he had not beene worthy to haue held his head. Heere to speake in generall of Sea-fight (for particulars are fitter for priuate hands than for the Presse,) I say, That a fleete of twentie shippes, all good sailers, and good ships, haue the aduantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ships, and of slower sayling. For if the fleet of an hundred saile keepe themselues neere together, in a grosse squadron; the twentie ships, charging them vpon any angle, shall force them to giue ground, and to fall backe vpon their owne next fellowes: of which so many as intangle, are made vnseruiceable or lost. Force them they may easily, because the twentie ships, which giue themselues scope, after they haue giuen one broad side of Artillerie, by clapping into the winde, and staying, they may giue them the other: and so the twentie ships batter them in pieces with a perpetuall vollie; whereas those, that fight in a troope, haue no roome to turne, and can alwaies vse but one and the same beaten side. If the fleete of an hundred saile giue themselues any distance, then shall the lesser fleet preuaile, either against those that are a-neare and hindmost, or against those, that by aduantage of ouer-sailing their fellowes keepe the winde: and if vpon a Lee-shore, the ships next the winde be constrained to fall backe into their owne squadron, then it is all to nothing, the whole fleet must suffer shipwracke, or render it selfe. That such aduantage may be taken vpon a fleet of vnequall speed, it hath bin well enough conceiued in old time; as by that Oration of Hermocrates, in Thucydides, which he made to the Syracusians, when the Athenians inuaded them, it may easily be obserued.

Of the Art of Warre by Sea, I had written a Treatise, for the Lord Henry, Prince of Wales; a subiect, to my knowledge, neuer handled by any man, ancient or moderne: but God hath spared me the labour of finishing it, by his losse; by the losse of that braue Prince; of which, like an Eclipse of the Sunne, we shall finde the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equall words and sorrowes; I will therefore leaue him in the hands of God that hath him. Cura leues loquuntur, ingentes stupent.

But it is now time to returne to the beaten Carthaginians; who by losing their aduantage of swift boats, & boording the Romans, haue lost fiftie saile of their Gallies: as on the other side, their enemies by commanding the Seas, haue gotten libertie to saile about the West part of Sicil; where they raised the siege layed vnto Segesta, by the Carthaginians, and wonne the Towne of Macella, with some other places.

* If we may giue credit to Antiquities, which Fazellus, a diligent writer hath left vs in his Historie of Sicil: Panormus, now called Palermo, is one of the first Cities that hath been built in all Europe. For whereas Thucydides seemes to make it a Colonie of the Phœnicians: Ranzanus, in libello de Panormo. lib. 6. affirmes that it was first, and long before the time which Thucydides sets down, founded by the Chaldeans, & Damascenes. To proue which, he tels vs of two inscriptions vpon marble in the Hebrew Character found at Panormus in the time of William the second, King of Sicil, that were then beheld of all the Citizens & other strangers, which being translated into Latine, say as followeth: Viuente Isaac filio Abrahæ, & regnante in Idumea, atq; in valle Damascena, Esau filio Isaac; ingens Hebræorum manus, quibus adiuncti sunt multi Damasceni, atq; Phœnices, profecti in hanc triangularem Insulam, sedes perpetuas locauerunt in hoc amœnissimo loco, quem Panormum nominauerunt. In the other marble are found these words: Non est alius Deus præter vnum Deum; non est alius potens præter eundem Deum, &c. Huius Turris Præfectus est Saphu filius Eliphaz filij Esau, fratris Iacob filij Isaac, filij Abrahami: & Turri quidem ipsi nomen est Baych; sed Turri huic proximæ nomen est Pharah. And this inscription (saith Fazellus) was found intire in the Castle Baych, in the yeare 1534. Now whether these inscriptions were truely as ancient, as these men beleeue they were, I leaue euery man to his owne faith. But that the City was of aged times, it appeares by Thucydides, who affirmeth; when the Greekes past first into Sicil, that then the Phœnicians inhabited Panormus: which certaine it is they did in the first Punick warre; to wins the Carthaginians, who were Phœnicians, from whom the Romans (A. Aquilius, and C. Cornelius, commanding this Armie) tooke it. And when Marcellus besieged Syracuse, it sent him in ayde 3000. Souldiers. But it was rather confederate, than subiect to the Romans. For Cicero against Verres, names it among the free Cities of Sicil. After Syracuse destroyed, it became the first Citie and Regall seate, as well of the Goths and Saracens in that Iland, as of the Emperours of Constantinople; of the Normans, French, and Arragonians; which honour it holds to this day, and is much frequented, for the excellent wine which growes about it.

Diuers enterfeats of warre, betweene the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable successe. The Romans prepare to inuade Africk: and obtaine a great victory at Sea.

THE victorie of Duilius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Naual triumph, that was euer seene in that Citie; so gaue it vnto the Romans a great incouragement, to proceede in their warres by Sea; whereby they hoped, not onely to get Sicil, but all the other Iles betweene Italie and Africk, beginning with Sardinia, whither soone after they sent a fleet for that purpose. On the contrary side, Amilcar the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might helpe to recompence the late misfortune: and being aduertised, that some quarrell was grown betweene the Roman Souldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being such as caused them to incampe a-part, he sent forth Hanno to set vpon them; who taking them vnawares, buried foure thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-warre in Sicil, Hannibal, who had lately beene beaten by Sea, but escaped vnto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former errour, obtained the trust of a new fleet, wherewith he arriued at Sardinia: the conquest of which Iland, the Romans had entertained for their next enterprise. Now it so fell out, that the Romans, crossing the Seas from Sicil, arriued in the port where Hannibal with his new fleet anchored. They set vpon him vnawares, and tooke the better part of the fleet which he conducted; himselfe hardly escaping the danger. But it little auailed him to haue escaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were so ill pleased with this his second vnfortunate voyage, that they hanged him vp for his diligence: for (as it hath beene said of old) Non est bis in bello peccare; In warre it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long ere any thing of importance was done by the Consuls, till Panormus was besieged: where, when the Romans had sought in vaine to draw the Cathe- ginians into the field, being vnable to force that great Citie, because of the strong Garrison therein bestowed: they then departed from thence, and tooke certaine In-land townes, as Myttistratum, Ecnus, Camerina, Hippana, and others, between Panormus and Selinus.

The yeare following, C. Atilius the Consul, vvho commanded the Roman fleet, discouered a company of the Carthaginian Gallies, ranging the coast: and, not staying for his whole number, pursued them with ten of his. But he vvas vvell beaten for the haste he made, & lost all, saue the Gallie which transported him: vvherein himself escaped with great labour. But ere all was done, the rest of Atilius his fleet was gotten vp: who renewing the fight, recouered from the Carthaginians a double number of theirs; by which the victory remaining doubtfull, both challenge it. Now to try at once, vvhich of these two Nations should command the Seas, they both prepare all they can. The Romans make a fleet of three hundred and thirtie Gallies; the Carthaginians, of three hundred and fiftie; of which, Quadriremes and Quinqueremes.

The Romans resolue to transport the vvarre into Affrick, the Carthaginians, to arrest them on the coast of Sicil. The numbers, vvith vvhich each of them filled their fleet, was (perhaps) the greatest that euer fought on the waters. By Polybius his estimation, there were in the Roman Gallies an hundred and forty thousand men; and in those of Carthage, an hundred and fifty thousand: reckoning one hundred and twenty Souldiers, and three hundred rowers to euery Gallie, one with the other. The Roman fleet was diuided into foure parts, of which the three first made the forme of a Wedge or Triangle; the two first squadrons making the Flancks, and the third squadron, the Base: the point therof (vvherein vvere the two Consulls as Admiralls) looking toward the enemie, and the middle space lying emptie. Their Vessells of carriage were towed by the third squadron. After all came vp the fourth, in forme of a Crascent; very well manned, but exceeding thinne: so that the hornes of it incloſed all the third squadron, together with the corners of the first and second. The order of the Carthaginian fleet I cannot conceiue by relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I coniecture, that the front of their fleet was thinne, and stretched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en haÿ; a long front of horse, and thinne: which forme, since the Pistoll preuailed ouer the Lance, they haue changed. Behind this first outstretched front, their Battalions were more solide: for Amilcar, Admirall of the Carthaginians, had thus ordered them, of purpose, (his Gallies hauing the speed of the Romans) that, when the first fleet of the Romans hasted to breake through the first Gallies, they should all turne taile, and the Romanes pursuing them (as after a victory) disorder themselues, &, for eagernesse of taking the Run-awayes, leaue their own three squadrons far behinde them. For so it must needs fall out; seeing that the third squadron towed their horse boats, and victuallers; and the fourth had the Reareward of all. According to Amilcars direction it succeeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken, the thinne front of the Carthaginian first fleet, which ran away, they forthwith gaue after them with all speed possible, not so much as looking behind them for the second squadron. Hereby the Romans were drawne neere vnto the body of the Carthaginian fleet; led by Amilcar, and by him (at the first) receiued a great losse, vntill their second squadron came vp, vvhich forced Amilcar to betake him to his Oares. Hanno also, who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian fleet, inuaded the Romane Reareward, and preuailed against them. But Amilcar being beaten off, Marcus Atilius fell back to their succour, and put the Carthaginians to their heeles; as not able to sustain both squadrons. The Reare being relieued, the Consuls came to the aide of their third Battalion, which towed the victuallers, which was also in great danger of being beaten by the Affrians: but the Consuls, ioyning their squadrons to it, put the Carthaginians on that part also to running.

This victorie fell vnto the Romanes, partly by the hardinesse of their Souldiers; but principally, for that Amilcar, being first beaten, could neuer after ioyne himselfe vnto any of his other squadrons, that remained as yet in a faire likelihood of preuailing, so long as they fought vpon equall termes, and but squadron to squadron. But Amilcar forsaking the fight, thereby left a full fourth part of the Romane fleet vnengaged, and readie to giue succour to any of the other parts that were oppresst. So as in conclusion, the Romanes got the honour of the day: for they lost but foure and

* The Quinqueremes are Gallies, wherin euery Oare hath fiue men to draw it: the Quadriremes had foure to an Oare: and the Triremes, three. Some haue thought, that the Quinqueremes had fiue rankes of Oares, one ouer another; & the other Gallies (rateably) fewer. But had this beene so, they must then haue had fiue dekkes each ouer other: which hath seldome beene seen in ships of a thousand Tunns, neither could the third fourth, and fift rankes, haue reached vnto the water with the Oares.

twentie of theirs; whereas the Africans loſt thirtie that were ſunke, and threeſcore and three that were taken.

Now, if Amilcar, who had more Gallies than the Romans, had alſo diuided his fleet into foure ſquadrons, (beſides thoſe that he ranged in the front to draw on the enemies, and to ingage them) and that, whileſt he himſelfe fought with one ſquadron that charged him, all the reſt of the enemies fleet had been at the ſame time entertained, he had preuailed: But the ſecond ſquadron, being free, came to the reſcue of the firſt, by which Amilcar was oppreſt; and Amilcar, being oppreſt, and ſcattered, the Conſuls had good leiſure to relieue both the third and the fourth ſquadron, and got the victorie.

Charles the fift, among other his Precepts to Philip the ſecond his ſonne, where he aduiſeth him concerning Warre againſt the Turkes, tells him, that in all battailes betweene them and the Chriſtians, he ſhould neuer faile to charge the Ianiſars in the beginning of the fight, and to ingage them at once with the reſt. For (ſaith he) the Ianiſars, who are alwaies reſerued intire in the Reare of the battaile, and in whom the Turke repoſeth his greateſt confidence; come vp in a groſſe body, when all the troops on both ſides are diſbanded and in confuſion; whereby they carrie the victorie before them without reſiſtance. By the ſame order of fight, and reſeruation, did the Romans alſo preuaile againſt other Nations. For they kept their Triary in ſtore (who were the choice of their Armie) for the vp-ſhot and laſt blow. A great and victorious aduantage it hath euer been found, to keepe ſome one or two good troopes to looke on, when all elſe are diſbanded and ingaged.

§. VIII.

The Romanes preuaile in Africk. Atilius the Conſull propoundeth intolerable conditions of peace to the Carthaginians. He is vtterly beaten, and made priſoner.

NOw the Romans according to their former reſolution, after they had repaired and re-victualled their fleete, ſet ſaile for Africa, and arriued at the Promontory of Hercules, a great Head-land, ſomewhat to the Eaſt of the Port of Carthage, and ſome fortie leagues from Heraclea in Sicil, where Amilcar himſelfe as yet ſtaid. From this Head-land (leauing the entrance into Carthage) they coaſted the Eaſt-ſide of the Promontorie, till they came to Clypea, a Towne about fiftie Engliſh mile from it. There they diſ-embarked, and prepared to beſiege Clypea; which, to eaſe them of labour, was yeelded vnto them. Now had they a Port of their owne on Africa ſide, without which all inuaſions are fooliſh. By this time were the Africans alſo arriued at their owne Carthage, fearing that the Roman fleet and armie had directed themſelues thither: but being aduertiſed that they had taken Clypea, they made prouiſions of all ſorts, both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans ſend to Rome for directions, and in the meane while waſte all round about them. The order giuen from the Senate, was, that one of the Conſulls ſhould remaine with the Armie, and that the other ſhould returne, with the fleet into Italie. According to this direction, Manlius the Conſull is ſent home to Rome; whither he carried with him twentie thouſand African Captaines, with all the Roman fleet and armie; except fortie ſhips, fifteene thouſand foot, and fiue hundred horſe, that were left with Atilius.

With theſe forces, Regulus eaſily wanne ſome Towns and Places that were vnwalled, and laid ſiege to others. But he performed no great matter, before he came to Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that neere vnto the Riuer of Bagrada, he encountred with a Serpent of one hundred and twenty foot long, which he ſlue; not without loſſe of many Souldiers, being driuen to vſe againſt it ſuch engines of warre, as ſerued properly for the aſſaulting of Townes. At Adis he met with the Carthaginian Armie, whereof the Captaines were Hanno and Boſtar, together with Amilcar, who had brought ouer out of Sicil fiue thouſand foote, and fiue hundred horſe to ſuccour his Countrie. Theſe (belike) had an intent, rather to wearie him out of Africa, by warie protraction of time, than to vndergoe the hazard of a maine fight. They were carefull to hold themſelues free, from neceſſitie of comming to blowes: yet had they a great deſire, to ſaue the Towne of Adis out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their generall purpoſe, and yet to diſturbe him in the ſiege of Adis, they incampe neere vnto him, and ſtrongly strongly (as they think) on the top of an hill: but thereby they lose the seruices, both of their Elephants, & of their horse-men. This disaduantage of theirs, Regulus discouers, & makes vse of it. He assailes them in their strength, which they defend a while, but in fine the Romans preuaile, & force them from the place, taking the spoile of their campe. Following this their good fortune at the heeles, they proceede to Tunis a Citie within fifteene miles of Carthage, which they assault and take.

By the losse of this battaile at Adis, and more especially by the losse of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly dismaied. The Numidians, their next Neighbours towards the West, insult vpon their misfortunes; inuade, and spoile their Territory, and force those that inhabite abroad, to forsake their villages and fields, and to hide themselues within the walls of Carthage. By reason hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Regulus findes his own aduantage, and assures himselfe that the Citie could not long hold out: yet he feared lest it might defend it selfe, vntill his time of Office, that was neere expired, should be quite run out, whereby the new Consuls were like to reape the honor of obtaining it. Ambition therfore, that hath no respect but to it selfe, perswades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded vnto them so vnworthy and base conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly possessed with feare, became now so couragious and disdainfull, that they resolued, either to defend their liberty, or dye the last man. To strengthen this their resolution, there arriued at the same time a great troope of Greekes, whom they had formerly sent to entertaine. Among these was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had passed, & of the ouerthrow which the Carthaginians receiued neere vnto Adis, gaue it out publikely, that the same was occasioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit ran, till it came to the Senate; Xantippus is sent for; giues the reason of his opinion; and in conclusion, being made Generall of the African forces, he carries himselfe into the field. The Armie which he led, consisted of no more than twelue thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces wherewith the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Libertie, Liues, Goods, Wiues, and Children: which might well make it suspected, that the Armies by Sea before spoken of, were misse-numbred; the one consisting of an hundred and forty thousand, and the other of an hundred and fifty thousand: vvere it not commonly found true, they which vse the seruice of mercenary Souldiers, are stronger abroad, than at their owne doores.

Xantippus, taking the field with this Armie, marched directly towards the Romans, and ranging his troups vpon fayre and leuell ground, fittest both for his Elephants and horse, presented them battaile. The Romanes vvondered much, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they vvere, that it should soone be abated. Their chiefe care was, how to resist the violence of the Elephants. Against them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a forelorne hope; that they might, either with darts and other casting weapons, driue backe the beasts vpon the enemies, or at least breake their violence, and hinder them from rushing freely vpon the Legions. To the same end, they made their battailes deeper in file, than they had bin accustomed to doe. By which means, as they vvere the lesse subiect vnto the impression of the Elephants; so were they so much the more exposed vnto the violence of horse, wherein the Enemie did farre exceede them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one ranke, before his Armie; which followed them at a conuenient distance: his horsemen, and some light-armed foote, of the Carthaginians and Numidians, vvere in the wings. The first onset vvas giuen by the Elephants, against which the Velites vvere so vnable to make resistance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into some disorder. In this case, the depth of the Romane battell was helpfull. For when the beasts had spent their force, in piercing through the first rankes, the squadrons neuertheless pertined in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horse, hauing at the first encounter, by reason of their aduantage in number, driuen those of Atilius out of the field, beganne to charge the battalions in flanke, and put them in great disorder; vvho being forced to fight on euery way, could neither passe forward nor yet retire, but had very much adoe to keepe good the ground whereon they stood. In the meane while, such of the Elephants, as had escaped the fire of the Elephants, and left their backes

* This City was taken from the Turkes by Charles the fift in the yeare 1536 and was one of the three Keyes, which he gaue in charge to Philip the second his sonne to keepe safe; to wit, this Tunis, the Key of Africa: Flushing, the Key of the Netherlands: and Calez, the Key of Spaine. But two of these Philip so lost, that he neuer found them again; the third, our English were bold, in the time of the renowned Queene Elizabeth, to wring out of his hands: where we staid not to picke any lock, but brake open the doores and hauing rifled all, threw it into the fire.

fell vpon the Carthaginian Armie, that met them in very good array. It was no euen match. The one were a disordered Companie, wearied with labour, and hart, the other fresh, and well prepared, to haue dealt with the enemie vpon equall termes. Heere was therefore a greater slaughter with little fight; the Romanes hastily recoyling to the body of their Armie, which being surrounded with the enemie, and spent with trauaile, fell all to rout, vpon the defeat of these troupes, that open the way to a generall ouerthrow. So the Carthaginians obtained a full victory; destroying the whole Romane Armie, saue two thousand, and taking fiue hundred prisoners, together with Atilius the Consull. Of their own they lost no more than eight hundred mercenaries, which were slaine, when the fight began, by two thousand of the Romans: that wheeling about to auoid the Elephants, bare down all before them, and made way euen to the Carthaginian trenches. These were the two thousand that escaped, when the whole Armie behinde them was routed. All the rest were either taken or slaine. Hereby fortune made the Romans know, that they were no lesse her vassals, than were the Carthaginians: how insolent soeuer they had bin in their proposition of peace, as if they had purchased from her the inheritance of their prosperitie, which she neuer gaue nor sold to any mortall man. With what ioy these newes were welcommed, when they came to Carthage, we may easily coniecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to passe in the World, there are many examples to proue, no lesse than this of Xantippus; all of them confirming that sentence of Euripides, Mens vna sapiens, plurium vincit manus; Many mens hands eguall not one wise minde.

After this great seruice done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus returned into Greece; whether for that he was more enuied than honoured, or for what other cause is vnknowne.

The death of Atilius Regulus the Consull, was very memorable. He was sent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ransome of prisoners on both sides; giuing his faith to returne if the businesse were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainly saw that his Country should lose by the bargaine: so far was he from vrging the Senate vnto compassion of his own miserie, that he earnestly perswaded to haue the prisoners in Afrike left to their ill destinies. This done, he returned to Carthage, where for his paines taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his constancie and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Carthaginians seeme to haue iudged him an obstinate and malicious enemie; that neither in his prosperitie would hearken to reason, nor yet in his calamitie would haue the naturall care to preserue himselfe and others, by yeelding to such an office of humanitie, as is common in all warres (not grounded vpon deadly hatred) only in regard of some small aduantage. Whatsoeuer the Carthaginians thought of him, sure it is, that his faithfull obseruance of his word giuen, cannot be too much commended. But that graue speech, which he made in the Senate, against the exchange of prisoners, appeares, in all reason, to haue proceeded from a vaine-glorious forwardnesse, rather than from any necessitie of State. For the exchange was made soone after his death; wherein the Romanes had the worse bargaine, by so much as Regulus himselfe was worth. As for the authority of all Historians, that magnifie him in this point, we are to consider that they liued vnder the Romane Empire: Liuius, the Carthaginian, perhaps did censure it otherwise. Yet the death which he suffered with extreame torments, could not be more grieuous to him than it was dishonourable to Carthage. Neither do I thinke that the Carthaginians could excuse themselues herein, otherwise than by recrimination: saying, That the Romanes deserued to be no better intreated, for as much as it was their ordinary practice to vse others in the like sort. Cruelty doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being customary. It was the Roman fashion, to whip almost to death, and then to behead, the Captaines of their enemies whom they tooke, yea although they were such as had made faire warre with them. Wherefore it seemes not meet, in reason, that they should crie out against the like tyrannicall insolencie in others, as if it were lawfull only in themselues.

The consideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Regulus intolerable demands; and of the sudden valour, wherewith the Carthaginians heart was changed by meere desperation; calls to remembrance, the like inconstancie of fortune in prosperity, that hath bred the like resolution in those, to whom aduersitie gaue such bin denied. In such cases I reuerence it impertinent, to adde vnto mine owne censures; approuing the true rules, from which our passions carry vs away.

In the yeare 1378. the Genoueses went on to fall vpon the Venetians, but they brought their own fleet within two miles of Venice it selfe. This bred such an amazement in the Citizens of Venice, that they offered vnto the Genowaies (their State reserued) whatsoeuer they would demand. But Pietro Doria, blowne vp with many former victories, would harken vnto no composition; saue the yeelding of their Citie and State to his discretion. Hereupon the Venetians, being filled with disdaine, thrust out to Sea with all their remaining power, and assaile Doria (vpon such desperate furie, that they breake his fleet, kill Doria himselfe, take nineteen of his Gallies, fourescore boats of Palas, and foure thousand prisoners, recouer Chiozza, & all the places taken from them; and following their victory, enter the Port of Genoa, enforcing the Genowaies, basely to begge peace, to their extreame dishonour and disaduantage being beaten, which, being victorious, they might haue commanded, to their greatest honour and aduantage. The like hapned to the Earle of Flanders, in the yeare 1580. when hauing taken a notable, and withall an ouer-cruell reuenge vpon the Gantois, he refused mercy to the rest, who in all humilitie, submitting themselues to his obedience, offered their Citie, goods, and estates, to be disposed at his pleasure. This when he had vndiscreetly refused, and was resolued to extinguish them vtterly; they issue out of their Citie with fiue thousand chosen men, and armed with a desperate resolution, they charge the Earle, breake his Armie, enter Bruges (pell-mell) with his vanquished followers, enforce him to hide himselfe vnder an heape of straw, in a poore cottage, out of which with great difficultie he escaped, and fled himselfe. Such are the fruits of insolencie.

CHAP. XXIX.

How the affaires of Carthage prospered after the victorie against Atilius: How the Romans lost their fleet by tempest, resolue to forsake the Sea: The great aduantages of a good warre, betweene Nations diuided by the Sea.

BY the reputation of this late victory, all places that had bin lost in Africke, returne to the obedience of Carthage. Only Clypea stands out; before which the Carthaginians sit down, and assaile it, but in vaine. For the Romans, hearing of the losse of Atilius with their forces in Africke, and withall, that Clypea was besieged, make ready a grosse Armie, and transport it in a fleet of three hundred and fifty Gallies, commanded by M. Æmilius, and Ser. Fulvius, their Consulls. At the Promontory of Mercurie, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, set out of purpose, vpon the brut of their comming, encounter them: but greatly to their cost. For the Romans take by force an hundred and foureteene of their fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they staid no longer, than to take in their own men that had bin besieged, and this done they made amaine toward Sicil, in hope to recouer all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this hasty voyage they despise the aduice of the Pilots, who pray them to haue harbour in time, for that the season threatned some violent stormes, which betweene the rising of Orion, and of the * Dog-starre. Now although the Pilots of the Roman Fleet had thus fore-warned them of the weather at hand, and certified them withall, that the South coast of Sicil had no good Ports, wherein to saue themselues vpon such an accident; yet this victorious Nation was perswaded, that the winde and seas feared them no lesse, than did the Africans, and that they were not able to conquer the Elements themselues. So refusing to stay within some Port, as they were aduised, they would needes put out to Sea, thinking it a matter much hurtfull to their reputation, after this victorie against the Carthaginians fleet, to take a few worthie Gownes vpon the coast. The mercilesse winds in the meane while ouertake them, and neere vnto Camerina ouerturne and thrust headlong on the rocks, all but fourescore

* There is no Part of the World, which hath not some certaine times of outragious weather besids their accidentall storms. We haue vpon our coast a Michaelmas daw, that seldome or neuer failes: In the west Indies, in the moneths of August and September those most which the Spaniards call the Nortes, or North winds, are very fearefull: and therefore they that Nauigate in those parts, [illegible] all those moneths take end: course the sun being at his aduance, in passing the Seas toward Asia, in the Winter quarter con- [illegible] hundred and fourteene Gallies, with all in effect in them, of ten thousand fighting men, [illegible] great, than his [illegible] from before the one and the other, was extreme dishonorable.

of three hundred and forty ships: so as their former great victory was deflowred by the Seas, before the fame thereof recouered Rome.

The Carthaginians, hearing what had happned, repaire all their warlike Vessels, hoping once again to command the Seas: they are also as confident of their land-forces since the ouerthrow of Atilius. They send Asdrubal into Sicil with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and fortie Elephants imbarqued in two hundred Gallies. With this Armie and fleet he arriues at Lilybæum, where he begins to vexe the Partisans of Rome. But aduersitie doth not discourage the Romanes: They build in three moneths (a matter of great note) one hundred and twenty ships, with which, and the remainder of their late shipwracke, they row to Panormus, or Palermia, the chiefe Citie of the Africans in Sicil, and surround it by Land and Water: after a while they take it, and leauing a Garrison therein, returne to Rome.

Very desirous the Romans were to be doing in Affrick, to which purpose they imploied C. Seruilius, and C. Sempronius, their Consuls. But these wrought no wonders. Some spoile they made vpon the coasts of Affrica: but Fortune robbed them of all their getings. For in their returne, they were first set vpon the sands, and like to haue perished, neere vnto the lesser Syrtes, where they were faine to heaue all ouer-boord, that so they might get off: then, hauing with much adoe doubled the Cape of Lilybæum, in their passage from Panormus towards Italie, they lost an hundred and fifty of their ships by foule weather. A greater discouragement neuer Nation had; the god of the waters fauoured them no more, than the god of the waters assisted them. Of all that Mors enricht them with vpon the Land, Neptune robbed them vpon the Seas. For they had now lost, besides what they lost in fight, foure hundred and sixe Ships and Gallies, with all the munition and Souldiers transported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby receiued, perswaded them to giue ouer their Nauigation, and their fight by Sea, and to send only a Land-armie into Sicil, vnder L. Cæcilius, and F. Furius, their Consuls. These they transported in some threescore ordinary passage boats, by the straights of Messana, that are not aboue a mile and a halfe broad from land to land. In like sort, the ouerthrow which Atilius receiued in Africa, occasioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them lesse choleriche against the Carthaginians, than before, so that for two yeares after, they kept the high & wooddie grounds, not daring to fight in the faire and champion Countries. But this late resolution of forsaking the Seas held not long. For it was impossible for them to succour those places which they held in Sicil, without a Nauie, much lesse to maintaine the warr in Africa. For whereas the Romans were to send forces from Messana to Egesta, to Lilybæum, and to other places in the extreme West parts of Sicil, making sometimes a march of aboue an hundred and forty English mile by land, which could not be performed with an Armie, and the prouisions that follow it, in lesse than fourteene dates; the Carthaginians would passe it with their Gallies, in eight and forty houres.

An old example we haue, of that great aduantage of transporting Armies by water, betweene Canutus, and Edmond Ironside. For Canutus, when he had entred the Thames with his Nauie and Armie, and could not preuaile against London, suddenly imbarqued, and sailing to the West, landed in Dorsetshire, so drawing Edmond & his Army thither. There finding ill entertainement, he againe shipt his men, & entred the Seuerne, making Edmond to march after him, to the succour of Worcestershire, by him greatly spoyled. But when he had Edmond there, he sailed back againe to London: by meanes whereof he both wearied the King, and spoiled where he pleased, ere succour could arriue. And this was not the least help, which the Netherlands haue had against the Spaniards, in the defence of their liberty, that being Masters of the Sea, they could passe their Army from place to place, vnwearied, and entire, with all the Munition & Artilerie belonging vnto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies haue bin able to doe it. Of this, an instance or two. The Count Maurice of Nassau, now liuing, one of the greatest Captaines, and of the worthiest Princes, that either the present or preceding Age hath brought forth, in the yeare 1590. carried his Armie by Sea, with forty Canons, to Breda: making countenance either to besiege Boisleduc, or Gertreuiden Berg; which the enemie (in preuention) filled with Souldiers, and victualls. But as soone as the winde serued, he suddenly set saile, arriuing in the mouth of the Meuse, turned vp the Rhine, and thence to Yssel, and lay downe before Zutphen. So before the enemie could ouerthrowne, ouer-land round about Holland, aboue foreſcore mile, and ouer many great Riuers, with their Cannon and carriage. Zutphen was taken. Againe, when the Spaniſh Armie had ouer-toyled them, wearied them with much, and were now far from home, the Prince Maurice, (taking countenance to ſaile vp the Rhine, changed his courſe in the night, and ſailing down the ſtreame, he was ſet down before Hulſt in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge, what was become of him. So this Towne he alſo tooke, before the Spaniſh armie could returne. Laſtly, the Spaniſh armie was no ſooner arriued in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, hauing fortified Hulſt, ſet ſaile againe, and preſented himſelfe before Nymegen in Gelder, a Citie of notable importance, and maſtered it.

And to ſay the truth, it is impoſſible for any maritime Countrie, not hauing the coaſts ſufficiently fortified, to defend it ſelfe againſt a powerfull enemy, that is maſter of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spaine than England ſhould be an example. Let it therefore be ſuppoſed, that King Philip the ſecond had fully reſolued to hinder Sir Iohn Norris in the yeare 1589. from preſenting Don Antonio, King of Portugale, before the gates of Lisbone, and that he would haue kept off the Engliſh, by power of his land-forces, as being too weake at Sea, through the great ouerthrow of his mighty Armada, by the fleet of Queene Elizabeth, in the yeare foregoing. Surely, it had not bin hard for him, to prepare an Armie, that ſhould be able to reſiſt our eleuen thouſand. But where ſhould this his Armie haue bin beſtowed? If about Lysborne, then would it haue beene eaſie inough the Engliſh, to take, ranſacke, and burne the Towne of Graine, and to waſte the Countrie round about it. For the great and threatning preparations of the Earle of Altemb. the Marquiſſe of Seralba, and others, did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the haſtie leauie of eight thouſand, vnder the Earle of Andrade, ſerue to more effect, than the increaſe of honour to Sir Iohn Norris, and his Aſſociates: conſidering, that the Engliſh charged theſe, at Puente de Burgos, and paſſing the great Bridge, behinde which they lay, that was flanked with ſhot, and barricadoed at the further end, routed them, tooke their campe, tooke their Generals ſtandard with the Kings Armes, and purſued them ouer all the Countrie, which they fired. If a royall Armie, and not (as this was) a Companie of priuate aduenturers, had thus begun the warre in Galicia; I thinke it would haue made the Spaniards to quit the guard of Portugale, and make haſte to the defence of their S^t. Iago, whoſe Temple was not far from the danger. But, had they held their firſt reſolution, as knowing, that Sir Iohn Norris his onely intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Armie into his Kingdom, whither comming ſtrong, he expected to be readily and ioyfully welcomed: could they haue hindred his landing in Portugale? Did not he land at Peniche, and march ouer the Countrey to Lisborne, ſixe dayes iourney? Did not he (when all Don Antonio his promiſes failed) paſſe along by the Riuer of Lysborne to Caſcaliz, and there, hauing won the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart? But theſe, though no more than an handfull, yet were they Engliſhmen. Let vs conſider of the matter it ſelfe, what another Nation might doe, euen againſt England, in landing an Armie, by aduantage of a fleet, if we had none. This queſtion, whether an inuading Armie may be reſiſted at their landing vpon the coſt of England, were there no fleet of ours at the Sea to impeach it, is already handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his obſeruations vpon Cæſars Commentaries, that maintaines the affirmatiue. This he holds only vpon ſuppoſition; in abſence of our ſhipping; and comparatiuely, as that it is a more ſafe and eaſie courſe, to defend all the coaſt of England, than to ſuffer any enemy to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the beſt way, to keep our enemy from treading vpon our ground; wherein, if we faile, then muſt we ſeeke to make him wiſh, that he had ſtaied at his owne home. In ſuch a caſe, if it ſhould happen, our iudgements are to weigh many particular circumſtances, that belong not vnto this diſcourſe. But making the queſtion generall, and poſitiue, whether England, without helpe of her fleete, be able to debarre an enemie from landing; I hold that it is vnable ſo to do: and therefore I think it moſt dangerous to make the aduenture. For the incouragement of a firſt victory to an enemy, and the diſcouragement of being beaten to the inuaded, may draw after it a moſt perilous conſequence.

It is true, that the Marſhall Monluc, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complaine, that by his wanting forces, wherewith to haue kept the frontier of Guienne, they of the

Proteſtant

Proteſtant religion, after the battaile of Moncontour, entred that Countrie, and gathered great ſtrength and reliefe thence (for if the Kings ſaith be) would haue giuen me but reaſonable meanes, ieuſe bien gardé à Monſieur l'Admiral, de ſuiure loing ſes Ehtrauers en la Garonne; I would haue kept the Admiral from watering his horſes in the Riuer of Garonne. Monſieur de Langey, on the contrary ſide, preferres the not fighting vpon a frontier with an inuading enemy, and commends the delay; which courſe the Conſtable of France held, againſt the Emperour Charles, when he inuaded Prouence. Great difference I know there is, and a diuerſe conſideration to be had, betweene ſuch a Countrie as France is, ſtrengthned with many fortified places; and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of inuaſions vpon firme land, that theſe great Captaines ſpake: whoſe entrances cannot be vncertaine. But our queſtion is, of an Armie to be tranſported ouer Sea, and to be landed againe in an enemies Country, and the place left to the choice of the Inuader. Hereunto I ſay, That ſuch an Armie cannot be reſiſted on the coaſt of England, without a fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the coaſt of France, or any other Countrey: except euery Creeke, Port, or ſandy Bay, had a powerfull Army, in each of them, to make oppoſition. For let his whole ſuppoſition be granted; That Kent is able to furniſh twelue thouſand foot, and that thoſe twelue thouſand be layed in the three beſt landing places within that Country, to vvit, three thouſand at Margat, three thouſand at the Neſſe, and ſixe thouſand at Foulkſton, that is ſomewhat equally diſtant from them both; as alſo that two of theſe troupes (vnleſſe ſome other order be thought more fit) be directed to ſtrengthen the third, when they ſhall ſee the enemies fleet to bend towards it: I ſay, that notwithſtanding this proui ſion, if the enemy, ſetting ſaile from the Iſle of Wight, in the firſt watch of the night, and towing their long boates at their ſternes, ſhall arriue by dawne of day at the Neſſe, and thruſt their Armie on ſhore there; it will be hard for thoſe three thouſand that are at Margat, (twenty and foure long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellowes at the Neſſe. Nay, how ſhall they at Foulkſton be able to doe it, who are neerer by more than halfe the way? ſeeing that the enemie, at his firſt arriuall, will either make his entrance by force, with three or foure hundred ſhot of great Artillery, and quickly put the firſt three thouſand, that were intrenched at the Neſſe, to run; or elſe giue them ſo much to doe, that they ſhall be glad to ſend for helpe to Foulkſton, and perhaps to Margat: whereby thoſe places will be left bare. Now let vs ſuppoſe, that all the twelue thouſand Kentiſh Souldiers arriue at the Neſſe, ere the enemie can be ready to diſ-imbarque his Armie, ſo that he ſhall find it vnſafe, to land in the face of ſo many, prepared to withſtand him; yet muſt we beleeue, that he will play the beſt of his own game; and (hauing liberty to go which way he liſt) vnder couert of the night, ſet ſayle towards the Eaſt, where what ſhall hinder him to take ground, either at Margat, the Downes, or elſewhere, before they at the Neſſe can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more eaſie than to doe it. Yea the like may be ſaid of Weymouth, Purbeck, Poole, and of all landing places on the South Coaſt. For there is no man ignorant, that Ships, without putting themſelues out of breath, will eaſily ourrun the Souldiers that coaſt them. Les Armees ne volent poynt en poſte; Armies neither flye, nor run poſt, ſaith a Marſhall of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleete of Ships may be ſeene at Sunne-ſet, and after it, at the Liſard; yet by the next morning they may recouer Portland, whereas an Armie of foot ſhall not be able to march it in ſixe dayes. Againe, when thoſe troupes, lodged on the Sea-ſhores, ſhall be forced to run from place to place in vaine, after a fleet of Ships; they will at length ſit down in the mid-way, and leaue all at aduenture. But ſay it were otherwiſe; That the inuading enemy will offer to land in ſome ſuch place, where there ſhall be an Army of ours ready to receiue him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our trained bands, and the choice of our Commanders and Captains, ſhall be drawn together (as they were at Tilburie in the yeare 1588.) to attend the perſon of the Prince, and for the defence of the Citie of London: they that remaine to guard the coaſt, can be of no ſuch force, as to encounter an Armie like vnto that, wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma ſhould haue landed in England.

The Iſle of Tercera hath taught vs by experience, what to thinke in ſuch a caſe. There are not many Ilands in the world, better fenced by nature, and ſtrengthned by art: it being euery where hard of acceſſe; hauing no good harbour wherein to ſhelter a Nauie of friends; and vpon euery coue or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approach of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylua, and Monsieur de Chattes, that held it to the yle of Dan Antonio, with fiue or sixe thousand men, thought to haue kept the Marquesse of Sant a Cruz, from setting foote on ground therein; the Marquesse hauing shewed himselfe in the Road of Angra, did set saile, ere any was aware of it, and arriued at the Port des Moles, farre distant from thence, where he wan a Fort, and landed, ere Monsieur de Chattes, running thither in vaine, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Strosse, slaine the yeare before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners murdered in cold blood, had instructed de Chattes and his followers, what they might expect at that Marquesse his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were slow in carrying reliefe to Port des Moles. Whether our English would be perswaded to make such diligent haste, from Margat to the Nesse, and backe againe, it may be doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Tercera; whereof the French-men had not measured the one halfe when they found themselues preuented by the more nimble ships of Spaine.

This may suffice to proue, that a strong Armie, in a good fleet, which neither foot, nor horse, is able to follow, cannot be denied to land where it list, in England, France, or elsewhere, vnlesse it be hindred, encountred, and shuffled together, by a fleet of equall, or answerable strength.

The difficult landing of our English, at Fayal, in the yeare 1597. is alleaged against this: which example moues me no way to thinke, that a large coast may be defended against a strong fleet. I landed those English in Fayal, my selfe, and therefore ought to take notice of this instance. For whereas I finde an action of mine cited, with omission of my name; I may by a ciuil interpretation, think, that there was no purpose to defraud me of any honour, but rather an opinion, that the enterprize was such, of so ill managed, as that no honour could be due vnto it. There were indeede some which were in that voyage, who aduised me not to vndertake it: and I harkened vnto them, somewhat longer than was requisite, especially, whilest they desired me, to reserue the title of such an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater person. But when they began to tell me of difficulty: I gaue them to vnderstand, the same which I now maintaine, that it was more difficult to defend a coast, than to inuade it. The truth is, that I could haue landed my men with more ease than I did; yea without finding any resistance, if I would haue rowed to another place, yea euen there where I landed, if I would haue taken more companie to helpe me. But, without fearing any imputation of rashnesse, I may say, that I had more regard of reputation, in that businesse, than of safetie. For I thought it to belong vnto the honour of our Prince and Nation, that a few Ilanders should not think any aduantage great enough, against a fleet set forth by Q. Elizabeth: and further, I was vnwilling, that some In-Countrie Captaines, and others, not of mine own squadron, whose assistance I had refused, should please themselues with a sweet conceit (though it would haue bin short, when I had landed in some other place) That for want of their helpe I was driuen to turne taile. Therefore I tooke with me none, but men assured, Commanders of mine owne squadron, with some of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, voluntaries, whom I could not refuse; as, Sir William Brooke, Sir William Harney, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir Iohn Skot, Sir Thomas Ridgeway, Sir Henrie Tinnes, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chate, Marcellus Throckmorton, Captaine Laurence Kemis, Captaine William Morgan, and others, such as well vnderstood themselues and the enemie: by whose helpe, with Gods fauour, I made good the enterprise I vndertooke. As for the working of the Sea, the steepenesse of the Cliffes, and other troubles, that were not new to vs, we ouercame them well enough. And these (notwithstanding) made fiue or sixe Companies of the enemies, that sought to impeach our landing, abandon the wall, whereon their Musketiers lay on the Rest for vs, and won the place of them without any great losse. This I could haue done with lesse danger, so that it should not haue serued for example of a rule, that failed euen in this example: but the reasons before alleadged, (together with other reasons well knowne to some of the Gentlemen aboue named, though more priuate, than to be here laid down) made me rather follow the way of brauery, and take the shorter course, hauing it still in mine owne power to fall off when I should thinke it meet. It is easily said, that the Enemie was more than a Coward; (which yet was more than we knew) neither will I magnifie such a small peece of seruice, by seeking to proue him better: whom had I thought thought equall to mine owne followers, I would otherwise haue dealt with. But for so much as concernes the Proposition in hand; he that beheld this, may well remember that the same enemy troubled vs more in our march towards Payal, than in our taking the shore; that he sought how to stop vs in place of his aduantage; that many of our men were slaine or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was shot in that march; and that such, as (thinking all danger to be past, when we had won good footing) would needs follow vs to the Towne, were driuen by him, to forsake the pace of a man of war, and betake themselues to an hastie trot.

For end of this digression, I hope that this question shall neuer come to triall; his Maiesties many moueable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the English will no lesse disdaine, than any Nation vnder heauen can doe, to be beaten vpon their owne ground, or elsewhere by a forraigne enemy; yet to entertaine those that shall assaile vs, with their owne beefe in their bellies, and before they eate of our Kentish Capons, I take it to be the wisest way. To doe which, his Maiesty, after God, will imploy his good ships on the Sea, and not trust to any intrenchment vpon the shore.

How the Romans attempt againe to get the masterie of the Seas. The victory of Cæcilius the Roman Consull at Panormus. The siege of Lilybæum. How a Rhodian Gallie entred Lilybæum at pleasure, in despight of the Roman fleet. That it is a matter of great difficultie to stop the passage of good ships. The Romans, by reason of grieuous losses receiued, vnder Claudius and Iunius their Consuls, abandon the Seas againe.

WHen, without a strong Nauie, the Romans found it altogther impossible either to keepe what they had already gotten in Sicil, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa or elsewhere, they resolued once againe, notwithstanding their late misaduentures, to strengthen their fleet and ships of war. So causing fiftie new Gallies to be built, & the old to be repaired, they gaue them in charge (together with certaine Legions of Souldiers) to the new Consuls, C. Atilius, & L. Manlius. On the other side, Asdrubal perceiuing that the Romans, partly by reason of the shipwracke which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the ouerthrow which they receiued by Xantippus in Africa, were lesse daring than they had bin in the beginning of the warre: and withall, that one of the Consuls was returned into Italie, with the one halfe of the Armie; and that Cæcilius, with onely the other halfe, remained at Panormus: he remoued with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybæum towards it, hoping to prouoke Cæcilius to fight. But the Consull was better aduised. For when Asdrubal had made his approches somewhat neere the Towne, Cæcilius caused a deepe trench to be cut, a good distance without the ditch of the Citie: betweene which and his trench he left ground sufficient, to embattaile a Legion of his Souldiers. To these he gaue order that they should aduance themselues, and passe ouer the new trench, till such time as the African Elephants were thrust vpon them. From those beasts he commanded them to retire, by slow degrees, till they had drawn on the Elephants to the brinke of the new trench, which they could by no means passe. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they were so gawled and beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, & by those that lay in the trench it selfe, that being inraged by their many wounds, they brake backe furiously vpon their owne foot-men, and vtterly disordered them. Cæcilius, espying this aduantage, sallied with all the force he had; and charging the other troups, that stood embattailed, he vtterly brake them, and put them to their heeles; making a great slaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.

The report of this victory being brought to Rome, the whole State, filled with courage, prepared a new fleet of two hundred saile, which they sent into Sicil, to giue end to that warre, that had now lasted foureteene yeares. With this fleet and armie the Romans resolue to attempt Lilybæum, the onely place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicil; and all (indeed) saue Drepanum, that was neere adioyning. They set down before it, and possesse themselues of all the places of aduantage neere vnto it, especially of such as command the hauen, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground fiue towres of defence; & by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the Citie, fine towers of defence; and by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the Citty, the defendants begin to despaire. Yet Himilco, Commander of the place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of Warre. All that is broken, hee repaireth with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious sallies, and giueth to the Romans all the affronts that possibly could be made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers; among which there are certaine Lieutenants, and other petty Officers, that conspire to render and betray the Towne. But the matter is reuealed by an Achæan, called Alexon, who had formerly, in danger of the like treason, saued Agrigentum. Himilco vseth the helpe of Alexon, to assure the hired Souldiers, and imployeth Hannibal to appease the troupes of the Gaules, which did wauer, and had sent their agents to the enemy. All promise constancie and truth; so that the Traitors, being vnable to performe what they had vndertaken, are faine to liue in the Roman campe as fugitiues, that had wrought no good wherby to deserue their bread. In the meane while, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their reliefe, hauing Hannibal the son of Amilcar, for their Conductor: who, in despight of all resistance, entred the Port and Citie, to the incredible ioy of the besieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perswaded by Himilco with hope of great reward) resolue to set vpon the Romans in their Trenches, & either force them to abandon the siege, or (at least) to take from them, or set on fire, their engines of batterie. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the vttermost, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans being more in number, and hauing the aduantage of the ground, hold still their places, and with extreme difficultie defend their engines.

They of Carthage desire greatly to vnderstand the state of things at Lilybæum; but know not how to send into the Towne. A certaine Rhodian vndertakes the seruice, and hauing receiued his dispatch, sailes with one Gallie to Ægusa, a little Iland neere Lilybæum. Thence, taking his time, he steered directly with the Port; and hauing a passing swift Gallie, he past through the best of the Channel, and recouered the water-gate, ere any of those, which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thrust from the shoores on either side.

The next day, neither attending the couert of the darke nigh, nor dreading to be boorded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his returne, he set saile, and shipped his Oares (his Gallie being exceeding quick of steerage, & himselfe expert in all parts of the channell) recouered the Hauens mouth, and the Sea, in despight of all the pursuit made after him. Then, finding himselfe out of danger of being incompassed by many, he turned againe towards the mouth of the Hauen, challenging any one, if any one durst come forth, vndertake him. This enterprise, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondred at in those dayes: and yet, where there was no great Artillerie, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill a-farre off, the aduenture which this Rhodian made was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and iudicious man of warre will not feare to passe by the best appointed Fort of Europe, with the help of a good Tide, and a leazing gale of winde: no, though fortie peeces of great Artillerie open their mouthes against him, and threaten to teare him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Queenes time, when Denmarke & Sweden were at War; our Eastland fleet, bound for Leif-land, as forbidden by the King of Denmarke to trade with the subiects of his enemies, & he threatned to sink their ships if they came through the streights of Elsenour. Notwithstanding this, our Merchants (hauing a ship of her Maiesties, called the Minion, to defend them) made the aduenture; and sustaining some Volies of shot, kept on their course. The King made all the prouision he could, to stop them, or take them at their returne. But the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burrough, leading the way, did not onely passe out with little losse, but did beat downe, with Artillerie, a great part of the Fort of Elsenour; which at that time was not so well prouided, as now perhaps it is: and the fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound receiued. Neither was it long since, that the Duke of Parma, besieging Antwerp, and finding no possibilitie to master it, otherwise than by famine, laid his Canon on the bancke of the Riuer; so well to purpose, and so euen with the face of the water, that hee thought it impossible for the least boate to passe by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blown vp by any winde of glorie, but comming to finde a good market for their Butter and Cheese, euen the poore men, attending their profit when all things were extreame deare in Antwerp, passed in boates of ten or twelue Tonne, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in despight of it; when a strong Westerly winde, and a Tide of flood fauoured them; as also with a contrarie winde, and an ebbing water, they turned backe againe: so as hee was forced, in the end, to build his Stockado ouerthwart the River, to his marualious trouble and charges.

The Fort Saint Philip terrified not vs in the yeere 1596. when he entred the Port of Calez, neither did the Fort at Pantal, when we were entred, beate vs from our anchoring by it, though it plaid vpon vs with foure Demi cannons within point blanque, from six in the morning till twelue at noone. The siege of Ostend, and of many other places, may be giuen for proofe, how hard a matter it is to stop the passage of a good ship, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is so set, as that of Angra in Tercera, that there is no passage along beside it, or that the ships are driuen to turne vpon a bow-line towards it, wanting all helpe of winde and tide; there, and in such places, is it of great vse, and fearefull: otherwise not.

But to returne to our aduenturous Rhodian: Hee arriues in safety at Carthage, and makes them know the estate of Lilybæum. Others also, after this take vpon them to doe the like, and performe it with the same successe. The Romans therefore labour to choak the channell, and, for that purpose, fill many Merchants ships with great stones, and sinke them therein. The force of the Tides cleares it againe in part: but they grounded so many of those great bellied boates in the best of the entrance, as at last it made a manifest rising and heape, like a ragged Iland, in the passage. Hereby it came to passe, that a Carthaginian Gallie, taking her course by night, and not suspecting any such impediment, ranne her selfe a-ground thereon, and was taken. Now comes the braue Rhodian, thinking to enter, as hee had done before: but this Carthaginian Gallie, a little before taken, gaue him chase, and gathered vpon him; hee findes what shee is, both by her forme and by her swiftnesse: and being not able to runne from her, resolued to fight with her. But shee is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Lilybæum, after this, is greatly distressed, the Souldiers being worne with labour and watching. But in this despaire there rose so violent a tempest, as some of the Romans woodden Towers, by which they ouer-topt the walls of Lilybæum, were ouer-turned. A Greeke Souldier vndertakes to fire those that were fallen, and performes it: for the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blowne vnto by the bellowes of a tempest, it increased so fast, as it became resistlesse, and in the end burned all to ashes, and melted the brasen heads of the battering Rammes. Hereupon, despaire and wearinesse hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: so that they resolue, by a long siege, to starue the defendants.

Vpon relation of what had past, a supply of tenne thousand Souldiers is sent from Rome, vnder M. Claudius, the Consull. Hee arriues at Messana, and marcheth ouer land to Lilybæum: where hauing re-inforced the Armie, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surprise of Drepanum, a Citie on the other side of the Bay of Lilybæum. This seruice the Captaines and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Consull embarques his troupes, and arriues on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Gouernour of the Towne, a valiant and prudent man of warre, who being ignorant of the new supply arriued at Lilybæum, was at first amazed at their sudden approach; but hauing recouered his spirits, hee perswades the Souldiers, rather to fight abroade, than to be encloſed. Herewithall hee promiseth great rewards to such, as by their valour shall deserue them, offering to leade them himselfe, and to fight in the head of his fleet. Hauing sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrusts into the Sea towards the Romans. The Consull, deceiued of his expectation, calls backe the foremost Gallies, that he might now marshall them for defence. Hereupon some rowe backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adherbal findes and followes his aduantage, and forceth the Consull into a Bay at hand, wherein he ranged himselfe, hauing the land on his backe: hoping thereby to keepe himselfe from being incompassed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-roome, so streighened, as he could not turne himselfe any way from his enemies, nor range himselfe in any order. Therefore when he found no hope of resistance, keeping the shore on his left hand, hee thrust out of the Bay with thirtie Gallies, beſides his owne, and ſo fled away: all the reſt of his fleet, to the number of ninetie and foure ſhips, were taken or ſunke by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this ſeruice is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indiſcretion and flight, as much diſgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithſtanding this great loſſe, arme threeſcore Gallies, with which they ſend away Iunius, their Conſull, to take charge of their buſineſſe in Sicil. Iunius arriues at Meſſana, where he meetes with the whole remainder of the Roman fleet, thoſe excepted which rode in the Port of Lily bæum. One hundred and twenty Gallies hee had, and beſides theſe, hee had gotten together almoſt eight hundred ſhips of burthen, which were laden with all neceſſarie prouiſions for the Armie. With this great fleet he arriues at Syracuſe, where he ſtaies a while; partly to take in corne; partly, to wait for ſome, that were too ſlow of ſaile, to keepe company with him along from Meſſana. In the meane time, he diſpatcheth away towards Lilybæum, his Quæſtors or Treaſurers; to whom he commits the one halfe of his victualers, with ſome Gallies for their conuoy.

Adherbal was not careleſſe, after his late victory: but ſtudied how to vſe it to the beſt aduantage. The ſhips and priſoners that he had taken, he ſent to Carthage. Of his owne Gallies he deliuered thirtie to Carthalo, who had threeſcore and tenne more vnder his owne charge; and ſent him to try, what good might be done againſt the Roman fleet, in the Hauen of Lilybæum. According to this direction, Carthalo ſuddenly enters the mouth of that Hauen, where hee findes the Romans, more attentiue to the keeping in of the beſieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their owne againſt another fleet. So he chargeth them, boords, and takes ſome, and fires the reſt. The Roman Campe takes alarme, and haſtens to the reſcue. But Himilco, Gouernour of the Town, is not behinde hand, who ſallies out at the ſame time, and putting the Romans to great diſtreſſe, giues Carthalo good leiſure to goe through with his enterpriſe.

After this exploit, Carthalo ranne all along the South coaſt of Sicil, deuiſing how to worke miſchiefe to the enemie; wherein Fortune preſented him with a faire occaſion, which he wiſely managed. He was aduertiſed by his Scouts, that they had deſcried, neere at hand, a great fleet, conſiſting of all manner of Veſſels. Theſe were the victualers, which the Conſull Iunius, more haſtily than prouidently, had ſent before him towards Lilybæum. Carthalo was glad to heare of their comming: for he and his men were full of courage, by reaſon of their late victories. Accompting therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks approching, to be rather a prey, than a fleet, likely to make ſtrong oppoſition, he haſtens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no minde to fight: but were glad to ſeeke ſhelter in an open Road, full of rocks, vnder couert of a poore Towne, belonging to their partie; that could helpe to ſaue them onely from the preſent danger, by lending them engines & other aide, wherewith to beat off the Carthaginians that aſſailed them. Carthalo therefore, hauing taken a few of them, lay waiting for the reſt, that could not long ride vnder thoſe rockes, but would be forced by any great change of winde, either to put out into the deepe, or to ſaue their men, how they could, by taking land, with the loſſe of all their ſhipping. Whilſt he was buſied in this care, the Conſull Iunius drew neere, and was diſcouered. Againſt him Carthalo makes out, and findes him altogether vnprepared to fight, as being wholly ignorant of that which had hapned. The Conſull had neither meanes to flie, nor abilitie to fight. Therefore he likewiſe ran into a very dangerous Creeke; thinking no danger ſo great, as that of the enemie. The Carthaginian, ſeeing this, betakes himſelfe to a Station betweene the two Roman fleets; where he watcheth, to ſee which of them would firſt ſtir, with a reſolution to aſſault that, which ſhould firſt dare to put it ſelfe into the Sea. So as now all the three fleets were on the South coaſt of Sicil, betweene the Promontorie of Pachinus and Lilybæum, a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the winde ſtormed at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of tempeſt, and their ſignes, finding (belike) ſome ſwelling billow (for ſo we doe in the Weſt of England, before a Southerly ſtorme) haſted to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to couer themſelues from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight, than how to Nauigate, and neuer found any foule weather in the entrailes of their beaſts, their Sooth-ſayers being all land-prophets, were ſuddenly ouer-taken with a boiſtrous South winde, and all the Gallies forced againſt the rocks, and vtterly wrackt.

This calamity so discouraged the Romans, that they resolued againe to forsake the Seas, and trust onely to the seruice of their Legions vpon firme ground. But such a resolution cannot long hold. Either they must be strong at Sea, or else they must not make warre in an Iland; against those that haue a mightier fleet. Yet are they to be excused, in regard of the many great calamities which they had suffered, through their want of skil. Here I cannot forbeare to commend the patient vertue of the Spaniards. We seldome or neuer finde, that any Nation hath endured so many misaduentures and miseries, as the Spaniards haue done, in their Indian Discoueries. Yet persisting in their enterprises, with an inuincible constancie, they haue annexed to their Kingdome so many goodly Prouinces, as burie the remembrance of all dangers past. Tempests and shipwracks, famine, ouerthrowes, mutinies, heat and cold, pestilence, and all manner of diseases, both old and new, together with extreme pouertie, and want of all things needfull, haue beene the enemies, wherewith euery one of their most noble Discouerers, at one time or other, hath encountred. Many yeeres haue passed ouer some of their heads, in the search of not so many leagues: yea more than one or two, haue spent their labour, their wealth, and their liues, in search of a golden Kingdome, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their first setting forth. All which notwithstanding, the third, fourth, and fift vndertakers, haue not beene disheartened. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with those Treasuries, and Paradises, which they enioy; and well they deserue to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertue in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

§. XI.

The Citie of Eryx is surprized by the Romans, and recouered by Amilcar, who stoutly holds warre with them fiue yeeres. The Romans hauing emptied their common treasure, build a new fleet, at the charges of priuate men. The great victorie at Sea of Luctatius the Consull; whereby the Carthaginians are forced to craue peace. The conditions of the peace betweene Rome and Carthage.

THE Romans were carefull, to supply with all industrie, by land, the want of strength at Sea. Therefore they continue the siege of Lilybæum, and seeke to make sure to themselues all places, whither the enemies ships could not bring reliefe. The Consull Iunius, to cure the wound of dishonour, which hee had receiued, bethought him what enterprises to vndertake. In the end hee resolued to attempt the Mountaine and Citie of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the fairest and richest of all the Iland; and of these, by cunning or treason, he got possession. Eryx was commodiously seated betweene Drepanum and Panormus; so that it seemed a fit place for a Garrison, that should restraine the Carthaginians from making roads into the Countrey. Wherefore Iunius fortified both the top of the Mountaine, and the first entrance of the passage from the bottome, (both which places were very defencible) with a good strength of men. But shortly after, in the eighteenth yeere of this warre, the Carthaginians sent forth Amilcar, surnamed Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a fleete and Armie, who sailing to the coasts of Italie, did throughly repay the spoyles which the Romans made in Africa. For hee first of all wasted and destroyed the Territories of the Locrines, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred he into Sicil; and finding there no walled Citie in the Carthaginians power, that serued fitly to infest the Romans, he occupied a piece of ground of great aduantage, and lodged his Armie thereon; to confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as those that kept about Eryx, putting himselfe betweene both Armies with admirable resolution.

The place that Amilcar had seized vpon, was not onely very strong by situation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gaue him opportunitie, to scoure all the coast of Italie with his fleet, wasting all along as farre as to Cuma. In the Isle of Sicil he held the Romans to hard worke: lying neere vnto Panormus, where in three yeers abode he did many notable acts, though not of much consequence, for that the enemie could neuer be drawne to hazard the maine chance. Hauing wearied himselfe and the Romans long enough about Panormus, he vndertooke a strange peece of work at Eryx. The Roman Garrisons, placed there by Iunius, on the top, and at the bottome of the Mountaine, were very ſtrongly lodged. Neuertheleſſe Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Sea-ſide, by which hee conueighed his men into the Citie of Eryx, that was about the middeſt of the aſcent, ere the enemy knew of it. By this it came to paſſe, that the Romans which kept the top of the mountaine, were ſtreightly held (as it were) beſieged. And no leſſe was Amilcar himſelfe reſtrained, by both of theſe Garriſons, and ſuch as came to relieue them. There he found them paſtime about two years more; hoping ſtill to wearie out thoſe that lay ouer his head, as they on the contrary did their beſt, to thruſt him out of thoſe quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent vnto the proſecuting of this buſineſſe at Eryx. Wherein it ſeemes true (as Hannibal, in Liuie, ſpake vnto Scipio) that the affaires of Carthage neuer ſtood in better termes, ſince the beginning of the warre, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had vtterly forſaken the Seas, partly by reaſon of their great loſſes; partly vpon confidence of their land-forces, which they held reſiſtleſſe; Amilcar; with a ſmall Armie, had ſo well acquited himſelfe, to the honour of his Country, that by the triall of fiue yeares warre, the Carthaginian Souldier was iudged equall, if not ſuperior to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had beene deuiſed and gone, for the diſlodging of this obſtinate Warriour: no way ſeemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once againe to build a fleet; wherby, if the maſtrie of the Sea could once bee gotten; it was likely that Amilcar, for lacke of ſupply, ſhould not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extreme difficulty was found. The common treaſurie was exhauſted: and the coſt was not little, that was requiſite vnto ſuch an enterpriſe. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden vpon priuate purſes. Diuers of the principall Citizens vndertooke to build (each at his owne charges) one Quinquereme, which example wrought ſo well, that they, whoſe abilitie would not ſerue to doe the like, ioyned with ſome others, and laying their mony together, concurred two or three of them, in building of another; with condition to be repaied, when the war was finiſhed. By this voluntary contribution, they made and finiſhed two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their paterne, that excellent ſwift rowing Gallie which they had gotten from the Rhodian, in the Port of Lilybæum, as was ſhewed before. The charge of this fleet was committed to C. Lutatius Catulus; who paſt with the ſame into Sicil, the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drepanum, indeauouring by all meanes to haue forced the Citie. But being aduertiſed that the Carthaginian fleete was at hand, and being mindefull of the late loſſes which his Predeceſſours had receiued; he was carefull to put himſelfe in order, againſt their arriuall.

Liu. Dec. 3. l. 1.

Hanno was Admiral of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wiſe in picture, exceedingly formall, and skilfull in the art of ſeeming reuerend. How his reputation was firſt bred, I doe not finde; but it was vp-held by a factious contradiction, of things vndertaken by men more worthy than himſelfe. This qualitie procured vnto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the ancient ſort, whoſe cold temper is auerſe from new enterpriſes, and therewithall an opinion of great foreſight, confirmed by euery loſſe receiued. More particularly, he was gracious among the people, for that he was one of the moſt grieuous oppreſſors of their ſubiect Prouinces; whereby he procured vnto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithall ſuch hatred, as turned it all to their great loſſe. He had ere this beene imployed againſt the Numidians, and wilde Africans, that were more like to Rouers, than to Souldiers, in making Warre. Of thoſe fugitiue Nations, he learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his owne great diſhonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which loſt not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counſaile, when, hauing ſhewed himſelfe an vnworthy Captaine, he betooke himſelfe to the long Robe. Yet is he much commended in Roman Hiſtories, as a temperate man, and one that ſtudied how to preſerue the League betweene Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well hee deſerued of his owne Countrie, it will appeare hereafter: how beneficiall he was to the Romans, it will appeare, both hereafter, and in his preſent voyage; wherein hee reduced the Carthaginians to a miſerable neceſſitie of accepting, vpon hard conditions, that peace which hee thence-forth commended.

Hanno had very well furniſhed his Nauie, with all needfull prouiſions for the Souldiers at Eryx: (for dexteritie in making preparation was the beſt of his qualities) but he had had neither beene carefull in trayning his Mariners, to the practice of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with ſtout fellowes. He thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian fleet was enough, to make the vnexpert Romans giue way: forgetting, that rather the reſiſtleſſe force of tempeſts, than any other ſtrength of oppoſition, had made them to forſake the Seas. Yet in one thing he had either conceiued aright, or elſe was ſent forth wel inſtructed. It was his purpoſe, firſt of all to ſaile to Eryx, and there to diſcharge his ſhips of their lading: and haning thus lightned himſelfe, he meant to take aboord ſome part of the Land-armie, together with Amilcar himſelfe, by whoſe helpe he doubted not, but that he ſhould be able to make his enemie repent of his new aduenture to Sea. This was a good courſe, if it could haue beene performed. But Catulus vſed all poſſible diligence, to preuent the execution of this deſigne: not becauſe he was informed of the enemies purpoſe, but that he knew it to be the beſt for them, & for that he feared no danger ſo greatly, as to encounter with Amilcar. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the ſeas went high, when the Carthaginian fleet was diſcried; yet he rather choſe to fight with the enemie, that had the winde of him, than to ſuffer his conuoy to paſſe along to Eryx, vpon vnlikely hope of better oportunity in the future. All that Hanno ſhould haue done, Catulus had performed. He had carefully exerciſed his men in Rowing; he had lightned his Gallies of all vnneceſſarie burthens; and he had taken aboord the choyce men of the Roman Land-ſouldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the firſt encounter, were vtterly broken and defeated; hauing fiftie of their Gallies ſtemmed and ſunke, and ſeuentie taken, wherein were few leſſe than ten thouſand men, that were all made priſoners: the reſt, by a ſudden change of winde, eſcaping to the Ile of Hieroneſis.

The ſtate of Carthage, vtterly diſcouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to reſolue. Meanes to repaire their fleete in any time there were none left; their beſt men of warre by Sea were conſumed; and Amilcar, vpon whoſe valour, and iudgement the honour and ſafetie of the Common-weale reſted, was now ſurrounded by his enemies in Sicil, where hee could not bee relieued. In this extremitie, they make diſpatch vnto Amilcar himſelfe, and authorize him to take what courſe ſhould ſeeme beſt vnto his excellent wiſedome; leauing all concluſions to his election and ſole counſaile.

Amilcar, whom no aduerſitie, accompanied with the leaſt hope or poſſibilitie of recouerie, had euer vanquiſhed, looking ouer euery promiſe, true or falſe, that the preſent time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future hee was not able) reſolued to make tryall, whether his neceſsitie might bee compounded vpon any reaſonable tearmes. Hee therefore ſent to Lutatius the Conſull an Ouerture of peace: who conſidering it well, gathered ſo many arguments from the preſent poueꝛtie of the Roman State, waſted beyond expectation in the former warre, that hee willingly harkened vnto it. So, in concluſion, an accord was made, but with prouiſion, That it ſhould hold none otherwiſe, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allowance.

The conditions were: Firſt, that the Carthaginians ſhould clearely abandon the Iſle of Sicil. Secondly, that they ſhould neuer vnder-take vpon Hieron King of Syracuſe, nor inuade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they ſhould ſet at libertie, and ſend backe into Italie, all the Romans, whom they held priſoners, without ranſome. Laſtly, that they ſhould pay vnto the Romans two thouſand and two hundred talents; which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirteene hundred and twenty thouſand crownes: the ſame to be deliuered within twentie yeeres next following.

Theſe Articles were ſent to Rome, where they were not throughly approued: but ten Commiſsioners were ſent into Sicil, to make perfect the agreement. Theſe Commiſsioners added a thouſand talents to the former ſum; & required a ſhorter time of paiment. Further alſo, they tooke order, that the Carthaginians ſhould not onely depart out of Sicil it ſelfe, but ſhould alſo with-draw their Companies out of all other Ilands betweene it and Italie, renouncing their whole intereſt therein.

Such was the end of the firſt Punick warre, that had laſted about twentie foure yeares without intermiſsion; in which time the Romans had loſt, by fight or ſhipwracke, about ſeuen hundred Quinqueremes; and the Carthaginians, about fiue hundred: the greatneſſe of which loſſes, doth ſerue to prooue the greatneſſe both of theſe two Cities, and of

of the Warre it selfe; wherein I hold good the iudgement of Polybius; That the Romans, in generall, did shew themselues the brauer Nation; and Amilcar, the most worthie Captaine.

Chap. II.

Of diuers actions passing betweene the first and second Punick Warres.

§. I.

Of the cruell Warre begun betweene the Carthaginians and their owne Mercenaries.

THE Romans hauing partly by force, and partly by composition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicil, and all the little Ilands thereunto adiacent, gaue them rather meanes and leisure to helpe themselues in a following Warre, than cause to hold themselues contented with the present peace. It is an ancient and true rule, Quod leges à victoribus dicuntur, accipiuntur à victis; That lawes are giuen by the Conquerours, and receiued of the conquered. But the Romanes had either forgotten the answer that was made vnto them, by one of the Priuernates; or else had forgotten to follow it, in this weightie businesse. For when one of Priuernum, after a rebellion, defending in the Senate the cause of his Citie, was demanded by a Senator, what peace the Romanes might hope for, or assure themselues of, if they quitted their present aduantage ouer them; hee answered in these words, Si bonam dederitis, & fidam & perpetuam; si malam, haud diuturnam; If the peace bee good and faithfull that you giue vs, it will be perpetuall; if it bee ill, then of little continuance. To this answer, the Senate, at that time, gaue such approbation, that it was said, Viri & liberi vocem audiuisse; an credi posse, vllum populum, aut hominem denique, in ea conditione, cuius cum pœniteat, diutius quàm necesse sit mansurum? That it was the speech of a manly, and a free man; for who could beleeue, that any people, or indeed any one man, would continue longer in an ouer-burdenous estate, than meere necessitie did enforce? Now if the Romans themselues could make this iudgement, of those Nations, who had little else, besides their manly resolution, to defend their libertie; surely, they grossly flattered themselues, in presuming, that the Carthaginians, who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferiour vnto themselues, would sit downe any longer by the losse and dishonour receiued, than vntill they could recouer their legges, and the strength, which had a while failed them, to take reuenge. But Occasion, by whom (while well entertained) not onely priuate men, but Kingand publique States, haue more preuailed, than by any proper prowesse or vertue, with held the tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most fearefully vpon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselues.

For after that the first Punick War was ended, Amilcar, leauing Eryx, went to Lilybæum, from whence most conuenientlie the Armie might be transported into Africk: the care of which businesse he committed vnto Gesco, to whom, as to a man of approued sufficiencie, he deliuered ouer his charge. Gesco had an especiall consideration of the great summes, wherein Carthage was indebted vnto these Mercenaries; and, withall, of the great inability to make payment. Therefore he thought it the wisest way, to send them ouer (as it were) by handfulls, a few at a time, that so the first might haue their dispatch, and be gone, ere the second or third Companies arriued. Herein hee dealt prouidently. For it had not been hard to perswade any small number, lodged within so great a Citie as Carthage, vnto some such reasonable composition, as the present emptinesse of the common Treasurie did require: so that the first might haue beene friendly discharged, and a good president left vnto the second and third, whilest their distinction had made them them vnable to recouer their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrarie opinion. They thought to finde, in the whole Armie, some that would bee contented to gratifie the Publique State, by remitting a great part of their owne due: and hoped by such an example, to draw all the multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detained the first and second commers; telling them, that they would make an euen reckoning with all together. Thus euery day the number increased, and many disorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much disquieted the Citie, not accustomed vnto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remoue them all to some other place where they might be lesse troublesome. This must bee done by some colourable words of perswasion: for their number was already so great, that it was not safe to offend them too farre. Wherefore it is deuised, that they should all attend the comming of their fellowes, at Sicca: receiuing euery one a piece of gold, to beare his charges in the meane while.

This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers began to dislodge; leauing behinde them their wiues, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning shortly to fetch away all, when they came backe for their pay. But the Carthaginians haue no fancie to their returning into the Towne; and therefore compell them to trusse vp their fardells, that they might haue none occasion left to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they remooued, with all their goods; and there lay waiting for newes of their fellowes arriuall, and their owne pay. Businesse they had none to do, and therefore might easily be drawne to mutinie: the whole argument of their discourse inclining them to nothing else. Their daily talke was, how rich they should bee, when all their money came in; how much would fall to euery single share; and for how long time the Citie was behinde hand with them in reckoning. They were all growne Arithmeticians; and hee was thought a man of worth, that could finde most reason to increase their demands, to the very highest, euen beyond their due. No part of their long seruice was forgotten; but the comfortable words and promises of their Captaines, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to minde, and so many obligations, not to be cancelled, without satisfying their expectation by some vnordinarie largesse.

Thus the time passeth away; vntill the whole Armie being arriued, and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to cleare the accompt. Now is the day come, wherein they shall all be made rich; especially if they can hold together, in maintaining stoutly the common cause. So thinke they all; and assemble themselues to heare what good newes this messenger had brought; with a full resolution to help his memorie, in case he should happen to forget any part of the many promises made to them; all which were to bee considered in their Donatiue. Hanno begins a very formall Oration; wherin he bewailes the pouertie of Carthage; tells them, how great a summe of money is to be paid vnto the Romans; reckons vp the excessiue charges, whereat the common-wealth had beene in the late warre; and finally desires them to hold themselues contented with part of their pay, and out of the loue which they bare vnto the Citie, to remit the rest. Few of them vnderstood his discourse: for the Carthaginian Armie was composed of sundry Nations, as Greekes, Africans, Gaules, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others, all of different languages. Yet they stared vpon him, and were (as I thinke) little pleased with his very gesture. But when such, as conceiued the whole tenor of his speech, had informed the rest what cold comfort he brought; they were all enraged, and fared like mad-men, so that nothing would serue to appease them.

Hanno would faine haue asswaged their furie, but he knew not how: for hee lesse vnderstood their dissonant lowd noyses, than they did his Oration. An Armie collected out of so many Countries, that haue no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easily stirred vp to mutinie, nor easily pacified, when once it is broken into outrage. The best that Hanno can doe, is to vse the helpe of Interpreters and messengers. But these Interpreters mistake his meaning; some, for want of skill; others of set purpose; and such as deliuer his errands in the worst sense, are best beleeued. Finally, they thinke themselues much abused by the Carthaginians, and resolue to demand their owne in peremptorie termes, at a neerer distance. In this mood they leaue Sicca, and march as farre as Tunis, that is within a very little of Carthage, and there they incampe.

Now begin the Carthaginians to finde their owne errour. It is a good rule,

Cunctan-

Curandum imprimis, ne magna iniuria fiat
Fortibus & miseris.

Haue speciall care, that valiant pouertie
Be not oppreſt with too great iniurie.

But this proud citie, hauing neglected the rule, hath alſo beene careleſſe in prouiding to ſecure her ſelfe againſt the inconuenience that might follow. Shee had ſuffered the whole multitude, whereunto ſhe was like to giue cauſe of diſcontent, to ioyne it ſelfe into one bodie, when the ſeuerall troupes might eaſily haue beene diſperſed: ſhee hath thruſted out of her gates the wiues, children, and goods of theſe poore men, which had ſhe retained in ſhew of kindneſſe, ſhe might haue vſed them as Hoſtages, for her own ſafety; and by imploying a miſerable pennie-father, in her negotiation with men of Warre, ſhe hath weakened the reputation of her braueſt Captaines, that might beſt haue ſerued to free her from the threatning danger. Yet likely it is, that Amilcar had no deſire to be vſed as an inſtrument in defrauding his owne Souldiers of their wages: eſpecially conſidering, that as he beſt could beare witneſſe of their merits, ſo was he not ignorant, that meanes to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had beene willing thereunto. Hereunto may be added a probable coniecture, that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemie to Amilcar, had the boldneſſe to impoſe the blame of his owne wretched counſaile, vpon the liberall promiſes made by the Captaines. Amilcar therefore did wiſely, in ſuffering thoſe that maligned him, to haue the managing of their owne plot, and to deale the cardes which themſelues had ſhuffled. This they continue to do as fooliſhly, as they had at firſt begun. They furniſh a market at Tunis for the ſouldiours; whom they ſuffer to buy what they liſt, and at what price they liſt. They ſend euer and anon ſome of their Senatours into the Campe; who promiſe to ſatisfie all demands, as farre forth as it ſhould be poſſible. And thus by ſhifting from one extreame to another, they make the Souldiours vnderſtand, into what feare the Citie was driuen; which cannot chooſe but adde much inſolencie to the paſſions already ſtirred vp.

This ſudden change of weather, and the true cauſe of it, is quickly found by the Army, which thereupon growes wiſe, and finding the ſeaſon fit, labors to make a great harueſt. Money muſt be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many haue loſt their horſes, in publique ſeruice of the State. The State ſhall pay for them. They had liued ſome yeares, by making hard ſhift, without receiuing their allowance of victualls from Carthage. If they had liued, they wanted not meat; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one, whether the ſhips did bring in prouiſion, or their Captaine direct them where to fetch it? But this would not ſerue. They ſaid that they had beene ſometimes driuen to buy; and that (ſince they could not remember, how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their prouiſion, during the whole time, and according to the deareſt price that wheat had borne, whileſt the Warre laſted. Such are now the demands of theſe Mutiners; who might eaſily haue beene ſatisfied with farre leſſe charges, and farre more honour, by receiuing their due at the firſt. But now they make none end of crauing. For whileſt the Carthaginians are perplexed about this Corn-monie, the Souldiers haue deuiſed many more tricks, wherby to extorta greater ſum of money, without all regard of ſhame. Since therefore no good end could bee found of theſe controuerſies which daily did multiply, it was thought conuenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had cõmanded in Sicil, ſhould be choſen by the Souldiers, to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Armie condeſcended, and made choiſe of Geſco; partly out of good liking to him, who had ſhewed himſelfe at all times a friendly man to them, and carefull of their good, eſpecially when they were to be tranſported into Africke: partly out of a diſlike which they had conceiued of Amilcar; for that hee had not viſited them in all this buſie time. So Geſco comes among them; and, to pleaſe them the better, comes not without money: which might giue better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. Hee calls vnto him firſt of all, the Captaines, and then, the ſeuerall Nations apart; rebuking them gently for that which had paſſed, aduiſing them temperately concerning the preſent, and exhorting them to continue their loue vnto the State, which had long entertained ned them, and would needs alwaies be mindefull of their good seruices. After this he began to put hand to his purse: offering to giue them their whole pay in hand; and then after to consider of other reckonings at a more conuenient time. This had beene well accepted, and might haue serued to bring all to a quiet passe; if two seditious ring-leaders of the multitude had not stood against it.

There was in the Campe one Spendius, a sturdie fellow, and audacious, but a slaue; that in the late war had fled from a Roman whom hee serued, and therefore stood in feare, lest he should be deliuered backe to his Master, at whose handes he could expect no lesse, than to be whipt and crucified. This wretch could finde no better way to prolong his owne life, than by raising such troubles as might serue to with-draw men from care of priuate matters, and make his owne restitution impossible, were his Master neuer so importunate. With Spendius there associated himselfe one Matho, an hote-headed man, that had beene so forward in stirring vp the tumult, as he could not choose but feare, lest his owne death should be made an example, to deterre others from the like seditious behauiour. This Matho deales with his Countrimen the Africans, telling them, that they were in farre worse condition, than either the Gaules, the Greekes, the Spaniards, or any forreyne mercenaries. For (saith he) these our companions haue no more to doe, than to receiue their wages, and so get them gone: but wee, that are to stay behinde in Africa, shall be called to another manner of accompt, when we are left alone; so that wee shall haue cause to wish, that we had returned home beggars, rather than loaden with the monie, which (little thinke it be) shall breake our backes. Yee are not ignorant, how tyrannically those our haughty Masters of Carthage doe reigne ouer vs. They thinke it reasonable, that our liues and goods should lie at their disposition, which they haue at other times beene accustomed to take from vs, euen without apparant cause, as it were to declare their Soueraigntie: what will they now doe, seeing that we haue demeaned our selues as free men, and been bold to set a good face on the matter, hauing our owne, as others haue done? Yee all doe know, that it were a very shame for vs, if hauing beene as forward in euery danger of warre, as any other men, wee should now stand crouching like slaues, and not dare to open our mouthes, when others take libertie to require their due. This notwithstanding yee may assure your selues, that we are like to be taught better manners, as soone as our fellowes are gone: in regard of whom they are content to shadow their indignation with a good, but a forced countenance. Let vs therefore be wise; and consider, that they hate and feare vs. Their hatred will shew it selfe, when their feare is once past: vnlesse we now take our time, and, whilest we are the stronger, enfeeble them so greatly, that their hand shall not be able to doe vs wrong. All their strength consisteth in money, wherewithall they haue hired others against vs, and vs against others. At the present they haue neither money nor friends. The best Armie that euer serued them, whereof we are no small part, lieth at their gates, ready to helpe vs if we be men. A better opportunitie cannot be expected: for were our swords once drawne, all Africk would rise on our side. As for the Carthaginians, whither can they send for helpe? The case it selfe is plaine: but wee must quickly resolue. Either we must preuent the diligence of Gesco, by incensing these Gaules and Spaniards, and procuring them to draw bloud; or else it behoueth vs to please our good masters, by ioyning with them against our fellowes, yea by offering to forgiue vnto them all our wages, if so (peraduenture) they may be wonne to forgiue vs, or not ouer-cruellie to punish our faults committed. He is most worthily a wretched slaue, that neither hath care to winne his Masters loue, nor the courage to attempt his owne libertie.

By such perswasions Matho winnes the African souldiers to his owne purpose. They are not now so greedy of money, as of quarrell; which he that seeketh, will not misse to finde. When Gesco therefore offered to pay them their whole stipend presently, but referred their other demands, for horses and victuals, to some other more conuenient time; they breake into great outrage, and say that they will haue all, euen all at once, and that out of hand. In this tumult, the whole Armie flocke together about Matho, and Spendius; whose diligence is not wanting, to adde more fuell to the fire already blazing. Matho and Spendius are the onely men to whom the souldiers will hearken: if any other stand vp to make a speech, a showre of stones, flying about his eares, puts him to silence, that he shall neuer afterwards speake word more. Neither stay they to consider what it is that any man would say: enough hath beene said already by those good spokesmen; so that no other word (though perhaps to the same purpose) can be heard, saue onely Throw, throw.

Now

Now the Rebellion begins to take forme. Mathos and Spendius are chosen Captaines; who, followed by a desperate crue of Ruffians, will suffer no man to make his owne peace, but pursue their owne ends, vnder faire pretence of the common cause. All which notwithstanding, Gesco is not wanting to be good of his countrie, but aduenteures himselfe vpon their furie. One while he deales with the Captaines, and other principall men, taking them by the hand, and giuing gentle words: another while he workes with the seuerall Nations, putting them all in hope of their owne harts desire, if any reason would content them. None of them are so sullen as the Africans: indeed none of them had so good cause. They require him peremptorily, to giue them their owne, and not to feed them with words. The truth is, that they are not so couetous as they seeme: but will be more glad of an ill answer, than of a good payment. This is more than Gesco knowes: he sees not that Mathos hath any more than bare words to bestow vpon them. Wherefore, rebuking their inconsiderate heat, he tells them, That they may doe well if they stand in want of money, to seeke it of their Captaine, Mathos. This is enough. Shall he both defraud them and deride them? They stay no longer, but lay violent hands vpon the treasure that he had brought, yea vpon him also, and all that are with him: as intending to take this in part of payment, and, for the rest, to take another course. Mathos and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleased them to see their fellowes begin to grow calme by his faire language: wherefore they cast into bonds both him, and all the Carthaginians that they can finde; that so the Armie may be freed from danger of gentium aemulationem, which they call Treason. After this followes open warre. Mathos sollicites all Africk, and his Embassadors are every where well entertained. Neither is it needfull to vse persuasion: the very fame of this rebellion sufficeth to draw the whole countrie into it. Now must the Carthaginians be plagued for those oppressions, with which they haue plagued others. It is true that aduersitie hath neuer beene vntold of her errours: and as she is neuer assured to heare her owne, so commonly with her owne she vndergoes those of other men. The Africans finding the Carthaginians hang vnder the wheele, tell them all that their Impositions were mercilesse, that they took from them the one halfe of their corne; that they doubled their tributes in all things else; and that they inflicted vpon their vassals the greatest punishment for the least offences. These cruelties the Carthaginians themselues haue forgotten: but the people, that haue suffered so much, retain a perfect memorie. Wherefore not onely such as can beare Armes, are ready to doe seruice in this great Commotion; but the very women bring forth their Iewels, and other ornaments, offering all to sale for the maintenance of so iust a quarrell. By this great forwardnesse, and liberall contribution, Mathos and Spendius are supplied with a strong armie of threescore and ten thousand Africans: and are moreouer furnished with money, not only to satisfie the present appetite of their men, but sufficient to continue the warre, though it should be of long endurance.

§. II.

Diuers obseruations vpon this warre with the mercenaries.

†. I.

Of Tyrannie, and how Tyrants are faine to vse the helpe of mercenaries.

HEere let vs rest a while, as in a conuenient place, whence we may take a prospect of the subiect, ouer which we trauaile. Behold a tyrannicall City persecuted by her owne mercenaries with a deadly warre. It is a common thing, as beforehand not vnfit, that a tyrannie should be vpheld by mercenarie forces: it is common that mercenaries should be false: and it is common that all warre made against Tyrants should be raging, full of hate and cruelty. Yet we seldome heare, that euer the name of a tyrannie is procured or sought by those that were hired to maintaine the power of it: and seldome or neuer do we read of any warre that hath been prosecuted with such irreconcilable hatred, as this that is now in hand. If warre, which we properly call Tyrannie, is, A violent seruing of good commons, by reuelling vpon the substance, but without the good will of the Commons. I purposely forbeare to say, that the truest glosse of one obscure word doth shine in Thucydides tell the

the Athenians, that their dominion ouer their subiects, was none other than a meere tyrannie; though it were so, that they themselues were a great Citie, and a popular estate. Neither is it peraduenture greatly needfull, that I should call this forme of commanding, violent: since it may well and easily be conceiued, that no man willingly performes obedience, to one regardlesse of his life and welfare; vnlesse himselfe be either a mad man, or (which is little better) wholly possessed with some extreme passion of loue. The practice of tyrannie, is not alwaies of a like extremitie: for some Lords are more gentle, than others, to their very slaues; and he that is most cruell to some, is milde enough towards others, though it be but for his owne aduantage. Neuertheless, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers discretion cannot extend it selfe, vnto notice of the difference which might be found between the worth of seuerall men; it is commonly seene, that the taste of sweetnesse, drawne out of oppression, hath so good a relish, as commonly inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not suffer it to be restrained with any limits of respect. Why should he seeke out bounds to prescribe vnto his desires, who cannot endure the face of one so honest, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? it is much that he hath gotten, by extorting from some few: by sparing none, he should haue riches in goodly abundance. He hath taken a great deale from euery one: but euery one could haue spared more. He hath wrung all their purses, & now he hath enough: but (as Couetousnesse is neuer satisfied) he thinkes that all this is too little for a stocke, though it were indeed a good yeerely In-come. Therfore he deuiseth new tricks of robberie and is not better pleased with the gaines, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this, and he knowes it well: but he thinkes by cruelty to change hatred into feare. So he makes it his exercise, to torment and murder all, whom he suspecteth: in which course, if he suspect none vniustly, he may be said to deale craftily; but if Innocency be not safe, how can all this make any Conspiratour to stand in feare, since the Traitor is no worse rewarded, than the quiet man? Wherefore he can thinke vpon none other security, than to dis-arme all his Subiects; to fortifie himselfe within some strong place; and for defence of his Person and state, to hire as many lustie Souldiers as shall bee thought sufficient. These must not be of his owne Countrie: for if not euery one, yet some one or other may chance to haue a feeling of the publique miserie. This considered, he allures vnto him a desperate rabble of strangers, the most vnhonest that can be found, such as haue neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be carefull to support him, by whose onely fauour they are maintained. Now lest any of these, either by detestation of his wickednesse, or (which in wicked men is most likely) by promise of greater reward, than he doth giue, should bee drawne to turne his sword against the Tyrant himselfe: they shall all be permitted to doe as he doth; to robbe, to rauish, to murder, and to satisfie their owne appetites, in most outragious manner; being thought so much the more assured to their Master, by how much the more he sees them grow hatefull to all men else. Considering in what age, and in what Language I write; I must be faine to say, that these are not dreames: though some Englishman perhaps that were vnacquainted with Historie, lighting vpon this leafe, might suppose this discourse to be but little better. This is to shew, both how tyrannie growes to stand in need of mercenarie Souldiers, and how those Mercenaries are, by mutuall obligation, firmely assured vnto the Tyrant.

§. II.

That the tyrannie of a Citie ouer her Subiects is worse, than the tyrannie of one man: and a tyrannicall Citie must likewise vse mercenary Souldiers.

NOw concerning the tyrannie, wherewith a Citie or State oppresseth her Subiects; it may appeare some waies to be more moderate, than that of one man: but in many things it is more intolerable. A Citie is iealous of her Dominion, but not (as is one man) fearefull of her life: the lesse need hath she therefore, to secure her selfe by cruelty. A Citie is not luxurious in consuming her treasures, and therefore needs the lesse, to plucke from her Subiects. If warre, or any other great occasion, driue her to necessitie, of taking from her Subiects more than ordinarie summes of money: the same necessitie makes either the contribution easie, or the taking excusable. Indeed no wrongs are so grieuous & hatefull, as those that are insolent, [illegible] (saith Cicero) the Iniquitie to his Grand-mother (Eurynia) that I may do what I list, and be whom I list: theſe words were accounted horrible, though hee did her no harme. And Tacitus reckons it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruell Roman Dame vpon her ſlaues, that while ſhe was whipping them, ſhe painted her face, talked with her Goſſips, and vſed all ſignes of neglecting what thoſe wretches felt. Now ſeeing that the greateſt grieuances wherewith a domineering State offendeth her Subiects, are free from all ſenſe of indignitie: likely it is, that they will not extreamely hate her, although deſire of liberty make them wearie of her Empire. In theſe reſpects it is not needfull, that ſhe ſhould keepe a Guard of licentious cut-throats, and maintaine them in all villany, as a Dionyſius or Agathocles muſt doe: her owne Citizens are able to terrifie, and to hold perforce in obedience, all diſcale-contents. Theſe things, conſidered alone by themſelues, may ſerue to proue, That a Citie is ſcarce able to deſerue the name of a Tyranneſſe, in the proper ſignification.

Notwithſtanding, it ſhall appeare, that the miſeries, wherewith a Tyrant loadeth his people, are not ſo heauie, as the burdens impoſed by a cruell Citie. Not withſtanding ſome appearance of truth, it may be ſaid, that Luſt, and many other priuate paſſions, are euery incident to a City or Corporation. But to make this good, wee ſhall haue need to vſe the helpe of ſuch diſtinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome infamous, when Cato was faine to riſe and leaue the Theater, to the end, that the reuerend regard of his grauity, might not hinder the people, from calling for a ſhew of naked Courtizans, that were to be brought vpon the open ſtage? By common profeſſion and generall approued cuſtome, we are to cenſure the quality of a whole State; not by the priuate vertue or vice of any one man; not by metaphyſicall abſtraction of diuiſion all from the ſingular, or of the Corporation, from thoſe of whom it is compoſed. I ſay therefore (as I haue ſaid elſewhere) That it were better to liue vnder one periurious Tyrant, than vnder many thouſands. The reaſons proouing this, are too many to ſet downe: but few may ſuffice. The deſires of one man, how inordinate ſoeuer, if they cannot be ſatisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to ſearch all corners, his humour may be found, and ſoothed; age or good aduice, yea, or ſome vnexpected accident may reforme him: all which failing, yet is there hope, that his ſucceſſour may proouе better.

Many Tyrants haue beene changed into worthy Kings: and many haue ill vſed their ill-gotten Dominion, which becomming hereditary to their poſterity, hath grown into the moſt excellent forme of Gouernment, euen a lawfull Monarchy. But they that liue vnder a tyrannicall Citie, haue no ſuch hopes: their Miſtreſſe is immortall, and will not loſen the reines, vntill they be pulled out of her hands, and her owne mouth receiue the bridle of a more mightier Charioteer. This is wofull; yet their preſent ſufferings make them leſſe mindefull of the future. New flies, and hungry ones, fall vpon the ſame ſoare, of which, others had already ſucked their fill. A new Gouernor comes yearely among them, attended by all his poore kindred and friends, who meane not to returne home empty to their hiues, without a good lading of waxe and honey. Theſe flie into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with euery mans wealth, or whatſoeuer elſe, in all the Prouince, is worthy to be deſired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his feares: becomming themſelues, within a little ſpace, the enemies that he feareth moſt. To grow into acquaintance with theſe maſterfull gueſts, in hope to win their friendſhip, were an endleſſe labour (yet it muſt be vndergone) and ſuch as euery one hath not meanes to goe about: but were this effected, what auaileth it? The loue of one Gouernour is purchaſed with gifts: the Succeſſor of this man, he is more louing than could be wiſhed, in reſpect of faire Wife or Daughter: then comes the third, perhaps of the contrary faction at home, a bitter enemy to both his fore-goers, who ſeekes the ruine of all that haue beene imployed with them. So the miſeries of this tyranny are not ſimple, but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of ciuill warre. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or, Of Iuſtice, againſt extorting Magiſtrates: yet wee finde, that it ſerued not wholly to reſtraine their Prouinciall Gouernours; who preſuming on the fauour of their owne Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold in their Prouinces, to worke all thoſe enormities rehearſed, though ſomewhat the more ſparingly, for feare of impeachment. If the ſubiects of Rome groned vnder ſuch oppreſſions, what muſt we thinke of thoſe that were vaſſals vnto Carthage? The Romans impoſed no burthenſome tributes, they loued not to heare, that their Empire was grieuous, they condemned many noble Citizens, for hauing beene ill Gouernours. At Carthage all were quits comparatiue: the tapines newly deuised by one Magistrate, serued as Presidents to instruct another, euery man resolued to doe the like, when it should fall to his turne; and hee was held a notable Statesman, whose robberies had been such, as might afoord a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practice, are not extant: the gouernment of Verres the Roman in Sicil, that is liuely set out by Tullie, may serue to informe vs, what was the demeanour of these Punick Rulers, who stood in feare of no such condemnation, as Verres vnder-went. By prosecuting this discourse, I might inferre a more generall Proposition, That a Citie cannot gouerne her subiect Prouinces so mildely, as a King: but it is enough to haue shewed, That the tyranny of a Citie is farre more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

Sutable to the crueltie of such Lords, is the hatred of their subiects: and againe, sutable to the hatred of the subiects, is the iealousie of their Lords. Hence it followed, that, in warres abroad, the Carthaginians durst vse the seruice of African souldiers, in Africk it selfe, they had rather be beholding to others, that were farther fetcht. For the same purpose did Hannibal, in the second Punick warre, shift his mercenaries out of their own Countries; Vt Afri in Hispania, Hispani in Africa, melior prouisi ab domo futuri essent; milites, velut mutuis pignoribus obligatis stipendio sacrarent. That the Africans might serue in Spaine, the Spaniards in Affrick, being each of them like to proue the better Souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were obliged by mutuall pledges. It is disputable, I confesse, whether these African and Spanish hirelings, could properly be termed Mercenaries: for they were subiect vnto Carthage, and carried into the field, not onely by reward, but by dutie. Yet seeing their dutie was no better than enforced, and that it was not any loue to the State, but meere desire of gaine, that made them fight; I will not nicely stand vpon proprietie of a word, but hold them, as Polybius also doth, no better than Mercenaries.

§. III.

The dangers growing from the vse of Mercenarie Souldiers, and forraine Auxiliaries.

THe extreame danger, growing from the imploiment of such Souldiers, is well obserued by Machiauel: who sheweth, that they are more terrible to those whom they serue, than to those against whom they serue. They are seditious, vnfaithfull, disobedient, deuourers, and destroiers of all places and countries, wherein to they are diuine, as being held by no other bond, than their owne commoditie. Yea, that which is most fearefull among such hirelings, is, that they haue often, & in time of greatest extremity, not onely refused to fight, in their defence, who haue entertained them, but reuolted vnto the contrarie part, to the vtter ruine of those Princes and States, that haue trusted them. These Mercenaries (saith Machiauel) which filled all Italie, when Charles the eight of France did passe the Alpes, were the cause that the said French King won the Realme of Naples, with his Buckler without a sword. Notable was the example of Sforza, the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan, who being entertained by Queene Ioane of Naples, abandoned her seruice on the sudden, and forced her to put herselfe into the hands of the King of Aragon. Like vnto his father was Francis Sforza, the first of that race Duke of Millan, who being entertained by the Millanois, forced them to become his slaues, euen with the very same Armie which themselues had leuied for their owne defence. But Ludouick Sforza, the sonne of this Francis, by the iust iudgement of God, was made a memorable example vnto posteritie, in losing his whole estate by the treacherie of such faithlesse Mercenaries, as his owne Father had beene. For, hauing waged an Armie of Switzers, and committed his Dutchie, together with his person, into their hands, hee was by them deliuered vp vnto his enemie the French King, by whom he was inclosed in the Castle of Loches vnto his dying day.

The like inconuenience is found, in vsing the helpe of forreigne Auxiliaries. Wee see, that when the Emperor of Constantinople had hired ten thousand Turks against his neighbour Princes; hee could neuer, either by perswasion or force, set them againe ouer the sea vpon Asia side: which gaue beginning to the Christian seruitude, that soone after followed.

followed. Alexander, the sonne of Cassander, sought aide of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdome, slue the same Alexander, who had inuited him, and made himselfe King of Macedon. Syracon the Turke was called into Egypt by Semar the Soldan, against his Opposite: but this Turke did settle himselfe so surely in Egypt, that Saladine his successor became Lord thereof; and of all the holy Land, soone after. What need we looke about for examples of this kinde? Euery Kingdome, in effect, can furnish vs. The Britaines drew the Saxons into this our Countrie; and Mac Murrough drew the English into Ireland, but the one and the other soone became Lords of those two Kingdomes.

Against all this may be alledged, the good successe of the vnited Prouinces of the Netherlands, vsing none other than such kinde of Souldiers, in their late warre. Indeed these Low countries haue many goodly & strong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthie, industrious, and valiant in their kinde. They are stout Sea-men, and therein is their excellencie; neither are they bad, at the defence of a place well fortified: but in open field they haue seldome been able to stand against the Spaniard. Necessity therefore compelled them to seeke help abroad: and the like necessitie made them forbeare to arme any great numbers of their owne. For, with money raised by their Trade, they maintained the Warre: and therefore could ill spare vnto the Pike and Musket, those hands, that were of more vse in helping to fill the common purse. Yet what of this? they sped wel. Surely they sped as ill as might be, whilest they had none other than mercenarie souldiers. Many fruitlesse attempts, made by the Prince of Orange, can witnesse it: and that braue Commander, Count Lodowicke of Nassau, felt to his griefe, in his retrait from Groeningham; when in the very instant, that required their seruice in fight, his mercenaries cried out aloud for money, and so ranne away. This was not the onely time, when the hired souldiers of the States, haue either sought to hide their cowardize vnder a shew of greedinesse; or at least, by meere couetousnesse, haue ruined in one houre the labour of many moneths. I will not stand to proue this by many examples: for they themselues will not deny it. Neither would I touch the honour of Monsieur the Duke of Anjou, brother to the French King; saue that it is folly to conceale what all the world knowes. He that would lay open the danger of forraine Auxiliaries, needeth no better patterne. It is commonly found, that such Aiders make themselues Lords ouer those, to whom they lend their succour: but where shall vve meet with such another as this Monsieur, who, for his protection promised, beeing rewarded with the Lordship of the Countrie, made it his first worke, to thrust by violence a galling yoke vpon the peoples necke? Well, he liued to repent it, vvith griefe enough. Euen whilest he vvas counterfeiting vnto those about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginarie sorrow for the poore Burghers of Antwerpe, as verily beleeuing the Towne to be surprized and wonne; the death of the Count S. Aignan, who fell ouer the wall, and the Cannon of the Citie, discharged against his owne troupes, informed him better what had hapened; shewing that they were his own French, who stood in need of pitty. Then was his feigned passion changed, into a very bitter anguish of minde; vvherein, smiting his breast, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Helas, mon Dieu, que veulx tu faire de moy; Alas, my God, what wilt thou doe with me? So the affaires of the Netherlands will not serue to proue, that there is little danger in vsing mercenarie souldiers, or the helpe of forraine Auxiliaries. This notwithstanding, they were obedient vnto necessitie, and sought helpe of the English, Scots, and French: wherein they did wisely, and prospered. For when there was in France a king, partaker with them in the same danger; when the Queen of England refused to accept the Soueraignty of their Country, which they offered, yet being prouoked by the Spaniard their enemy, pursued him with continuall war; when the heire of England reigned in Scotland, a king too iust & wise (though not ingaged in any quarrell) either to make profit of his Neighbours miseries, or to help those that had attempted the conquest of his ovvn inheritance: then might the Netherlanders very safely repose confidence, in the forces of these their neighbour-countries. The souldiers that came vnto them from hence, were (to omit any other commendations) not onely regardfull of the pay that they should receiue; but well affected vnto the cause that they took in hand: or if any were cold in his deuotion, vnto the side vvherevnto he fought; yet was he kept in order, by remembrance of his owne home, vvhere the English would haue rewarded him with death, if that his faith had beene corrupted by the Spaniard. They were therfore trusted with the custodie of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the necessitie of the poorer sort was relieued, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helpes, as well as the abilitie of the States could permit. When three such Princes, reigning at one time, shall agree so well, to maintaine against the power of a fourth, iniurious (or at least so seeming) to them all, a Neighbour-Countrie, of the same Religion, and to which they all are louingly affected: then may such a Countrie be secure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other businesse, in hope of like successe. But these circumstances meet so seldome, as it may well hold true in generall: That mercenarie, and forraigne auxiliarie forces, are no lesse dangerous, than the enemie, against whom they are entertained.

†. IIII.

That the moderate gouernment of the Romans gaue them assurance to vse the seruice of their owne subiects in their warres. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyrannie, which hindreth the vse and benefit of the like moderation.

HEre it may be demanded, whether also the Romans were not compelled to vse seruice of other souldiers in their many great warres, but performed all by their owne Citizens? for if it were their manner to arme their owne subiects; how happened it, that they feared no rebellion? if strangers; how then could they auoid the inconueniences aboue rehearsed? The answere is, That their Armies were compounded vsually of their owne citizens, and of the Latines, in equall number: to which they added, as occasion required, some companies of Campanes, Hetrurians, Samnites, or other of their subiects, as were either interessed in the quarrell, or might best be trusted. They had, about these times (though seldome they did imploy so many,) ten Romane Legions; a good strength, if all other helpe had beene wanting: which serued to keepe in good order their subiects, that were alwaies fewer in the Army than themselues. As for the Latines, if consanguinitie were not a sufficient obligation; yet many priuiledges and immunities, which they inioyed, made them assured vnto the State of Rome: vnder which they liued almost at libertie, as being bound to little else, than to serue it in warre. It is true, that a yoke, how easie soeuer, seemes troublesome to the necke that hath been accustomed to freedome. Therefore many people of Italie haue taken occasion of seuerall aduantages, to deliuer themselues from the Roman subiection. But still they haue been reclaimed by Warre; the Authors of rebellion haue sharply bin punished; and the people by degrees haue obtained such libertie, as made them esteeme none otherwise of Rome, than as the common citie of all Italie. Yea, in processe of time it was granted vnto many Cities, and those farre off remooued, euen to Tarsus in Cilicia, where Saint Paul was borne, That all the Burgesses should be free of Rome it selfe. This fauour was conferred absolutely vpon some; vpon some, with restraint of giuing voice in election of Magistrates, or with other such limitation, as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great conquest, to release vnto their new subiects halfe of their tribute which they had been wont to pay vnto their former Lords, which was a ready way, to bring the multitude into good liking of their present condition; when the reuiew of harder times past, should rather teach them to feare a relapse, than to hope for better in the future, by seeking innouation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a speciall note of the Romans good gouernment, That when some, for their well-deseruing, haue had the offer to be made Citizens of Rome; they haue refused it, & held themselues better contented with their owne present estate. Wherefore it is no maruell, that Petellia, a Citie of the Brutians in Italie, chose rather to indure all extremitie of warre, than, vpon any condition, to forsake the Romans; euen when the Romans themselues had confessed, that they were vnable to helpe these their subiects, and therfore willed them to looke to their owne good, as hauing been faithfull to the vtmost. Such loue purchased these milde Gouernours, without impairing their Maiesty therby. The summe of all is: They had, of their own, a strong Armie; they doubled it, by adioyning therunto the Latines; and they further increased it, as need required, with other helpe of their own subiects: all, or the most of their followers, accounting the prosperity of Rome to be the common good.

Liu. Dec. 3. l. 3.

Ibidem.

The moderate vse of soueraigne power being so effectuall, in assuring the people vnto

vnto their Lords, and consequently, in the establishment or enlargement of Dominion. It may seeme strange, that the practice of tyrannie, whose effects are contrary, hath been so common in all ages. The like, I know, may be said of all Vice and Irregularity whatsoeuer. For it is lesse difficult, (whosoeuer thinke otherwise) and more safe, to keepe the way of Iustice and Honestie, than to turne aside from it; yet commonly our passions doe lead vs into by-paths. But where Lust, Anger, Feare, or any the like Affection, seduceth our reason; the same vnruly appetite either bringeth with it an excuse, or at least-wise taketh away all cause of wonder. In tyrannie it is not so: for as much as we can hardly descry the passion, that is of force to insinuate it selfe into the whole tenour of a Gouernment. It must be confessed, that lawlesse desires haue bred many Tyrants: yet so, that these desires haue seldome bin hereditary, or long-lasting; but haue ended commonly with the Tyrants life, sometimes before his death; by which meanes the gouernment hath bin reduced to a better forme. In such cases, the saying of Aristotle holds, That tyrannies are of a short continuance. But this doth not satisfie the question in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exercise Tyrannie? Why did the Athenians? Why haue many other Cities done the like? If in respect of their generall good; how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill course for the safetie of the Weale publique? If they were ledde hereunto by any affection; what was that affection wherein so many thousand Citizens, diuided and subdiuided within themselues by factions, did all concurre, notwithstanding the much diuersitie of temper, and the vehemencie of priuate hatred among them? Doubtlesse, we must be faine to say, That Tyrannie is, by it selfe, a Vice distinct from others. A Man, we know, is Animal politicum, apt euen by Nature, to command, or to obey; euery one in his proper degree. Other desires of Mankinde, are common likewise vnto bruit beasts; and some of them, to bodies wanting sense: but the desire of rule belongeth vnto the nobler part of reason; whereunto is also answerable an aptnesse to yeeld obedience. Now as hunger and thirst are giuen by nature, not onely to Man and Beast, but vnto all sorts of Vegetables, for the sustentation of their life: as Feare, Anger, Lust, and other affections are likewise naturall, in conuenient measure, both vnto Mankinde, and to all creatures that haue sense; for the shunning or repelling of harme, and seeking after that which is requisite: euen so is this desire of ruling or obeying, ingraffed by Nature in the race of Man, and in Man onely as a reasonable creature, for the ordering of his life, in a ciuill forme of Iustice. All these in-bred qualities are good and vsefull. Neuertheless, Hunger and Thirst are the Parents of Gluttony and Druukennesse, which, in reproach, are called beastly, by an vnproper terme: since they grow from appetites, found in lesse worthy creatures than beasts, and are yet not so common in beasts, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of such other Passions, as descend no lower than vnto bruit beasts, are held lesse vile; & perhaps not without good reason: yet are they more horrible, and punished more grieuously, by sharper Lawes, as being in generall more pernicious. But as no corruption is worse, than of that which is best; there is not any Passion, that nourisheth a vice more hurtfull vnto Mankinde, than that which issueth from the most noble roote, euen the depraued Affection of ruling. Hence arise those two great mischiefes, of which hath been an old question in dispute, whether be the worse; That all things, or That nothing should be lawfull. Of these, a dull spirit, and ouer-loaden by fortune, with power, whereof it is not capable, occasioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrary distemper, whose vehemency the bounds of Reason cannot limit. Vnder the extremity of either, no Country is able to subsist: yet the defectiue dulnesse, that permitteth any thing, will also permit the execution of Law, to which, meere necessity doth inforce the ordinarie Magistrate; whereas Tyrannie is more actiue, and pleaseth it selfe in the excesse, with a false colour of iustice. Examples of stupiditie, and vnaptnesse to rule, are not very frequent, though such natures are euery where to be found: for this quality troubles not it selfe in seeking Empire; or if by some errour of fortune, it incounter therewithall, (as when Claudius, hiding himselfe in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) some friend or else a wife, is not wanting to supply the defect, which also crueltie doth helpe to shadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing vnknowne, is without a name. Tyrannie is more bold, and feareth not to be knowne, but would be reputed honourable: for it is prosperum & felix scelus, a fortunate mischiefe, as long as it can subsist. There is no reward or honour (saith Peter Charron) assigned vnto those, that know how to increase, or preserue humane nature: all honours, greatnesse, riches, dignities, empires, triumphs, trophees, are appointed for those, that know how to afflict, trouble, and destroy it. Cæsar and Alexander, haue vn-made and slaine, each of them, more then a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behinde them. Such is the errour of blind iudgement, in valuing things according to the common opinion. But the true name of Tyranny, when it growes to ripenesse, is none other, than Feritie; the fame that Aristotle saith to bee worse than any vice. It exceedeth indeed all other vices, arising from the passions incident both to Man and Beast; no lesse than Perfurie, Murder, Treason, and the like horrible crimes, exceed in villanie, the faults of Gluttony & Drunkennesse, that grow from more ignoble appetites. Hereof Sciron, Procrustes, and other campes, that vsed their bodily force to the destruction of Mankinde, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Dionysius and Agathocles, whose mischieuous heads were affected by the hands of detestable Ruffians. The same barbarous desire of Lordship, transported those old examples of Feritie, and these latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of reason: neither of them knew the vse of Rule, nor the difference between Freemen and slaues.

The rule of the husband ouer the wife, and of parents ouer their children, is naturall, and appointed by God himselfe; so that it is alwaies, and simply, allowable and good. The former of these, is as the dominion of Reason ouer Appetite; the latter is the whole authoritie, which one Free man can haue ouer another. The rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father ouer his whole countrie: which he that knows what the power of a Father is, or ought to be, knowes to be enough. But there is a greater, and more Masterly rule, which God gaue vnto Adam, when hee said; Haue dominion ouer the fish of the Sea, and ouer the fowle of the aire; and euery liuing thing that moueth vpon the earth: which also he continueth vnto Noah, and his children, saying, The feare of you, and the dread of you, shall be vpon euery beast of the earth, and vpon euery fowle of the aire, vpon all that moueth vpon the earth, and vpon all the fishes of the Sea; into your hands are they deliuered. He who gaue this dominion vnto Man, did giue also an aptitude to vse it. The execution of this power hath since extended it selfe, ouer a very great part of Mankinde. There are indeed no small numbers of men, whose disabilitie to gouerne themselues, proues them, according vnto Aristotles doctrine, to be naturally slaues.

Ari.Pol.l.1.c.3.

Yet finde I not in Scripture any warrant, to oppresse men with bondage: vnlesse the lawfulnesse thereof be sufficiently intimated, where it is said, That a man shall not be punished for the death of a seruant, whom he hath slaine by correction, if the seruant liue a day or two, because he is his money; or else by the captiuity of the Midianitish girls, which were made bond-slaues, and the Sanctuary had a part of them for the Lords tribute. Doubtlesse the custome hath been very ancient: for Noah laid this curse vpon Canaan, that he should be a seruant of seruants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, men-seruants and maid-seruants, which were none other than slaues. Christian Religion is said to haue abrogated this old kinde of seruilitie: but surely, they are deceiued that thinke so. Saint Paul desired the libertie of Onesimus, whom he had wonne vnto Christ: yet wrote for this vnto Philemon, by way of request, crauing it as a benefit, not vrging it as a dutie. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the same Saint Paul giueth vnto seruants: Let euery man abide in the same calling wherein he was called: art thou called, being a seruant? care not for it, but if thou maist be made free, vse it rather. It is true, that Christian religion hath procured libertie vnto many; not onely in regard of pietie, but for that the Christian Masters stood in fear, of being discouered by their slaues, vnto the persecutors of religion. Mahomet likewise by giuing libertie to his followers, drew many vnto his impietie: but whether he forbade it, as vnlawfull, vnto his sectators, to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tel; saue that by the practice of the Turks and Moores, it seemes he did not. In England we had many bond-seruants, vntill the time of our last ciuill wars: and I think that the Lawes concerning Villenage are still in force, of which the latest are the sharpest. And now, since slaues were made free, which were of great vse and seruice, there are growne vp a rabble of Rogues, Cutpurses and other the like trades; slaues in Nature, though not in Law.

Exod.21.v.21. Num.30.v.40. Gen.9.25. Gen.12.v.16. Epist.to Phile. verse 14. 1.Cor.c.7.v.20. & 21.

But whether this kinde of dominion be lawfull, or not; Aristotle hath well prooued, that it is naturall. And certainly we finde not such a latitude of difference in any creature, [illegible] the nature of man: [illegible] in the [illegible] distance in estate of the [illegible] produce [illegible] extend the most foolish, by [illegible] greater degree, than the most [illegible] of men do [illegible] the wisest of beasts. Therefore when Consideration hath [illegible] we shall find [illegible] nature is the ground even of Masterly power, [illegible] obedience, [illegible] correspondent. But [illegible] may be truely said, that [illegible] countries have [illegible] long, without the vse of any seruitude: as also it is true, that [illegible] countrie hath none vse of any name called. Indeed the affections which vphold ciuill life, although more noble, yet so simply not dull, vnto the sustenation either of [illegible] as Lust, and the like; or of euery one, as are hunger and thirst, which notwithstanding are the lowest in degree. But where most vile, and seruile dispositions, haue liberty to shew themselues begging in the streets, there may we more fully wonder, how the dangerous life of sea-faring men can find enough to vndertake them, than how the number of idle vagabonds should increase, by accesse of those, that are weary of their own more painfull condition. This may suffice to proue, that in Mankind there is found, ingrafted both by Nature, a desire of absolute dominion: whereunto the generall estate of Nations doth subscribe; together with the pleasure which most men take in lookers, that are the baseſt of slaues.

This being so, we finde no cause to maruaile, how Tyranny hath been so rife in all ages, and practised, not only in the single rule of some vicious Prince, but euer by consent of whole Cities and Estates: since, other vices haue likewise gotten head, and borne a generall sway, notwithstanding that the way of vertue be more honorable, and commodious. Few there are that haue vsed well the inferiour Passions: how then can we expect, that the most noble affections should not be disordered? In the gouernment of wife and children, some are vtterly careless, and corrupt all by their dull connuencie: others, by masterly rigour, hold their owne bloud vnder condition of slauery. To be a good Gouernour is a rare commendation: and to prefer the Weale publike aboue all respects whatsoeuer, is the Vertue iustly termed Heroicall. Of this Vertue, many ages afford not many examples. Hector is named by Aristotle, as one of them; & deseruedly, if this praise be due to extraordinary height of fortitude, vsed in defence of a mans own countrie. But if we consider, that a loue of the generall good cannot be perfect, without reference vnto the fountaine of all goodnesse: we shall finde, that no morall vertue, how great soeuer, can, by it selfe, deserue the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Heroicall doth. Wherefore we must search the Scriptures, for patternes hereof; such as Dauid, Iosaphat, and Iosias were. Of Christian Kings, if there were many such, the world would soone be happy. It is not my purpose to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praise where it is due, or by preferring a lesse excellent. But he that can finde a King religious, and zealous in Gods cause, without inforcement either of aduersitie, or of some regard of state, a procurer of the generall peace and quiet; who not onely vseth his authoritie, but addes the trauell of his eloquence, in admonishing his Iudges to doe iustice; by the vigorous influence of whose Gouernment, ciuilitie is infused, euen into those places, that haue been the dens of sauage Robbers and Cut-throtes; one that hath quite abolished a slauish Brehon Law, by which an whole Nation of his subiects were held in bondage; and one, whose higher vertue & vvisedome doth make the praise not only of Nobility and other ornaments, but of abstinence from the bloud, the wiues, and the goods, of those that are vnder his power, together with a world of chiefe commendations belonging vnto some good Princes, to appear lesse regardable: he, I say, that can find such a King, findeth an example, worthy to adde vnto vertue an honourable title, if it were formerly wanting. Vnder such a King, it is likely by Gods blessing, that a Land shall flourish, with increase of Trade, in countries before vnknown; that Ciuility and Religion shall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen countries; and that the happinesse of his subiects, shall cause the Nations farre off remoued, to wish him their Soueraigne. I need not adde hereunto, that all the actions of such a King, euen his bodily exercises, doe partake of vertue; since all things tending to the preseruation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who, fixing his contemplation vpon God, seeketh how to imitate the vnspeakeable goodnesse, rather than the inaccessible maiestie, with both of which himselfe is indued, as farre as humane nature is capable) doe also belong to the furtherance of that common good, which he procureth. Lest any man should thinke me transported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bounds of reason; I adde

her runs, that such a King is euer the lesse a man, must die, and may erre: yea wisdome and fame shall set him free from error and from death both sinne and without the help of time. One thing I may not omit, as a singular benefit (though there be many other besides) redounding vnto his King, of the fruit of his good rule. The people that liue vnder a pleasant yoke, are not onely louing to their Soueraigne Lord, but full of courage, and no greater in muster of men, than of stout fighters, if need require. Whereas on the contrary, he that ruleth as ouer slaues, shall be attended in time of necessity, by slauish minded, neither louing his person, nor regarding his or their own honour. Cowards may be furious, and slaues outragious, for a time: but among spirits that haue once yeelded vnto slauery, vniuersally it is found true, that Homer saith, God beareth a mind of halfe his vertue, that day when he casteth him into bondage. Hom. Odyss. Lib. 17.

Of these things, I might perhaps more seasonably haue spoken, in the generall discourse of Gouernment: but where so liuely an example, of the calamity following a tyrannical rule, and the vse of mercenaries, thereupon depending, did offer it selfe, as is this present businesse of the Carthaginians, I thought that the note would be more effectuall, than being barely deliuered, as out of a common place.

§. III.

How the warre against the Mercenaries was diuersly managed by Hanno and Amilcar, with variable successe. The bloudy counsailes of the Mercenaries, and their finall destruction.

BEing now to returne vnto those Mercenaries, from whom I haue thus farre digressed, I cannot readily finde, by what name henceforth I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; neither care they to pretend, that they seeke their wages already due; so that they are neither Mercenaries, nor Mutiners. Had they all beene subiects vnto Carthage, then might they iustly haue been termed Rebels: but Spendius, and others, that were the principall part of them, ought none allegeance to that State, which they endeuored to subuert. Wherefore I will borrow the name of their late occupation, and still call them Mercenaries, as Polybius also doth.

These vsing the aduantage of their present strength, besieged *Vtica, and Hippagreta, Cities of great importance, as being seated vpon the western Hauen of Carthage, where it is diuided by a neck of land; Hippagreta standing inwards vpon the great Lake, Vtica further out vpon the Sea. Neither was the Campe at Tunes abandoned, which lay filthy to hinder the Carthaginians, from passing vp into the countrie: for Matho and Spendius wanted not men, to follow the war in all parts at once.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this vnexpected perill, any man may conceiue. But the businesse it selfe awakes them hastily. They are hardly prest on all sides; & therefore trauailed their braines to the vttermost, how to shake off these furious dogs from their shoulders, who sometimes by night, sometimes by day, came vnto the very wals of their Citie. In this exigent, Hanno was made their generall: who failed not in his accustomed diligence of making al good preparation: but had gotten together whatsoeuer was needfull, as well to relieue a Town besieged, as to batter and assaile any place defended against him. With these prouisions, and with an hundred Elephants, he came to Vtica, so suddenly, that the enemies as men surprised, forsook their Trenches, and retired themselues vnto a rising piece of woody ground, where they might be safe against the violence of his beasts. Hanno, thinking that he had to doe with Numidians, whose custome was, after any losse, to flie two or three whole daies iourny off; presently entred the Town, to shew himselfe, after this his victory. But these good fellowes, against whom he was to war, had learned of Amilcar, to retire and to fight againe, many times in one day, as need required. Therefore as soon as they perceiued, that he knew not how to vse a victory; they assailed their own Camp, and with great slaughter, draue the Carthaginians out of it, forcing them to hide themselues within Vtia; and got possession of all the store, that Hanno had brought for the reliefe of the Towne. This bad beginning Hanno followed with sutable indiscretion: losing the benefit of many faire opportunities, and suffering the enemies to take possession of all the entrance from Carthage to the firme land.

*Vtica is seated in the great Bay, that enters towards Carthage, not farre within the Promontorie of Apollo. At this time it is called Porto Farina, or Biserta, & by the Africans themselues, Garel Melha. Niger saith, that the Towne it selfe is ruined, and the place, whereon it stood, now called Mazzachares. It was very ancient, and built before Carthage, saith Silius. As it florished before Carthage was set vp, so did it after Carthage was throwne down by the Romans in the third Punick Warre. Famous it was by the death of Cato the yonger, who held it against Cesar: Victor that worthy Diuine, was Bishop thereof in the time of Genseric the Arrian, who liued all the time of that Tyrant, and hath written the storie of his cruelties.

The

The Carthaginians perceiuing this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therfore let fall their ſhete-anchor; ſending to the field their great Captaine, Amilcar, whom they furniſhed with ten thouſand foot of ſupply, and ſeuenty Elephants. Amilcar had worke enough to doe, before he ſhould be able to meet with the enemy vpon equall ground. For beſides other places of aduantage that the Mercenaries had occupied, Hanno had ſuffered them to win the onely Bridge, by which the Riuer Macra, or Bagradas, was paſſable vnto theſe, that were to trauaile into the Continent. This riuer had not many foords, nor thoſe eaſie for a ſingle man to get ouer: but vpon them all was kept ſuch guard, as gaue to Amilcar little hope of preuailing in ſeeking way by force. As for the Bridge it ſelfe, Matho and his followers were there lodged: and had there built a Town, wherein to lye commodiouſly, intentiue onely to the cuſtody thereof. But Amilcar had obſerued, that the very mouth of Bagradas vſed to be ſometimes cloyed with ſand and grauell, that was driuen in by certaine cuſtomarie winds, and could not be driuen out againe, by force of that ſlow riuer, till the wind falling, or changing, ſuffered the weight of the waters, to disburden their channell. Hereof he made vſe; and taking his opportunitie, paſſed the Riuer, contrary to all expectation, either of the enemy, or of his owne Citizens.

There was no need to bid Spendius looke about him, when once it was heard, that Amilcar was come ouer Bagradas: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the newes; knowing that they were no longer to deale with the improuident grauity of Hanno, but with an able ſpirit, euen with their own Maſter in the Art of Warre, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this feare was ſoone changed into preſumption; when more than fifteen thouſand of their owne ſociety, were come from Vtica; and other ten thouſand from the guard of the Bridge. Their Armie was farre greater, than that of Amilcar; and they were, in their owne iudgement, the better men, vpon which confidence, they reſolued to charge him on all ſides, and beat him downe, in deſpight of his worth and reputation. With this reſolution they attended vpon him, watching for ſome aduantage, and ſtill exhorting one another to play the men, and giue the onſet. Eſpecially they that followed him in the Reare, had a great minde to begin the fight; whereunto their promptneſſe was ſuch, as tooke from them their former circumſpection. Amilcar held his way towards the Bridge, keeping himſelfe on plaine grounds, that were fittſt for the ſeruice of his Elephants, which he placed in front of his Armie. Neither made he ſhew of any deſire to fight, but ſuffered the raſhneſſe of his enemies to increaſe, till it ſhould breake into ſome diſorder. At length perceiuing, that with more boldneſſe than good heed, they followed him ſo neere, as would be little for their good, if he ſhould turne vpon them, he haſtened his march, euen to ſuch a pace, as made a ſhew little differing from plaine flight. The Mercenaries preſently fell vpon his ſkirts; beleeuing, that for feare of them he was ready to run away. But whileſt they confuſedly, as in ſudden opinion of victory, were driuen at the heeles of thoſe that had the Reare; Amilcar wheeled about; and met them in the face, charging them hotly, but in very good order, ſo that amazed with the apprehenſion of inexpected danger, they fled without making any reſiſtance. In this ouerthrow, there were ſixe thouſand of the Mercenaries ſlaine, and about two thouſand taken, the reſt fled, ſome to the Campe at Vtica, others to the town at the Bridge; whither Amilcar followed them ſo faſt, that he wan the place eaſily; the enemies being thence alſo fled vnto Tunes, as not hauing recollected their ſpirits to make it good.

The fame of this victory, together with the diligence of Amilcar in purſuing it, cauſed many Towns reuolted, partly by feare, partly by force, to return to their former obedience. Yet was not Matho wanting to himſelfe, in this dangerous time. He ſent about Numidia and Africk, for new ſupplies; admoniſhing the people, now or neuer to doe their beſt, for the recouery of their freedome; he perſwaded Spendius, and Autaritus, that was a Cptaine of the Gaules, to wait vpon Amilcar, and alwayes to keepe the higher grounds, or at leaſt the foot of ſome hill, where they might be ſafe from the Elephants; and he himſelfe continued to preſſe the Town of Hippagreta with an hard ſiege. It was neceſſary for Amilcar, in paſſing from place to place, as his buſineſſe required, to take ſuch wayes as there were: for all the country lay not leuell, Therefore Spendius, who ſtill coaſted him, had once gotten a notable aduantage of ground: the Carthaginians lying in a Plaine, ſurrounded with hils, that were occupied by the Mercenaries, with their Numidian

Numidian and African succours. In this difficultie, the fame of Amilcar his perſonall worth did greatly benefit his countrie. For Naraueſus, a young gentleman commanding ouer the Numidians, was glad of this occaſion ſeruing to get the acquaintance and loue of ſo braue a man, which he much deſired: and therefore came vnto Amilcar, ſignifying his good affection to him, with offer to doe him all ſeruice. Amilcar ioyfully entertained this friend, promiſed vnto him his own daughter in marriage, and ſo wan from the enemies two thouſand horſe, that following Naraueſus turned vnto the Carthaginians ſide. With this helpe he gaue battaile vnto Spendius: wherein the Numidian laboured to approue his own valour, to his new friend. So the victory was great: for there were ſlaine ten thouſand of Spendius his fellowes, and foure thouſand taken priſoners; but Spendius himſelfe, with Autarius the Gaule, eſcaped to doe more miſchiefe. Amilcar dealt very gently with his priſoners: pardoning all offences paſt, and diſmiſſing as many, as were vnwilling to become his followers; yet with condition, that they ſhould neuer more beare armes againſt the Carthaginians; threatning to take ſharpe reuenge vpon all, that ſhould breake this Couenant.

This humanitie was vehemently ſuſpected by Matho, Spendius, and Autarius, as tending to win from them, the hearts of their Souldiers. Wherefore they reſolued to take ſuch order, that not a man among them ſhould dare, to truſt in the good nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any ſafetie, whileſt Carthage was able to doe him hurt. They counterfeited letters of aduertiſement, wherein was contained, that ſome of their company, reſpectiue onely of their priuate benefit, & careleſſe of the generall good, had a purpoſe to betray them all vnto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; & that it was needfull, to look well vnto Geſco, & his companions, whom theſe traitors had a purpoſe to inlarge. Vpon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the Souldiers, exhorting them to fidelity; and ſhewing with many words, that the ſeeming humanity of Amilcar, toward ſome, was none other than a baite, wherewith to intrap them all at once together; as alſo telling them, what a dangerous enemy Geſco would proue, if he might eſcape their hands. While hee is yet in the midſt of his tale, were letters come, to the ſame purpoſe. Then ſteps forth Autarius, and ſpeakes his minde plainely: ſaying, that it were the beſt, yea the onely way, for the common ſafetie, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if ſome were deuiſing to make their owne peace, it would goe hard with thoſe that had a care of the war; that it were better to make an end of Geſco his life, than to trouble themſelues with looking to his cuſtody; that by ſuch a courſe euery one ſhould be ingaged in the preſent Action, as hauing none other hope left, than in victory alone; finally, that ſuch as would ſpeake here-againſt, were worthy to be reputed Traitours. This Autarius was in great credit vvith the ſouldiers, & could ſpeake ſundry languages, in ſuch ſort, that he was vnderſtood by all. According to his motion therfore it vvas agreed, that Geſco, and all the other priſoners, ſhould forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Neuertheleſſe there were ſome, that for loue of Geſco, ſought to alter his intended cruelty; but they were forthvvith ſtoned to death, as a Document vnto others; and ſo the Decree was put in execution. Neither vvere they therevvithall contented; but further ordained, that all Carthaginian priſoners which they tooke, ſhould be ſerued in like ſort: and that the ſubiects or friends of Carthage, ſhould loſe their hands, and ſo be ſent home: vvhich rule they obſerued euer afterwards.

Of this cruelty I need ſay no more, than that it vvas moſt execrable feritie. As for the counſaile of vſing it, it vvas like vnto the counſaile of Achitophel; All Iſrael ſhall heare, that thou art abhorred of thy father; then ſhall the hands of all that are with thee, be ſtrong. Such are the fruits of deſperation. He that is paſt all hope of pardon, is afraid of his owne fellowes, if they be more innocent; and to auoid the puniſhment of leſſe offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the reuengefull ſpirits of thoſe that haue been vvronged, are breeders of this deſperation: to vvhich may be added, ſome deficiencie of Lawes, in diſtinguiſhing the puniſhments of malefactors, according to the decree of their ſeuerall crimes. A coward thinkes all prouiſion too little for his owne ſecuritie. If Phocas be a coward (ſaid the Emperour Mauritius) then is he murderous. To be ſtedfaſt and ſure, in taking reuenge, is thought a point of honour, and a defenſatiue againſt new iniuries. But vvrongfully: for it is oppoſite to the rule of Chriſtianitie; and ſuch a qualitie diſcouered, makes them deadly enemies, who otherwiſe wise would haue repented, and sought to make amends for the wrong done in passion. This was it, which wrought so much woe to the Carthaginians, teaching Matho, and his Africans, to suspect euen their gentlenesse, as the introduction to extremerie rigour. Like vnto the errours of Princes & Gouernours, are the errours of Lawes. Where one and the same punishment is awarded vnto the lesse offence, and vnto the greater; he that hath aduentured to rob a man, is easily tempted to kill him, for his owne securitie.

Against these inconueniences, Mercy and Seueritie, vsed with due respect, are the best remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as these his owne souldiers were any way likely to be reclaimed, by gentle courses; his humanity was ready to winne them. But when they were transported with beastly outrage, beyond all regard of honestie and shame, he rewarded their villanie with answerable vengeance, casting them vnto wilde beasts, to be deuoured.

Whilst this time Hanno, with the Armie vnder his command, had kept himselfe aloofe from Amilcar, & done little, as may seeme, for that nothing is remembred of him, saue his late losses. Neither was Amilcar sorry to want his helpe, as being able to doe better without him. But when the warre grew to such extremitie, as threatned vtter ruine to the one or the other side: then was Hanno sent for, and came to Amilcar, with whom he ioyned his forces. By this accesse of strength Amilcar was not enabled, to doe more than in former times: rather he could now performe nothing; such was the hatred between him and his vnworthy Colleague. The Towns of Vtica and Hippagreta, that had stood all while fauourable on the Carthaginian party, did now reuolt vnto the enemy, murdering all the souldiers that they had in Garrison, and casting their bodies forth, without suffering them to be buried. The prouision brought by sea, for maintenance of the Armie, were lost in foule weather: and Carthage it selfe stood in danger of being besieged, about which Matho and Spendius consulted, whilest one of the Carthaginian Generals did lie ouerthrowen vnder the others hands.

It hath in all Ages beene vsed, as the safest course, to send forth in great Expeditions, two Generals of one Armie. This was the common practice of those two mighty Cities, Athens & Rome, which other States and Princes haue often imitated, perswading themselues, that great Armies are not so well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excel each other, will vse the greater diligence. They haue also ioyned two chiefe Commanders in equall commission, vpon this further consideration, the better to refraine the ambition of any one, that should be trusted with so great a strength. For hereof all Common-weales haue beene iealous, hauing beene taught by their examples that haue made themselues Tyrants ouer those Cities and States that haue imployed them. In this point the Venetians haue bin so circumspect, as they haue for the most part vsed strangers, and not their owne, in all the warres which they haue made. It is true, that the equall authoritie of two commanding in chiefe, serueth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning vpon the Prince or State that hath giuen them trust: but in managing the warre it selfe, it is commonly the cause of ill successe. In warres maidenlier vnto Rome it self, when two good friends were Consuls, or such two at least, as concurred in one desire of Triumph, which honor (the greatest of any that Rome could giue) vsed to be obtained by that one yeers seruice; it is no meruaile, though each of the Consuls did his best, and referred all his thoughts vnto none other end, then victory. Yea in dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise than was desired, one Dictator was appointed, whose power was neither bindred by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeed the manner, to send forth both the Consuls to one warre; but each went, whither his lot called him, to his owne Prouince; vnlesse some businesse seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be ioyned in the administration. Now although it was so, that the Romans did many times preuaile with their inyne Generals: yet was this neuer or seldome, without as much concord, as any of the vertue of the Commanders. For their modestie hath often beene such, that the lesse able Captaine, though of equall authority, hath willingly submitted himselfe to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they haue many times, by ordaining two Commanders of one Armie, receiued great and most dangerous ouerthrowes; whereof in the second Punick warre we shall finde examples. On the contrary side, in their warres most remote, that were alwaies managed by one, they seldome failed faire to win exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appeare. Now of those ten Generals, which serued the Athenians at the Battaile of Marathon, it may truely be said, that had not their temper beene better, than the iudgement of the people that sent them forth, and had not they submitted themselues to the conduction of Miltiades: their affaires had found the same successe which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicil: the one being so ouer-warie, and the other so hastie, as all came to nought that they vndertooke: whereas Cimon alone, as also Aristides, and others, finding sole charge of all, did their Country and Common-weale most remarkable seruice. For it is hard to finde two great Captaines, of equall discretion and valour; but that the one hath more of furie than of iudgement, and so the contrary, by which the best occasions are often ouerslipt, as at other times many actions are vnseasonably vndertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Condy was slaine after the Battaile of Iarnac, (which Prince, together with the Admiral Chastillon, had the conduct of the Protestant Armie) the Protestants did greatly bewaile the losse of the said Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth, yet comforting themselues, they thought it rather an aduantage, than an hinderance to their affaires. For so much did the valour of the one ouer-reach the aduisednesse of the other, as whatsoeuer the Admirall intended to winne by amending the aduantage, the Prince aduentured to lose, by being ouer-confident in his owne courage.

Hanno needed no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this present businesse: who, though they were still sicke of their ill-grounded loue to Hanno, and were vnwilling to dispatch him; yet seeing that all ranne towards ruine, through the discord of the Generall, committed the decision of their controuersies, vnto the Armie that serued vnder them. The iudgement of the Armie was, that Hanno should depart the Campe which he did, & Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilcar, and that was enough.

After this, the affaires of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better. Mathos & Spendius had brought their Armie neere vnto the Citie, and lay before it, as in a siege. They might well be bold, to hope and aduenture much, hauing in their Campe about fiue thousand, besides those that lay abroad in Garrisons. Neuertheless, the Citie was too strong for them to win by assault: and the entrance of victualls they could not hinder, if any should be sent in by friends from abroad.

Gelon, King of Syracuse, though during the warres in Sicil hee assisted the Romans, and still continued in their alliance, yet now sent succours to the Carthaginians: fearing their fall, and consequently his owne, because if no other State gaue the Romans some what to trouble their digestion, the Principalitie of Syracuse would soone be deuoured by them. The Romans also gaue them some slender assistance, and for the present refused good offers made vnto them by the Mercenaries. This they did, to shew a kinde of noble disposition, which was indeed but counterfeit, as the sequele manifestly proued.

Whilst Mathos and his followers were busily pressing the Citie, Amilcar was as diligent in warring at their backes, and cutting off all that came to their supply: so that finding themselues more streightly besieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purposed to desist from their vaine attempt, and try some other course. Hereupon they issue into the field: when Spendius, and one Zarcas an African Captaine, assisting the rebells, aduise vpon them to finde Amilcar worke, leauing Mathos in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a generall care of the businesse. The Elephants of Carthage, and horse of Naraffus, made Spendius fearefull to descend into the Plaines. Whereforе he betooke himselfe to his former method of warre, keeping the mountaines, and rough grounds, or occupying the streightest passages, wherein the desperate courage of his men might shew it selfe, with little disaduantage. But Amilcar had more skill in this Art, than could be matched by the labour of Spendius. He drew the enemy to many skirmishes, in all which the successe was such, as added courage to his owne men, and abated the strength and spirit of the Rebels. Thus he continued, prouoking them night and day: still intrapping some of them, and sometimes giuing them the ouerthrow in plaine battaile: vntill at length he got them into a streight, whence (as they should get out) he meant to take of them a good account. Their iudgement was enough to perceiue their owne disaduantage: and therefore they had the losse stomached so fight; but a waiting for helpe from Tunis. Amilcar prudently foreſeeing, that neceſſity might teach them, to dare impoſſibilities, vſed the benefit of their preſent feare, and ſhut them cloſe vp with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miſerably for ſuccour, that came not: and hauing ſpent all their victualls, were ſo pinched with hunger, that they fed vpon the bodies of their priſoners. This they ſuffred patiently, as knowing that they had not deſerued any fauour from Carthage: and hoping, that their friends at Tunis would not be vnmindfull of them. But when they were driuen to ſuch extremitie, that they were faine to deuoure their own companions, and yet ſaw none appearance or likelihood of reliefe: their obſtinacie was broken, and they threatned their Captaines with what they deſerued, vnleſſe they would goe forth to Amilcar, and ſeeke ſuch peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zarxas, and Autaritus, fell to conſultation, wherein it was reſolued to obey the multitude, and yeeld themſelues, if it were ſo required, vnto the death, rather than periſh by the hands of their owne Companions. Hereupon they ſend to craue parle, which is granted; and theſe three come forth to talke with Amilcar in perſon. What they could ſay vnto him, it is hard to coniecture: yet by the conditions which Amilcar granted, it ſeemes that they tooke the blame vpon themſelues, and craued pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians ſhould chooſe, out of the whole number of theſe enemies, any ten whom they pleaſed, to remaine at their diſcretion; and that the reſt ſhould all be diſmiſſed, each in his ſhirt, or in one ſingle coate. When the peace was thus concluded; Amilcar told theſe Ringleaders, that he choſe them preſently, as part of the ten, & ſo commanded to lay hands on them: the reſt he forthwith went to fetch with his whole Armie in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded vpon ſo gentle articles, thought themſelues betrayed: and therefore amazedly ran to armes. But they wanted Captaines to order them; and the ſame aſtoniſhment, that made them breake the Couenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gaue vnto Amilcar both colour of iuſtice, in accompliſhing reuenge, and eaſe in doing the execution. They were all ſlaine: being fortie thouſand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: and the newes thereof, exceeding welcome to Carthage; and terrible to the reuolted Cities of Africke. Henceforward Amilcar, with his Naraua-ſu, and Hannibal, carried the warre from Towne to Towne, and found all places ready to yeeld: Vtica, and Hippagreta, onely ſtanding out, vpon feare of deſerued vengeance; and Tunis, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Armie. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chiefe ſtrength of the enemie. Comming before this Towne, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellowes, in view of the defendants, and crucified them vnder the wals; to terrifie thoſe of his old companions, that were ſtill in armes. With this rigour the ſiege began; as if ſpeedy victory had beene aſſured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis, which lay towards Carthage; Amilcar on the oppoſite ſide: too far aſunder to helpe one another in ſudden accidents; and therfore it behoued each, to be the more circumſpect.

Matho from the wals beheld his owne deſtinie, in the miſery of his companion, and knew not how to auoide it otherwiſe than by a caſt at dice with fortune. So hee brake out vpon that part of the Carthaginian Armie, that lay ſecure, as if all danger were paſt; vnder the command of Hannibal: and with ſo great and vnexpected furie he ſallied, that after an exceeding ſlaughter, he tooke Hannibal priſoner; on vvhom, and thirtie the moſt noble of the Carthaginian priſoners, he preſently reuenged the death of Spendius by the ſame torture. Of this Amilcar knew nothing, till it was to late; neither had he ſtrength enough remaining, after this great loſſe, to continue the ſiege, but vvas faine to breake it vp, and remoue vnto the mouth of the Riuer Bagradas, where he incamped.

The terrour was no leſſe within Carthage, vpon the fame of this loſſe; than had beene the ioy of the late great victory. All that could beare armes, were ſent into the field, vnder Hanno; vvhom, it ſeemes, they thought the moſt able of their Captaines ſuruiuing the late accidents of Warre. If there were any Law among them, forbidding the imployment of one ſole Generall, neere vnto their Citie (for they are knowne to haue truſted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this haſtie exigent, to deuiſe about repealing it. But thirty principal men are choſen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilcars campe, by all good perſwaſions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. It neerely touched Amilcar in his honour, that the careleſneſſe of Hannibal ſeemed to be imputed vnto him, by ſending his enemy to moderate his proceedings. Neuertheleſſe after many conferences, the authority of the Senators preuailed; Amilcar and Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whileſt this war laſted, Hanno tooke warning by Hannibals calamities, to follow good directions, though afterwards he returned to his old and deadly hatred.

In the meane ſeaſon Matho was come abroad, as meaning to vſe the reputation of his late ſucceſſe, whileſt it gaue ſome life vnto his buſineſſe. He had reaſon to doe as he did: but he wanted skill to deale with Amilcar. The skirmiſhes, and light exerciſes of warre, wherein Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did ſo farre abate the ſtrength, and withall diminiſh the credit of Matho; that he reſolued to try the fortune of one battaile: wherein either his owne deſire ſhould be accompliſhed, or his cares ended. To this concluſion the Carthaginians were no leſſe prone, than Matho: as being weary of theſe long troubles, and inſupportable expences; confident in the valour of their owne men, which had approued it ſelfe in many trials; and well aſſured of Amilcar his great worth, whereunto the enemie hath not what to oppoſe. According to this determination, each part was diligent in making prouiſion: inuiting their friends to helpe; and drawing forth into the field, all that lay in Garriſon.

The iſſue of this battaile might haue beene foretold, without helpe of witchcraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whereon to preſume, ſaue their daring ſpirits, which had bin well cooled by the many late skirmiſhes, wherein they had learned how to run away. The Carthaginians had reaſon to dare, as hauing beene often victorious: and in all points elſe they had the better of their enemies; eſpecially (which is worth all the reſt) they had ſuch a Commander, as was not eaſily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely, that the deſire of liberty ſhould worke ſo much, in men accuſtomed to ſeruitude; as the honour of their State would, in Citizens, whoſe future & preſent good lay all at once ingaged in that aduenture. So the Carthaginians wan a great victory, wherein moſt of the Africans their enemies were ſlaine; the reſt fled into a Towne, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yeelded; and Matho himſelfe was taken aliue. Immediatly vpon this victory, all the Africans that had rebelled, made ſubmiſſion to their old maſters: Vtica only, and Hippagreta ſtood out, as knowing how little they deſerued of fauour. But they were ſoone forced, to take what conditions beſt pleaſed the victours. Matho and his fellowes were led to Carthage in triumph; where they ſuffered all torments that could be deuiſed, in recompence of the miſchiefes which they had wrought in this warre. The war had laſted three yeares, and about foure moneths, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians, whoſe ſubiects did not loue them, ſhould with leſſe expence, by contenting their Mercenaries, haue preuented in the beginning.

§. IIII.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driuen out by the Romans. The faithleſſe dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrary to the peace.

WHileſt Matho & Spendius were making terrible combuſtion in Africke; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: where murdering Boſtar the Gouernour, & other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Iland to their own vſe. Againſt theſe, one Hanno was ſent with a ſmall Armie (ſuch as could be ſpared in that buſie time) conſiſting likewiſe of Mercenaries, leuied on the ſudden. But theſe companions that followed Hanno, finding it more for their ſafety, and preſent profit, to ioyne themſelues with thoſe that were already reuolted, than to indanger themſelues by battaile, for the good of that common-weale, of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the Sardinian Rebels, offering to ruine one courſe of fortune with them in their enterpriſe. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith vvas ſuſpected. Wherefore, to take away all iealouſie and diſtruſt, they reſolued to hang vp their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practice it hath beene in all Ages, with thoſe that haue vndertaken the quarrell of an vniuſt warre, to enioyne the performance of ſome notorious and villainous act, to those that come in to them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to assist the impious purposes which they haue in hand. It is indeede the best pawne, that desperate men can deliuer to each other, to performe some such actions, as are equally unpardonable to all.

By such a kinde of crueltie did the vngratefull Mantineans murder a Garrison of Achaians, sent vnto them for their defence against the Lacedemonians, by Aratus; who, when he had formerly possest himselfe of their Citie, by right of warr, did not onely spare the sacke and spoyle therof, but gaue them equall freedome, with the rest of the Cities vnited. These Reuolts are also common in our Court wars; where, in the conquests of new fortunes, and making of new parties, and factions, without the depression or destructions of old friends, we cannot be receiued and trusted by old enemies. Ce sont les coups de vieille escrime. These, (say the French) be the blowes of the old art of fencing.

These Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit lesse violent in their purpose, than were Spendius and his associates: only they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Prouince. The Ilanders were no lesse glad, than the souldiours, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Countrie: but they could not agree about the profit of the victory. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the souldiours for their paines taken. Contrariwise, the souldiours were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Ile, was deuolued vnto themselues, by right of conquest. The same quarrell would (in likelihood) haue risen, between Spendius with his Mercenaries, & their African friends; if the common desire of both had once taken effect; vnto whe the riches of Carthage had serued to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Countrie; the matter was not easily taken vp. So they fell to blowes; which how they were deale, I know not; but finally, the Mercenaries were driuen out, and compelled to saue themselues in Italie. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had inuited the Romans into it; with as good right, as the Mamertines had called them into Sicil. Yet this offer was refused, vpon reasons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had relieued Matho and Spendius with corne: of whom the Carthaginians tooke almost fiue hundred, and held them in prison. Hereof was made a great complaint: so that the Romans sent Embassadours to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly yeelded to release them all. This was so kindely taken, that they forbad all their Merchants, to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carry all prouisions to Carthage. And vpon the same reason did they forbeare to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the Citie of Pisa, offering it selfe vnto their subiection. This might haue serued, as a notable example of the Roman faith, to all posteritie: had not the issue proued, that it was meere regard of greater profit, which kept them so temperate, no longer than the hope lasted of thriuing better thereby, than they should haue done by open breach of faith. The whole estate of Carthage depended at that time, vpon the vertue of Amilcar: who had he bin ouerthrown by Spendius or Matho, in one maine battaile, that mighty Citie must either haue fallen into the barbarous hands of mercilesse villaines, or haue humbled her selfe vnder protection of the Romans, with whom she had lately striuen for superioritie. That extreame necessitie, whereinto Matho reduced the Citie, by the fortune of one sallie made out of Tunis, is enough to proue, that Carthage, was not far from such a miserable choyce. Wherefore it was not vnwisely done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindnesse, and honourable dealing, as might inuite a rich, but sinking ship, to runne her selfe aground vpon their shore. But when all was well ended in Africke, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recouery of Sardinia; then did Ambition put off her goodly vizour. The Romans perceiuing that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recouered her feet againe, began to strike at her head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced warr against this enfeebled and impouerished Citie, vnder a shameless pretence, that the preparations made for Sardinia, were made indeede against Rome it selfe. The Carthaginians knew themselues vnable to resist; and therefore yeelded to the Romans demand; renouncing vnto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would haue twelue hundred talents, in recompence belike (for I see not what reason they could alleadge) of the great feare which they had endured, of an inuasion from Carthage. It is indeede plaine, that they impudently sought occasion of vvarre. But necessity taught the Carthaginians patience; and the mony vvas paied, how hardly soeuer it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complaine of the Punick faith, in breach of Couenants: she her selfe hath broken the peace already, which Amilcar purposeth to make her dearly repent; but what Amilcar liues not to performe, shall be accomplished by Hannibal his renowned sonne.

§. V.

How the affaires of Carthage went betweene the African Rebellion, and the second Punicke Warre.

THe iniurious dealing of the Romans, expressing their desire to picke a quarrell, serued to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessarie lesson; That either they must make themselues the stronger, or else resolue to be obedient vnto those that were more mighty. In a Citie long accustomed to rule, the brauer determination easily took place: and the best meanes were thought vpon, for the increase of puissance & Empire. The strength, and the iealousie of the Romans, forbad all attempts vpon the Mediterran seas; but the riches of Spaine, that lay vpon the Ocean, were vnknown to Rome: wherefore that Prouince might serue, both to exercise the Carthaginians in war, and to repaire their decaied forces, vvith all needefull supplies. Of the Spanish Expedition, the charge and souereigne trust was commited vnto Amilcar: vpon whom his Country did wholly repose it selfe; in hope to recouer strength by his means, that had saued it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other enuious men that were of his faction, tooke little pleasure in the generall loue and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not denie him to be the most worthy of command in all the Citie: onely they commended peace and quietnesse; aduising men to beware of prouoking the Romans, in whose amity they said, that the felicity of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the eares of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common-weale; they got none other reputation, than of singularity: which the ignorant sort suspected to be wisedome.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually vpheld & enlarged, by many notable seruices that he did, to the singular benefit of his Country. He passed the Streights of Hercules, (now called the Streights of Gibraltar) and landed on the westerne coasts of Spaine; in which Country, during nine yeares that he liued there, he subiected vnto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Prouinces. But finally, in a battaile that he fought with a Nation in Portugale, called the Vettones, (defending himselfe a long time with an admirable resolution) he was inuironed and slaine: carrying with him to the graue the same great honour and fame, by which in many signall victories, he had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar, Asdrubal his son in law vvas made Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spaine. This was a good man of vvarre; but farre better in practice and cunning than in deedes of armes. By his notable dexteritie in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding so many subiects and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow iealous againe of this hastie increase. He built a goodly Citie, vpon a commodious Hauen, in the Kingdome of Granada, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gaue it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it neerely retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this successe of the Carthaginians in Spaine, the Romans were not a little troubled; but began to cause their owne negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much paines to beate them out of the Ile of Sicil, as suspecting their neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbring themselues in a warre of farre lesse importance, (whereof I shall speake anon) giuen them leysure, without interruption, to recouer vpon their owne Continent, a Dominion by far exceeding, both in the bodies of men and in reuenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to helpe this, at the present they knew not; for they daily expected to be inuaded by the Gaules, their ancient enemies, and neerest neighbours to the West. But he needeth little helpe of force, that knoweth himselfe to

to be feared: it is enough if he requeſt, ſince his requeſt ſhall haue the vertue of a command.

Yet were the Romans vtterly deſtitute of all good colour, that might helpe them to intermeddle in Spaine. The Spaniards were then vnacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they ſcarce had heard the name: ſo that there were no Mamertines, nor other ſuch Rebels, to call in Roman ſuccours. But in the enterpriſe of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might alſo ſerue their turne in Spaine. For though it were apparant, that the Spaniſh affaires had no relation to the peace betweene theſe two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Aſdrubal had any purpoſe, to extend his victories vnto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if ſome ſuch matter had bin ſuſpected) they ſent vnto him, requiring that he ſhould forbeare to proceede any further, than to the Riuer of Iberus. In addreſſing their meſſengers, rather to Aſdrubal, than to the Citie of Carthage; they ſeeme to haue hoped, that howſoeuer the generalitie of the Carthaginians had ſweetly ſwallowed many bitter pilles, to auoide all occaſion of warre with Rome yet the brauery of one man might proue more ſeditious, and preſenting the iniurie, returne ſuch anſwer, as would intangle his whole Countrie in the quarrell, that they ſo much deſired, and might embrace at leiſure, when once they had found apparant cauſe. But Aſdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of diſlike at all: and whereas they would haue this inſolent couenant inſerted into the articles of peace; he tooke vpon him to doe it, of his own power, with ſuch appearance of conformity to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and ſought no further.

If it had beene ſo, that the State of Carthage, thereunto preſſed by the Romans, for feare of preſent warre, had ratified this new compoſition made by Aſdrubal; yet ſhould it not haue ſtood bound in honour, to obſerue the ſame carefully, vnleſſe an oath had alſo bin exacted, to make all ſure. But ſince all paſſed quietly, vnder the bare authority of Aſdrubal, this Capitulation was none other in effect, than a ſecond breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accuſed more iuſtly, than they could accuſe the Carthaginians of periurie, (as they after did) for refuſing to ſtand to it.

By this Treatie with Aſdrubal, the Romans won ſome reputation in Spaine. For when it was once conceiued by the Spaniards, that the Citie which would needes be miſtreſſe ouer them, ſtood in feare her ſelfe, of receiuing blowes from a ſtouter Dame; their were ſoone found ſome, that by offering themſelues to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-ſeruants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will ſhortly teach them another leſſon. The Saguntines, a people on the South-ſide of Iberus, entred into confederacie with the Romans, & were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawfull vnto the Romans, to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither ſubiect, nor open enemy in warre to the Carthaginians) into their ſocieties: and vnlawfull it was vnto the Carthaginians, to offer violence towards any that ſhould thus once become confederate with Rome. Neuertheleſſe, if we conſider the late agreement made with Aſdrubal; we ſhall finde that the Romans could haue none other honeſt color of requiring it, than an implicit couenant of making the Riuer Iberus a bound, ouer which they themſelues would not paſſe, in any Diſcouery or Conqueſt by them intended to be made vpon Spaine: in which regard, they might haue ſome honeſt pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome as yet had no foot, on the one ſide of Iberus, whereas Carthage, on the other ſide of that Riuer, held almoſt all the Countrie. How ſoeuer it were, this indignitie was not ſo eaſily digeſted, as former iniuries had beene. For it was a matter of ill conſequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginian, ſhould behold Saguntum reſting ſecurely among them, vpon confidence of help from a more mighty Citie. Wherefore either in this reſpect, or for that the ſenſe is moſt feeling of the lateſt iniuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to doe themſelues right: warre againſt Saguntum was generally thought vpon, let the Romans take it how they liſt. In ſuch termes were the Carthaginians, when Aſdrubal died, after he had commanded in Spaine eight yeares: (being ſlaine by a ſeruant, whoſe maſter he had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, ſonne of the Great Amilcar, was choſen Generall in his ſtead.

§. VI.

The estate of Greece from the death of Pyrrhus, to the reigne of Philip the sonne of Demetrius in Macedon.

IN the long terme of the first Punick war; and the vacation following, betweene it and the second; the estate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was growne somwhat like vnto that, vvherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though farre vveaker, as in an after-spring. The whole Countrie had recouered by degrees, a forme of libertie: the petty tyrannies (bred of those inferiour Captaines, which in the times of generall combustion, had seised each vpon such townes as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated, and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatnesse, as not only serued to defend themselues, but to giue protection to others. This conuersion to the better, proceeded from the like dissentions and tumults in Macedon, as had bin in Greece, when Philip first began to encroach vpon it. For after many quarrels and great wars, about the Kingdome of Macedon, beween Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lysimachus, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, and the Gaules: Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning sixe and thirtie yeares; yet so, that he was diuers times thence expelled, not only by the Gaules, and by Pyrrhus, as hath bin already shewed, but by Alexander the son of Pyrrhus the Epirot, from whose father he had hardly won it. This happened vnto him, by the reuolt of his souldiers, euen at such time, as hauing ouerthrowne with great slaughter an Armie of the Gaules, he was conuerting his forces against the Athenians, vvhom he compelled to receiue his Garrisons. But his young sonne Demetrius raised an Armie, wherewith he chased Alexander, not only out of Macedon, but out of his own Epirus, and restored his father to the Kingdome.

By the help of this young Prince Demetrius (though in another kind) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadell of Corinth; vvhich was iustly termed the fetter of Greece. The Citadell called Acrocorinthus, stood vpon a steepe rockie hill on the North side of the towne, and was by nature and art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the town; which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running betweene the Ægean and Ionique Seas, ioyneth Peloponnesus to the maine of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle, was able to cut off all passage by land, from one halfe of Greece vnto the other; besides the commodity of the two Seas, vpon both of which, this rich and goodly Citie had commodious hauens. Alexander, the son of Polysperchon; and after his death, Cratesipolis his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Prouinces and Townes, that was made betweene Alexanders Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, vntill it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of vvhom I finde nothing else, than that he vvas thought to be poysoned by this Antigonus, who deceiued his wife Nicea thereof, and got it from her by a tricke. The deuice was this. Antigonus sent his young Demetrius to Corinth, vvilling him to court Nicea, and seeke her marriage. The fooliish old widow perceiued not how vnfit a match she was for the yong Prince, but entertained the fancie of marriage, whereto the old King was euen as ready, to consent, as vvas his son to desire, and came thither in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth vvas filled with sacrifices, feasts, plaies, and all sorts of games: in the middest of vvhich, Antigonus vvatched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poore Lady, whose icalousie had bin exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not containe himselfe within the grauity beseeming his old age. But as he had stollen it; so vvas it againe stollen from him: neither liued he to reuenge the losse of it, being already spent with age.

Demetrius, the son of this Antigonus, succeeding vnto his father, reigned ten yeares. He made greater proofe of his vertue before he was King than after. The Dardanians, Ætolians, and Achæans, held him continually busied in war; wherein his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these times the power of the Macedonians began to decay: and the Grecians to cast off their yoke.

Philip, the only son of Demetrius, was a young child when his father died, & therefore Antigonus, his vncle, had the charge of the Kingdome, during the minority of the Prince;

Prince; but he assumed the name and power of a King, though he respected Philip as his own son, to whom he left the Crowne at his death; This Antigonus vvas called the Tutor, in regard of his protectorship; and was also called Doson, that is as much as, Willing, because he was slow in his liberalitie. He represſed the Dardanians and Thessalians, which molested his Kingdome, in the beginning of his reigne. Vpon confidence of this good seruice, he took state vpon him, as one that rather were King in his own right, than only a Protector. Hereupon the people fell to mutinie; but vvere soone appeased by faire words, and a seeming vnwillingnesse of his to meddle any more with the Gouernement. The Achaians tooke from him the City of Athens, soone after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to haue wrought him out of all, or most that he held in Greece, if their own estate had not bin endangered by a neerer enemy. But ciuill dissention, which had ouerthrown the power of Greece, when it flourished most; ouerthrew it easily now again, when it had scarcely recouered strength after a long sickenesse; and gaue to this Antigonus no lesse authority therein, than Philip the father of Alexander, got by the like aduantage.

These Achaians from small beginnings, had increased in short time to great strength and fame: so that they grew the most redoubted Nation of all the Greekes. By the equalitie of their Lawes, and by their clemencie (notwithstanding that they were a long time held vnder by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not only draw all others by their loue and alliance, but induced, through their example, the rest of the Cities of Peloponnesus, to be gouerned by one Law, and to vse one and the same sort of weights, measure, and mony.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the first that vnited them againe; and gaue them courage, after that they had bin by the Macedonian Captaines diuided into many Principalities. In elder times they were gouerned by Kings, as most of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kinde of rule they first subiected themselues, after the descent of the Heraclidæ, when Tisamenus the son of Orestes possest the Territorie of Achaia. In this estate they continued to the time of Gyges; after whom, when his sons sought to change the Legall gouernment of their Predecessors into Tyrannie, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as seeming most equall. This forme of Common-weale had continuance, with some small changes according to the diuersitie of times, till the reigne of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempest-like ouerturned all things in that part of the world. For those twelue Cities, called the Cities of alliance, whereof Helice, and Lacus Olenus, the Sea had eaten vp a little before the Battaile of Leuctras, were, by disturbance of the Macedonians, diuided from each other, and trained into a war, no lesse bloudy than cruell, among themselues. But in the one hundred and foure and twentieth Olympiad, in which, or neere in, Ptolomie the son of Lagus, Lysimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolomie Ceraunus, left the world; two of ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Patrenses and the Dimæi, vnited themselues, and laid the foundation of that generall accord, and re-vnion, vvhich after followed. For hauing bin, some of them Partisans with sundrie Macedonian Captaines, and others hauing bin gouerned by petty Kings; they began to fasten themselues in a strong league of amitie, partly, in the Olympiad before spoken of, and partly, at such time as Pyrrhus made his first voyage into Italie. Now after the vniting of the Patrenses and Dimæi, to whom also the Cities of Tritea, and Pharæ, ioyned themselues; Ægira chased out her Garrisons: and the Barians, killing their Kings, entred with the Cerannians into the same Confederacie. These Cities, for twentie and fiue yeares, vsed the same forme of Gouernment with the Achaians; who had a Senatorie and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Common-weale; and soone after, by one Prætor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Caynensis was the first, and Aratus the second.

This Aratus was a noble young Gentleman of Sicyon, who liuing at Argos in exile, whilst his Countrie was oppressed by Tyrants, found meanes, through the helpe of other banished men, to enter their owne Citie by night, with ladders; whence they chased the Tyrant, and restored the people to libertie. This was in the time of Antigonus Doson King of Macedon, a Prince more busie in watching what to get among the Greeks, than wise in looking to his own. For feare of Antigonus, the Sicyonians enter into the Achæan league, which though at that time it receiued more increase by their accession, than it added strength to them, yet the benefit of this coniunction serued well enough against Antigonus, whose subtiltie was somewhat greater than his valour. As the industry and counsaile of Aratus deliuered his Country from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaian league, so further, by his great liberalitie, with the exceeding great cost of 150. talents, he pacified the inexplicable controuersies, between the banished Sicyonians, which returned with him, & the other Citizens that had possession of these mens Lands; as also with the same money he drew many others to assist him in those enterprises following, that redounded to the singular good of all Achaia. The mony he obtained of Ptolomy Euergetes King of Egypt; who partly had a desire to hold some strong and sure friendship in Greece, partly was delighted with the conuersation of Aratus himself, that made a dangerous voyage to him into Egypt, and fed his pleasure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious peeces, wherein the workemen of Sicyon excelled.

The first of Aratus his great attempts, was the surprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadell of Corinth; which he wanne by night, being thereinto guided by some theeues that he had hired for the purpose, who liuing in the place, had practised to rob Antigonus his treasurie, passing in and out by a secret path among the rockes. Yet was he faine to fight for it, ere he could get it: though indeed Antigonus his Souldiers were rather ouercome by their owne feare, than by any force of the assailants; as mistrusting lest the Achaians were more in number, than in truth they were, and hauing lost the aduantages of the place already, vpon which they had presumed, before they were aware of any enemie.

In these kinde of night-seruices, ambushments, surprises, and practices, Aratus was verie cunning, aduenturous, and valiant: in open field, and plaine battaile, he was as timorous. By this strange mixture of cowardize and courage, he ministred argument of disputation, to Philosophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was esteemed, and in some cases approued) might looke pale and tremble, when he began battaile; and whether the vertue of Fortitude were diuersified, by the sundry natures of men, & in a manner confined, vnto seuerall sorts of action. In resoluing which doubts it may be said, that all vertue is perfected in men by exercise, wherein they are trained by occasion: though a naturall inclination standeth in need of little practice, whereas the defect hereof must be supplied with much instruction, vse, good successe, and other helpe, yet hardly shall grow absolute in generall. Such was Aratus in matter of Warre. In sincere affection to his Countrie he vvas vnreproueable, and so acknowledged: as his following actions will truely testifie.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and ioyned vnto the Common-wealth of Achaia, the Megarians reuolted soone after from Antigonus, and entred into the same Corporation. So did the Troezenians, and the Epidaurians: whereby this new erected State grew so powerfull, that it aduentured to take Athens, from the Macedonians; and Argos & Megalopolis, from Tyrants that held them. The enterprise vpon the Athens vvas of none effect. For though Aratus wasted the Ile of Salamis, to shew his strength, and sent home the Athenian prisoners, without ransome, to allure the Citie by shew of loue; yet the Athenians stirred neither against him, nor for him, as being now growne honest slaues to the Macedonians. Vpon Argos the aduenture was carried more strongly. The Achaians came sometimes to the gates of the Citie, but the people stirred not: once they entred it, and might haue wonne it, if the Citizens would haue lent any helpe to the recouerie of their owne freedome; sundry times, and with diuers euents, they fought with the Tyrants, (who rose vp one after another in Argos) in open field, and slue one of them in battaile; but all sufficed not: vntill at length Aristomachus the Tyrant was so terrified, perswaded, and hired, by Aratus, that he consented to resigne his Estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus that had oppressed the Phliasians.

Whilest this businesse with the Argiues was on foot, Lysiadas the Tyrant of Megalopolis, was so well handled by Aratus, that, without compulsion, he gaue libertie to his Citie, and annexed it to the Councell of Achaia; whereby he got such credit, that he was chosen General of their forces (which was a yearely Office, and might not be held two yeeres together by one man:) euery second yeare, for a certaine while, betwixt Aratus succeeded one another by turnes. But those late Tyrants, and now Citizens, Lysiadas and Aristomachus, were carried with priuate passion from care of the generall good, in which courses they opposed Aratus, to the great hinderance of Achaia, as shall appeare in due time.

The

The Achæans haning obtained ſo much puiſſance and reputation, that Ptolemie King of Egypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) Generall of their forces by Sea and Land; made open War vpon Demetrius the ſon of Antigonus Gonatas, for the liberty of Athens. It is ſtrange and worthy of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrell had loſt a battaile, the Athenians wore Garlands, in ſigne of joy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had won the victory. Such were now the Athenians become; in vvhom the rule was verified, that holds true in generall of the multitude, Aut humiliter ſeruit, aut ſuperbè dominatur; It is either baſe in ſeruice, or inſolent in command. Nenertheleſſe when Demetrius vvas dead, Aratus performed that by mony, which he could not by force; & corrupting the Captaine of the Macedonian Garriſon, purchaſed liberty to the Athenians, vvho thenceforth held good correſpondence with the Achæans, louing them, and ſpeaking vvell of them, vvhich was all that they could doe: but into their Corporation they entred not, ſcorning it belike, in regard of their own out-worne glory.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increaſed within Peloponneſus, by iuſtice and honeſtie; ſo did the Ætolians, in the vtter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponneſus it ſelfe, waxe very powerfull, by ſturdineſſe of body, & rude courage in fight, without help of any other vertue. They had ſtoutly defended themſelues againſt Antipater and Craterus; partly by daring to do & ſuffer much; partly by the naturall ſtrength & faſtneſſe of their Country; but eſpecially by the benefit of the time, vvhich called away theſe famous Captaines to other buſineſſe, as hath bin related. They had moleſted Caſſander, in fauour of Antigonus; & vvere themſelues as much plagued by him, & by the Acarnanians, a little, but a ſtout Nation, that tooke his part. Afterwards they had to do with Demetrius, the ſon of the firſt Antigonus, & more or leſſe, with all the Kings of Macedon ſucceeding him. They likewiſe held often War vvith the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epirots, & many Cities in Peloponneſus: ſo that they vvere hardned with perpetuall trauile; ſeldome putting off their Armour. But their hardineſſe ill deſerued the name of valour, ſeeing they had no regard of honeſty or friendſhip; meaſuring all things by their own inſolent wils, & thinking all people baſe-minded, that were not as fierce and outragious as themſelues.

Theſe Ætolians had lately made great ſpoyles in Peloponneſus, and occupied a good part of the Country. They had inuaded the friends of the Achæans, taken and ſacked Pelene; where although they were ſoundly beaten by Aratus, yet their deſire of gaine made them make a new voyage thither, as to a Country wherein ſomewhat was to be gotten. But they were forced to looke another vvay, by Demetrius the ſonne of Antigonus Gonatas: who preſſed them ſo hardly, that they vvere driuen to ſeeke helpe of the Achæans; which they obtained. The vvar vvhich the Achæans made vpon Demetrius, vvithout Peloponneſus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit therof redounded chiefly vnto the Ætolians, at whoſe inſtance it was ſet on foot: for therby vvere the Macedonian forces diuerted from them. Neither was this good turne vnacknowledged; though very baſely the Ætolians, giuing thanks in words, deuiſed how to requite the benefit with ſome great miſchiefe. They ſaw that the Achæans were deſirous, to bring all Peloponneſus into their Alliance & Corporation: of which intent, the Lacedemonians were very iealous. Wherefore theſe Ætolians laboured earneſtly, to ſet the Lacedemonians and Achæans together by the eares: hoping that if this might come to paſſe, they themſelues ſhould be called in to helpe (it skilled not on what ſide) and ſo get no ſmall ſhare, both in bootie and Territorie. Neither did they forbeare to communicate this their deuice vnto Antigonus; offering to make him partaker of their gaine, whom they knew to be offended with the many loſſes, that this Kingdome had ſuſtained by the Achæans. Of this plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to ſuffer many indignities, rather than to giue the Lacedemonians cauſe to take Armes. But this reſolution was taken ſomewhat too late: and not altogether in his own power to hold. He had bin meddling with the Arcadians, that were dependants of Lacedemon: and thereby had prouoked the Lacedæmonians to looke about them; ſeeing that all Peloponneſus, excepting themſelues, the Eleans, and a few Arcadians their friends (who alſo were attempted) was already become Achæan.

The Citie of Sparta was in ill caſe about theſe times; and ſubiect to the iniuries of any ſtronger Neighbor. Pyrrhus had greatly weaked it; The Ætolians entring Laconia with an Armie, had carried away fiftie thouſand ſlaues; and, vvhich was worſe, their diſcipline was corrupted, Auarice & Lukurie reigned among them, the poore was oppreſſed by the rich, & the generoſitie of ſpirit, that had ſometime bin their generall vertue, was hardly now to be found among the beſt of them. There were left in Sparta no more than ſeuen hundred natural Citizens, of whom not aboue one hundred had Lands; all the reſt were needie people, and deſirous of innouation. Hereupon followed inceſſant ſedition, which endangered the Citie moſt of all. Agis a good King, who ſought to reforme the diſorders of the State, exhorted the people to a ſtrict obſeruation of Lycurgus his lawes. To which purpoſe he cauſed them to paſſe an Act, for the abolishing of all debts, and equall diuiſion of Lands. All the younger, and poorer ſort were glad of this; but the rich men oppoſed it. Theſe had recourſe vnto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who tooke their part: being himſelfe a diſſolute man, as one trained vp in the Court of Syria, whence alſo he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the Citie, and a new King choſen in his ſtead. But Agis his friends & Counſailors in this enterpriſe, abuſed his good meaning to their owne priuate commoditie. They vvere haſtie to take away all debts, & cancell all bands, for they themſelues were deeply indebted: but the diuiſion of lands they afterwards hindred, becauſe their own poſſeſſions were great. Hence aroſe a tumult in Sparta, vvhich theſe men increaſed by their foule oppreſſion of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine, Leonidas was brought home, and reſtored to his Kingdome, and the two aduerſe Kings driuen to take Sanctuarie out of vvhich, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was diſmiſſed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawn into priſon, and thereby his enemies condemned & ſtrangled together with his Mother, & his old Grandmother. The like to this was neuer known in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this crueltie proceeded from the Ephori, Magiſtrates that ſhould haue giuen Patronage to the lawes, vſing their power, and more power than to them belonged, againſt a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the Citie, as the law required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; & ſerued to eſtabliſh the impotent rule of a few tyrannicall oppreſſors. In which caſe Aratus might well hope to adioyne Lacedamon to the Achæans Common-wealth: though it were great iniuſtice to take ſuch aduantages, and attempt by force, that which would haue redounded to the generall good of Peloponneſus, and to the benefit of Sparta it ſelfe, if it could haue bin wrought by perſwaſion.

But the ſame man who redreſſed the diſorders of Sparta, and reuenged the death of Agis, did alſo requite the iniuſt attempts of the Achæans, euen in their own kinde; obtruding vpon them by force, an vnion of all Peloponneſus; though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedemonians and their King, ſhould haue bin the principall; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas hauing thus cauſed Agis to be ſlaine, tooke his wife that vvas very rich and beautifull, and gaue her in marriage (perforce) to his own ſon Cleomenes. This young Prince fell greatly enamoured on his wife, & ſought to win her affection, as well as he had her perſon. He diſcourſed much with her about the purpoſe of her former husband Agis, & by pittying his misfortune, began to entertaine a deſire of accompliſhing that, wherein Agis had failed. So comming himſelfe to be King, whileſt he was very young, he gladly embraced all occaſions of War: for that he hoped by ſtrong hand to effect that, which Agis, by proceeding formally, in ſo corrupt an eſtate of the Citie, had attempted to his own ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gaue him in charge, to take and fortifie Athenæum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they & the Megalopolitans pretended title; he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but ſought to take by ſurprize Tegea & Orchomenus, Cities then confederate with the Lacedemonians: wherin, his intelligence falling, he loſt the labor of a painful nights trauel, & diſcouered his enmitie to Sparta, of which Cleomenes was nothing ſorrie. By theſe degrees the war began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had diſcouered the Ætolian practice, & therefore would haue ſtaied the quarrell from proceeding too far. But Lyſiadas & Ariſtomachus would needs fight, and he could do none other than be ruled by them; eſpecially ſeeing Cleomenes vvas ſo vrgent. Ariſtomachus was at that time Generall of the Achæans, (He and Lyſiadas being of great account, ſince they had abandoned their tyrannie) who ſent vnto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his aſſiſtance in a iourney to be made into Laconia. No diſwaſions of Aratus would therefore therefore he came in person, and tooke part of a businesse, little pleasing him in the present, and lesse in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durst not fight; but opposed himselfe against Aristomachus who desired to giue battaile. Yet had the Achæans twentie thousand foot, and one thousand horse, in their Armie: whereas Cleomenes had no more than fiue thousand in all. This gaue reputation to the Lacedæmonian, and raised an ill report vpon Aratus, which Lysiadas helped to make worse, by accusing his cowardize. Neuertheless the Achæans would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but chose him their Generall the yeare following, against Lysiadas his accuser that sued for the place. Being Generall himselfe, it behooued him to confute, with deedes, the slanderous words of Lysiadas. Therefore he purposed to set vpon the Eleans: but was met withall on the way, neere vnto the Mount Lycæus, by Cleomenes; who vanquished him in a great battaile, and draue him to hide himselfe all night for feare; so that he was thought to haue bin slaine. This misaduenture Aratus recompenced by a tricke of his owne more naturall occupation: performing with his broken Armie, that which could hardly haue bin expected, had he bin victorious. For whilest there vvas no suspicion of any great matter that he could vndertake; he suddenly wrought with some of the Mantineans, who did let him into their Citie. These Mantineans, (whom he had thus brought to his purpose) had once before ioyned themselues with the Achaians; but shortly vpon feare, or some other passion, they gaue themselues to the Ætolians; and from the Ætolians, presently after this victorie, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus wonne. For this their leuitie they vvere not punished, but freely admitted now againe into the Achæan societie. As this good successe repaired the credit of Aratus, so another battaile almost ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountred neere vnto Megalopolis, where the Achæans had somewhat the better at the first, but their General durst not follow his aduantage. Thereupon Lysiadas, of whom we spake before, grew somewhat impatient with anger; and taking with him all the horse, brake vpon the Lacedæmonian, whom he routed at the beginning, but pursuing them too far into places of hard passage, he was slaine by them, and his followers driuen backe vpon their owne Companions; in such sort, that finally all the Armie was disordered and put to flight. This was a great losse, and incensed the Achæans against Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refused to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of those Mercenaries which he had waged. This Aratus tooke patiently, and followed the warre neuertheless; wherein though Cleomenes wanne some Townes, and Aratus got the better in one small fight, yet little of importance was done; the Achæans being weary, and the Spartan King intentiue to another businesse.

Cleomenes hauing ledde into the field all that were like to hinder his purpose, and tired them with painfull iournies, forsooke the Achæan warre on a sudden, and came vnexpected home to Sparta, where he slue the Ephori, and restored by force the ancient discipline of Lycurgus. Then gaue he an account of his doings: and shewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroched vpon the power of Kings, & many disorders had grown in the Citie; he iustified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equall diuision of the Lands, reducing all to the first institution. He also supplied the defect of Citizens, by choosing new, out of such as were friends to the State, and valiant men: so that henceforth his Countrie might not altogether stand in need of Mercenarie helpe, as it lately had done, to saue it selfe from the Ætolians, Illyrians, and such other enemies. All this was dispatched in great haste; the Spartans well satisfied; and Cleomenes himselfe ready in the field; ere his enemies could take any aduantage of these his domesticall troubles.

The Achæans hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long ere Cleomenes durst issue forth of the Citie, for feare of some rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had wasted all the Countrie of Megalopolis; had ranged ouer all Arcadia at his pleasure; and was admitted into Mantinea; and ready to take other places, euen of Achaia. These newes displeased them not a little: but they must patiently endure to heare worse. For when Cleomenes had shaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authoritie, he proceeded more roundly in his worke; being better obeyed and by better men. His Lacedæmonians resumed their ancient courage; and he himselfe had the heart to demand the Principalitie of Greece. He did not therefore henceforth contend about the possession of a few Townes: but aduentured to winne or lose all.

all. The Ætolians, in fauour of his attempt, declared themſelues on his ſide: and whereas he had gotten Mantinea, Tegea, and other places, to which they had ſome title, they willingly renounced all their intereſt vnto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Countrie, and ſaw that Antigonus, with the Ætolians, or perhaps without them, would ſhortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begunne. Therefore he deuiſed how to prouide againſt the worſt, and eyther to repaire all, or (if it could not be) to ſaue all from vtter ruine. The office of Generall when it was next put vpon him, he refuſed; fearing to be ſo far preſt, as to hazard in one battaile all the force of his Countrie, to which as he had neuer any affection, nor perchance courage, ſo was his manner of warfare otherwiſe. For he commonly attempted to by ſurpriſe, & defended vpon the aduantage of place, after the manner of the Iriſh, and of all other Nations, ouer-charged with numbers of men. Yet did he not forſake the care of the Weale-publique, though in aiming at the generall good, it ſeemes that priuate paſſion drew him into an ill courſe. He ſaw, that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazzard of battaile; that Mantinea had not onely opened her gates vnto Cleomenes, but ſlaine the Achæan Garriſon that lay therein; that other Townes had yeelded vnto him, without compulſion; and that Ariſtomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and ſince Generall of the Achæans, was now reuolted vnto the enemie, following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolomie was too farre off to helpe; and the neereneſſe of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be vſefull, if this King would (as Polybius ſaith) like others, be friend or enemie, as ſhould beſt agree with his owne profit. To make triall heereof, Aratus practiſed with ſome of Megalopolis, whom he found apt vnto his purpoſe; and inſtructed them how to deale both with Antigonus, and the Achæans.

The Citie of Megalopolis had beene well affected to the Macedonians, euer ſince the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it vnto him by ſome eſpeciall benefits. At this time it lay neereſt vnto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore deſerued ſuccour; yet could not well be releeued by the Achæans, with their owne proper ſtrength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embaſſadours ſhould be ſent vnto the generall Councell of Achaia, requeſting leaue and good allowance, to trie the fauour of Antigonus in their neceſſitie. This was granted, for lacke of what elſe to anſwer: and the ſame Embaſſadours diſpatched away to Antigonus. They did their owne errand briefly; telling him of the good will and reſpect which their Citie had of long time borne vnto him and his Predeceſſors; of their preſent neede; and how it would agree with his honour to giue them aide. But when they deliuered the more generall matter, wherein Aratus had giuen them inſtruction; ſhewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Ætolians, might redound to his owne great loſſe or danger, if the one and the other were not in time preuented; how Aratus himſelfe did ſtand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achæans vnder the Patronage of Macedon: then beganne Antigonus to lend a more attentiue eare to their diſcourſe. He embraced the motion: and to giue it the more life, he wrote vnto the Megalopolitans, that his helpe ſhould not be wanting, ſo farre forth, as it might ſtand with the Achæans good liking. Particularly he commended himſelfe, by theſe Meſſengers to Aratus, aſſuring them, that he thought himſelfe highly bound to this honourable man, whoſe former actions he now perceiued, not to haue beene grounded vpon any hatred to the Macedonians, but onely vpon a iuſt and worthy loue to his owne Nation. With this anſwer they returned to Megalopolis: and are preſently ſent away to the Councell of Achaia; there to make ſome ſpeedy concluſion, as the neceſſity of the time required. The Achæans were glad to heare, that Antigonus was ſo inclinable to their deſire; and therefore were ready to entertaine his fauour, with all good correſpondence. Hereunto Aratus gaue his conſent; and praiſed the wiſedome of his Countrimen, that ſo well diſcerned the beſt and likelieſt meanes of their common ſafetie: adding neuertheleſſe, that it were not amiſſe, firſt of all to try their owne abilitie; which if it failed, then ſhould they doe well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he ſhewed himſelfe moderate, in that which himſelfe of all others did moſt wiſh: to the end, that he might not afterward ſuſtaine the common reprehenſion, if any thing fell out amiſſe; ſince it might appeare, that hee had not beene Author of this Decree, but onely followed, and that leiſurably, the generall conſent.

Neuertheleſſe

Neuertheleſſe in true eſtimation, this finenesse of Aratus might haue bin vſed, vvith his greater commendation, in a contrary course. For it had bin more honourable, to make an end of the War, by yeelding vnto Cleomines that power which they gaue vnto Antigonus: since therby he should both haue freed his Country from all further trouble, & withall should haue restored vnto the vniuerſall state of Greece, that honourable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereft it. But it is commonly found (which is great pitty) that Vertue hauing riſen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it ſelfe, (as it were) in the ſeat of Principality, by length of time, and ſucceſſe of many actions, can ill endure the haſtie growth of any others reputation, wherewith it ſees it ſelfe likely to be ouer-topped. Other cauſe to deſpiſe the Lacedemonians there was none, than that they lately had bin in dangerous caſe: neither could any reaſon be found, why Aratus ſhould preferre Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had ſtood in doubt of the one, when he thought himſelfe more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was iuſtly plagued, vvhen he ſaw his own honours reuerſed by the inſolent Macedonian; and inſtead of liuing as a companion with Cleomenes, that was deſcended of a long race of Kings, the poſterity of Hercules was faine to do ſacrifice vnto Antigonus, as vnto a god, and was finally poyſoned by Philip, whoſe Nobility vvas but of fiue deſcents, & whom perhaps he might haue ſeene his fellowes, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the loue of Ptolomie was loſt; who forthwith tooke part with Cleomenes, though he did not ſupply him with ſuch liberality, as he had vſed to the Achæans; being warned, as may ſeeme, by their example, to be more vvary both in truſting and diſburſing. Cleomenes himſelfe, vvhileſt this buſineſſe with Antigonus was a-foot, paſſed through Arcadia with an Armie, and laboured by all meanes to draw the Achæans to battaile. At the Citie of Dymes in Achaia were aſſembled all the remaining forces of the Nation, with which it was concluded, to make triall, whether perhaps they might amend their eſtate, without ſeeking helpe of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, & there fought with them, where he had ſo great a victory, that the enemy was no longer able to keep the open field. The calamitie was ſuch, that Aratus himſelf durſt not take vpon him to be their Generall, when his turne came in the next election. Wherefore the Achæans were compelled to ſue for peace; which was granted vpon this eaſie condition: That they ſhould not arrogate vnto themſelues the command of Peloponneſus, but ſuffer the Lacedemonians (as in formes ages) to be their Leaders in vvarre. Hereunto if they would condeſcend, he promiſed vnto them, that he would preſently reſtore all places taken from them, & all his priſoners ranſom-free: alſo that they ſhould enioy their own Lawes & Liberties without moleſtation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleaſing to the Achæans: who deſired him to come to the Citie of Lerna, where a Parliament ſhould be held, for the concluſion of the Warre.

Now ſeemed the affaires of Greece likely to be ſetled in better order, than they had euer bin ſince the beginning of the Peloponneſian Wars, yea or ſince the Perſian inuaſion: when God, who had otherwiſe diſpoſed of theſe matters, hindred all, with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes drank in great heat, & thereupon fell extreame ſicke, & ſo could not be preſent at Lerna, but cauſed the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Neuertheleſſe he ſent home the chiefe of his priſoners, to ſhew that he meant none other than good faith. By this faire dealing he confirmed the Achæans in their deſire of his friendſhip: who aſſembled againe at Argos, there to eſtabliſh the League. But Aratus was violently bent againſt it; & ſought by great words, & terrible threats, to make his Countrimen afraid of reſoluing. When all would not ſerue turne, he betooke himſelfe to his cunning; and ſent word to Cleomenes, that he ſhould do well to leaue his Armie behinde him, and come alone into Argos, receiuing hoſtages for ſafetie of his perſon. Cleomenes was already far on his way, when he met with this aduertiſement: and tooke it in ill part, that he ſhould be thus deluded. For it had bin an eaſie matter, to haue told him ſo much at the firſt, and not haue made him come ſo far with an Army, which afterwards he muſt diſmiſſe. Yet that which chiefly ſeemes to haue troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners, who ſought therby, either to make him wait without the gates, and deale only with themſelues and their Meſſengers; or if he would aduenture himſelfe into the Citie, then to deprriue him of all Royall ſhew, that might breede reſpect of him in the multitude. This was that indeed which Aratus feared, & for which he ſought to hinder his comming thither in perſon: leſt the people, hearing the promiſes of Cleomenes ratified by his owne mouth, should presently be wonne with his gentle words, and finish the bargaine without more adoe. Therefore Cleomenes wrote vnto the whole Councell, bitterly complaining against these iuggling trickes: and Aratus was not farre behind with him, in as bitter an Oration. So betweene feare of the one, and vncertenesse of the other, the Assembly knew not how to proceed, but abruptly brake vp, leauing all things there to fortune. Cleomenes tooke his aduantage of their present weakenesse, and ouerwed the Warre. Many Cities yeelded vnto him willingly; many he forced; and partly by force, partly by terrour, he wanne Argos, which neuer King of Sparta before him could doe. In this case Aratus sent his owne sonne to Antigonus, entreating him to deferre no time, but come presently to relieue the distressed Achæans. Antigonus gaue good words as could be wished: sauing that hee vtterly refused to doe anything, vnlesse hee might first haue Acrocorinthus put into his hands. This demaund was somewhat like vnto that of the Hunter, who promised to helpe the Horse against his enemie the Stagge: but with condition, that the horse should suffer himselfe to be saddled and bridled. Aratus was herewithall contended, but wanted all honest colour to doe it: seeing the Corinthians had no way deserued, to be thus giuen away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occasion was found; for that the Corinthians, perceiuing what hee intended, were minded to arrest him. So he withdrew himselfe out of their Citie, and sent word to Antigonus, that their Castle should be ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other side ranne to Cleomenes; who lost no time, but made haste with them to Corinth, where he sought how to get possession of their Castle, or at least to saue it from Antigonus, by surrounding it within Trenches, that none might issue nor enter without his leaue. Whilest this was doing, he tooke speciall order, that Aratus his house and goods, within the Towne, should be kept for the Owner; to whom he sent Messenger after Messenger, desiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the Barbarous Macedonians, and Illyrians, to Peloponnesus; promising that if he would hearken to these perswasions, then would he giue him double the same pension, which he had been wont to receiue of King Ptolomie. As for the Castle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponnesus, and without which none could hold assured soueraignty of the Country; hee desired that it might not be committed vnto his owne disposition, but be iointly kept by the Lacedæmonians and Achæans. All this entreaty serued to no purpose. For Aratus, reiecting vtterly the motion, sent his owne sonne as an Hostage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Achæans, to put Acrocorinthus into his hands. Which when Cleomenes vnderstood, he seised vpon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Countrey of Sicyon, whereof this his Aduersary was natiue.

Antigonus in the meane time drew neere to the Isthmus; hauing passed with his Army through Eubœa, because the Ætolians held the streights of Thermopyle against him. This they did, either in fauour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatnesse, whereunto the Macedonians might attaine by the good successe of this iourny. At his comming thither, he found the Lacedæmonians ready to forbid his entrance: and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazzard battaile, but rather to weary him thence with hunger, against which he came not well prouided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able so to doe: he secretly got into the Corinthian Hauen; but was violently driuen out againe, with great losse of men; finally he resolued to turne aside, and seeke a passage ouer the gulfe of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

In this perplexity newes from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, and no lesse troubled his enemies. The Achæans were gotten into that Citie; and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driuen out of the Citadel, yet was hardly distressed, and stood in need of present helpe. Argos had alwayes bin enemy to Sparta, and well affected to the Kings of Macedon. When Cleomenes tooke it, he forbare to chase out those whom he most suspected; partly, at the entreaty of friends; and partly, for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperity. They were glad indeed of Cleomenes his victories, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that hee would cause all debtors to be discharged from their creditors, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta, was agreeable to the Spartan institution: in other places where it would haue been tyrannically, he did it not. Thereupon, ſuch as were diſappointed of their vniuſt hopes, began to turne good Common-wealths, men; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, becauſe he vvould not doe the like abroad. So they tooke their time; inuited the Achæans; aſſailed his Garriſon; cut in peeces the Reſcue that he ſent; and compelled him at length, to forſake the defence of Corinth, and looke vnto the enemies that were behind his back. For when he vnderſtood by continuall meſſages, that his men which held the Citadell at Argos, were almoſt loſt; he began to feare, leſt his labour in guarding the entry, ſhould grow friuolous; the Achæans in the meane while ſpoiling all that lay within. Therefore he forſooke his cuſtody of the Iſthmus, and made all haſte towards Argos: vvhich if he could ſaue, he meant to truſt fortune with the reſt. And ſo farre he preuailed at his comming to Argos; that both Argiues and Achæans vvere glad to houſe themſelues, leauing him Maſter of the ſtreets: when the horſemen of Antigonus were diſcouered a farre off, haſting to relieue the Citizens; and Antigonus himſelfe (to whom Corinth was yeelded, as ſoone as the Spartan had turned his backe) following apace with the body of his Armie, Cleomenes therefore had no more to do, than to make a ſafe retrait. This he did, and got him home into Laconia: loſing in ſhort ſpace all, or moſt of that which he had bin long in getting.

Antigonus hauing ſhewed himſelfe at Argos, and commended the Citizens, vvent into Arcadia; where he vvan ſuch Caſtles as were held for Cleomenes; and reſtored them to the old Poſſeſſors. This done, he tooke his vvay to Ægium, vvhere vvas held a Parliament by the Achæans; to whom he declared the cauſe of his comming, and ſpake braue words, that filled them with hope. The Achæans were not behinde with him; but made him Captaine Generall ouer them and their Confederates; and further entred into couenant with him, That they ſhould not deale with any Prince or State, either by writing or Embaſſadour, without his conſent. All this while, and ſomewhat longer, Aratus was the only man, that ſeemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon, his owne Town (for Winter was come on) where he not only feaſted him as a great Prince, but ſuffered more than hum ane honours, as ſacrifices and the like, to be done vnto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the reſt of Achaia: vvhich had made (forſooth) a very wiſe bargaine, if in ſtead of Cleomenes that vvould haue bin a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this God was poore; and wanting wherwith to pay his Macedonians, impoſed the burthen vpon the Achæans. This vvas hardly taken: yet worſe muſt be endured in hope of better. Neither vvas Aratus himſelfe ouer-carefully reſpected; when the ſtatues of thoſe Tyrants, which he had throwne downe in Argos, were again erected by Antigonus; or when the ſtatues, which he had erected, of thoſe that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all thrown downe by the ſame King, and one only left vnto himſelfe at his earneſt entreaty. It might therefore appeare, that this God was alſo ſpightfull. Neuertheleſſe in taking reuenge vpon thoſe that offended him, Aratus did ſatisfie his own paſſion by the ayde of theſe Macedonians. For with extreame torments he did put Ariſtomachus to death, vvho had bin once Tyrant of Argos; afterwards Generall of the Achæans, and from them reuolting vnto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like ſort handled he (though not as yet) the Mantineans for their ingratitude and cruelty ſhewed to the Achæans. For he ſlue all the principall Citizens, and ſold the reſt, men, women, and children, all for bond-ſlaues: diuiding the ſpoile; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Achæans. The town it ſelfe was giuen by Antigonus to the Argiues: who peopled it with a Colony of their own, and Aratus hauing charge of this buſineſſe, cauſed it to be new-named Antigonia. Surely of this cruelty there can be no better excuſe; than euen the flattery, vvhich Aratus vvas driuen to vſe Antigonus: foraſmuch as it was a token of ſeruility, whereinto they had vrged and brought him; whom he, as in reuenge thereof, did thus requite. But leauing to ſpeake of this change, which the comming in of the Macedonian wrought, in the Ciuill ſtate of the Achæans; Let vs returne into his warre againſt the Lacedæmonian.

The next Summer Antigonus wan Tegea, Mantinea, Orchomenus, Herea, and Telphuſa: Mantinea he diſpeopled, as was ſaid before; in Orchomenus he placed a Garriſon of his Macedonians; the reſt he reſtored to the Achæans: with whom he wintred at Ægium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomenes had met him this yeare; and that was on the borders of Laconia, where he lay ready to defend his own Territorie. The reason why he stirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantinea, & to those other Townes that he wan, vvas this: He had few Souldiers, and had not mony enough to wage more. Ptolomie the Egyptian promised much, but would performe nothing, vnlesse he might haue Cleomenes his own Mother, and his children in pledge. These were sent into Egypt, yet the aide came not. For Ptolomie vvas slow; as dealing in the businesse of Greece, rather for his mindes sake, than vpon any apprehension of necessitie. Cleomenes therefore prouided for himselfe, as well as his own ability would serue. He manumised all the Heilotes, which vvere the Lacedæmonian slaues: taking mony for their liberty, and arming two thousand of them, after the Macedonian fashion. Hauing thus increased his forces, he came on the sudden to Megalopolis; that lay secure, as hauing defended it selfe in more dangerous times, and hauing now Antigonus neere at hand in Ægium. The towne he wan: but after he was entred, all that vvere fit to beare Armes, rose hastily against him; and though they could not driue him out, yet saued the multitude, to whom they gaue a Port free for their escape. He sent after the Citizens, offering their Town and goods to them againe, if they would be of his party. But they bravely refused his offer: wherfore he sacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great bootie that he found therein. These newes astonished the Achæans, at Ægium: who thereupon brake vp their Parliament. Antigonus sent hastily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering places: but they were so long in comming, that Cleomenes vvas safely gone home. Therefore he returned them backe to their lodgings, and went himselfe to Argos; there to passe the rest of his vnlucky winter, somewhat further from the eyes of the grieued Achæans. When he had laine a while at Argos, Cleomenes vvas at the gates; with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argiues perceiuing that their Country would be spoiled, if Antigonus did not issue into the field; vvere very earnest with him to go forth and fight. But he vvas wiser than to be moued with their clamors; and suffered them to see their villages burnt, to bid him resigne his Office of Protector vnto some that vvere more valiant; and to satisfie their passions with fooliſh words; rather than he vvould be ouer-come in fight, and thereby lose more honor than could easily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his desire, in weakning the reputation of his enemie: though he therby added neither followers, nor other strength, vnto Lacedæmon.

Afterwards, when the season was more fit for war, Antigonus gathered together all his troups; meaning to requit these brauado's of his enemy, vvith the conquest of Sparta. Cleomenes on the other side, laboured to keepe the vvar from his own gates; and therefore entred vpon the Country of Argos, where he made such hauocke, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended inuasion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was faine to endure, in coasting of the Spartan King; that ranging ouer the Country of the Argiues, Phliasians, and Orchomenians, draue a Garrison of his out of Oligyrtus; and did sacrifice, as it were, before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Iuno, that was shut vp; sending vnto him in scorne, to borrow the keyes. These were light things; yet serued to dis-hearten the Achæan side, and to fill the enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therefore he concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazzard; by setting vp his rest, without any more delay, vpon Sparta it selfe. He had in his Army eight and twenty thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, collected out of sundry Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Gaules, Epirotes, Bœotians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Achæans, and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts, twentie thousand, vvith which he lay at Selasia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seeke entrance. Antigonus comming vnto Selasia, found his enemy so strongly incamped, vpon and between the hills of Eua and Olympus, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before he could aduance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blowes, vvhich he greatly desired, without the hazard of his whole Armie, in assayling their wel-defenced Campe. But at length (as it happens, when men are wearie both of their hopes and feares) both Kings being resolued to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attempted with his Illyrians, to force that part which lay on the hill Eua. But his Illyrians were so ill seconded by the Achæan foot, that the Spartan horse, and light-armed foote, incamped in the streight vally between those hills, issuing forth, fell vpon their skirts, and not onely disordered disordered them, but were like to haue endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himselfe had stood in that part of the battaile, he would haue made great vse of such a faire beginning. But Euclydas, his brother, a more valiant than skilful Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this aduantage, nor tooke such benefit as the ground afforded; whereon he lay. Philopæmen the Arcadian of Megalopolis who afterwards prooued a famous Captaine, serued then on horse, as a priuate young man, among the Achæans. He seeing that all was like to go to rout, if their Illyrians were driuen to fall back vpon the Armie following them; perswaded the Captaines of the Achæan horse, to breake vpon the Spartan Mercenaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had giuen order, that they should keepe their places, vntill they receiued a signe from him, which was not as yet. Philopæmen perceiuing them to be more orderly, than wel aduised, entreated some of his own Countrimen to follow him, gaue a charge on the Spartans, & forced them, not only to leaue the Illyrians, but seeke how to saue themselues. Being so far aduanced, he found the place vvhich the Illyrians had attempted, like enough to be wonne, through the skilfulnesse of him that held it. Wherefore he allighted, and perswaded the men at Armes his Companions to do the like: the folly of Euclydas being manifest, vvho kept the top of the Hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plaine, where they might fight vpon euen termes. So he recouered the Hill top; where though he was sore hurt, yet he made good the place that he had gotten, vntill the whole Armie came vp to him; by which the Lacedæmonians were beaten from it, with great slaughter of them in their descent. This ouerthrow, and death of Euclydas, made Cleomenes lose the day: vvho fighting brauely on the other side, vpon Olympus, against Antigonus himself, vvas like to haue bin surrounded and lost, if he had not withdrawn himself vvith an extraordinary speede. In this battaile ended the glory of Lacedæmon, vvhich, as a light ready to goe out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, than in many ages past.

Cleomenes fled vnto Sparta: where he had no desire to stay, finding onely two hundred left, of sixe thousand Spartans that he had led vnto this battaile, and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So he perswaded his people to yeeld themselues vnto Antigonus; and promising to doe all that should at any time lye in his own power, for their good, he hasted away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before prouided against all that might happen) & imbarqued himselfe for Egypt. He vvas louingly entertained by Ptolomie Euergetes; who vndertooke to restore him to his Kingdome, and (perhaps) meant no lesse, as being much delighted with his gallant behauiour and qualities. In the meane season he had a pension allowed him, of foure and twenty Talents, yearely. But this Ptolomie died, and his son Ptolomie Philopater succeeded him: a vicious young Prince, vvholly gouerned by lewd Women, and base Men, vnmindfull of all vertue, and hating any in vvhom it vvas found. When therfore Cleomenes was desirous to returne into Greece, whither the troubles in Peloponnesus, did seeme to inuite him; Ptolomie and his Minions, vvould neither giue him aide; nor yet dared to dismisse him (as he desired) to trie his own friends in Greece, because he vvas too vvell acquainted with the weakenesse of Egypt: nor well knew how to detaine him against his will. At length they deuised matter against him, and made him prisoner. The last act of him, vvas; that vvith thirty of his Countrimen, he vndertooke a desperate enterprize: breaking out of the prison, and prouoking the Alexandrians to rebell and seeke their liberty. In vvhich attempt he slue some enemies of his that he met; and hauing walked vp and down the streets without resistance (no man offering to take his part, or, vvhich is very strange, to fight against him on the Kings behalfe) he, and his Companions, agreed together to be ministers of their own death. Vpon his dead body Ptolomie vvas bold to shew his indignation: and slue his Mother and Children, that had bin sent thither as Hostages, together vvith the vvives of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending vpon the old Queene. Such vvas the end of Cleomenes; a generous Prince, but Son of Leonidas, vvho had caused Agis, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to come to such a bloudy end, as now befell his own Wife, Son, and Grand-children.

After the victory at Sellasia, Antigonus without resistance entred Sparta; vvherein no more the force of any Enemy, before him, could make vvay: he kindly entreated

the Citizens, and left them to their own Lawes and Gouernment: tarrying there no longer than two or three daies; after which he hastened out of Peloponnesus, and neuer returned. The cause of his speedy departure vvas, an aduertisement that he receiued out of Macedon; how the Illyrians ouer-ran, and destroyed the Countrie. Had these newes come a little sooner; or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few daies longer, or at least-wise tarried a few daies after the fight, in Sparta: the Kingdome of Lacedæmon vvould haue stood, and perhaps haue extended it selfe ouer all Greece. But God had otherwise determined.

Antigonus fought a great battaile vvith the Illyrians, and ouercame them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any vvound, but by ouer straining his voyce, wherewith he brake a veine that bled inwardly, and in short space finished his life, vvho vvas troubled before vvith a consumption of the lungs. His Kingdome descended vnto Philip, the son of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as also about the same time it was, that Antiochus, surnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptolomie Philopater; began to reigne in Asia, and Egypt; Boyes all. Of these, Ptolomie, though old enough to loue Harlots, when he first was King, yet continued a Boy, all the seuenteen yeares of his reigne. The vnripenesse of Philip and Antiochus, bred such intestine inconuenience to their Kingdomes, as is vsuall in the minoritie of Princes: but their elder yeares brought them acquainted vvith the Romans; vpon vvhich occasion, vvhen it comes, vve shall more seasonably speake of them, and of their Kingdomes, more at large.

§. VII.

How the Illyrians infested the coast of Greece, and how they were subdued by the Romanes.

WHilest things thus passed in Greece, and whilest the Carthaginians were busie in their conquest of Spaine: the Romans had found themselues work among the Sardinians and Corsicans, that were easily subdued at first, and easily vanquished again, when they rebelled. They made also war with the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour vvith little pain. With the Gaules they had much adoe, that lasted not long; being rather, as Liuie saith, a tumult than a vvar. So that by all these light exercises their valour was hardly kept from rust. How they got the Ilands in the Mediterran Sea; it hath bin shewed before: of their dealings with Illyrians and Gaules, it is not meete to be vtterly silent. Liu. lib.

The Illyrians inhabited the Country now called Slauonia: a troublesome Nation, impatient of rest, and continually making war for gaine, without either regard of friend or foe. They were inuited by Demetrius King of Macedon, to help the Mydionians, his friends, that were besieged by the Ætolians; for that they refused to be of their society. Before the Illyrians succours came, the Mydionians were so far spent, that the Ætolians contended about the booty: the old Prætor, or chiefe Magistrate of their Nation, who was going out of his Office, clayming to haue the honour of the victory, and the diuision of the spoyle to be referred vnto him; for that he had in a manner brought the siege to an end, and won the towne: others, that were in hope to be chosen into the Office, contradicting this, and desiring that old orders might be kept. It was a pretie strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in later ages, who thought vpon diuiding the prey, before they had vvon the victories, which anon they lost, at Poitiers and Agincourt. The Ætolians wisely compounded the difference, ordering it thus; That the old, & the new Prætor, should be ioyntly intitled in the victorie, and haue equal authority in distribution of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, & after another fashion. They arriued, and landed, ere any was aware of them; they fell vpon the Ætolians; and though good resistance was made, yet got the victorie, partly by force of their multitude, partly by the help of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their own busines, but stoutly sallied out of the Towne. Many of the Ætolians were slaine, more vvere taken, their Campe and all their baggage was lost: the Illyrians tooke the spoyle, & went their way; the Mydionians erected a Trophie, inscribing the names, both of their old and new Magistrate (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Ætolians had directed them by example.

The successe of this voyage, highly pleased Agron King of the Illyrians: not only in regard regard of the mony, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance, or of the booty that was gotten; but for that having vanquished the fourth of the Macedons, he found it not vnease, to enrich himselfe by setting vpon the lesse warlike. For ioy of this he feasted, and dranke so immoderately, that he fell into a Phrensie, which in few dayes ended his life. His kingdome, together with his great hopes, he left vnto Teuta his wife.

Teuta gaue her people free liberty, to rob all sorts at Sea, making no difference between friend and foe; as if she had bin sole Mistresse of the salt Waters. She armeda fleet, and sent it into Greece, willing her Captaines, to make vvarre where they found aduantage, without any further respect. These fell with the weastme coast of Peloponnesus; where they inuaded the Eleans, and Messenians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, and stayed at the Citie of Phenice, to take in victualles and other necessaries. There lay in Phenice eight hundred Gaules, that hauing bin Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Argos, then Epire, to the Romans; but failing to doe either, they neuertheless reuolted, and were for their misdeedes disarmed & sent to Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirots, and trusted to lye in Garrison within their Towne. The Gaules vvere soone growne acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betrayed Phenice, vvhich deserued none other, in trusting them. All Epirus vvas presently in armes, and hastned to driue out these vnwelcome guests. But whilest the Epirots lay before the Towne, there came newes into their Campe, of another Illyrian Armie, that vvas marching thitherward by Land, vnder one Scerdilaidas, whom Queen Teuta had sent to help his fellowes. Vpon this aduertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigonia, to make good that Towne, & the streights adioyning, by vvhich these new comers must enter into their Country; another part of them remaines at Phenice, to continue the siege. Neither the one, nor the other, sped vvell in their businesse. For Scerdilaidas found meanes to ioyne vvith his fellowes, and they that were besieged within Phenice, sallied out of the towne, and gaue such an ouerthrow to the Epirots, as made them despaire of saiing their Country, without great and speedy help from abroad. Wherefore Embassadours were sent to the Achæans and Aetolians: craiing their help, with very pitifull tearmes of entreatie. They obtained their suit; neither was it long, before an Armie, sent by these two Nations, was ready in Epirus, to present battaile vnto Scerdilaidas. But Scerdilaidas vvas called home, by letters from Teuta the Queen, that signified a rebellion of some Illyrians against her: so that he had no minde to put his forces to hazzard, but offered composition, vvhich vvas accepted. The agreement vvas, That the Epirots might ransome their Towne, and all their people that vvere prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart, with all their booty and slaues. Hauing made this profitable and honourable bargaine, the Illyrians returned into their own Country by Land, sending their booty away by Sea. At their comming home, they found no such great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this voyage. For in fulfilling the commandement of their Queene, they had taken many Italian Merchants, whilest they lay at Phenice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints, made vnto the Roman Senate, vvere so frequent, that Embassadours were sent to require of Teuta, that she should abstaine from doing such iniuries. These Embassadours found her very iolly; both for the riches which her fleet had brought in; and for that she had, in short space, tamed her Rebels, and brought all to good order, saue only the towne Issa, vvhich her forces held streightly besieged. Swelling with this prosperity, she could hardly afford a good look to the Romans; that found fault with her doings; and calling them by a true name, Pyracy, required amends. Yet when their speech vvas ended, she vouchsafed to tell them, That iniury in publike she would do them none: as for priuate matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings to forbid their Subiects to get commodity, how they best could by Sea. But (said the younger of the two Embassadours) we Romans haue a manner, & a very laudable one, to take reuenge in publicke, of those priuate wrongs that are borne out by publike authority: therfore vve shall teach you, God willing, to reforme your kingly manners, and learne better of vs. These words the Queene tooke so impatiently, that no reuenge could satisfie her, but the death of him that had spoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, she caused him to be slaine: as if that had bin the way, to set her heart at rest, vvhich vvas indeed the meane, to disquiet and afflict it euermore.

The

The Romans, prouoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea, consisting of two hundred saile, commanded by C. Fulvius; the other by Land, led by A. Postumius. They trouble not themselues any more, with requiring satisfaction: for this iniurie is of such nature, as must be required with mortall war. It is indeede contrary to all humane Law, to vse violence towards Embassadours: the reason and ground whereof, seemes to be this; that since vvithout mediation, there would neuer be an end of vvar and destruction, therfore it vvas equally receiued by all Nations, as a lesson taught by Nature, that Embassadours should passe freely, & in safety, between enemies. Neuertheless, as I take it, this generall Law is not without limitation. For if any King or State, lay hold vpon Embassadors sent by their enemies, not vnto themselues, but vnto some third, whom they should draw into the quarrell; then is it as lawfull, to vse violence to those Embassadors (thus employed, to make the war more terrible) as it is to kill the men of war, & subiects of an enemy. And so might the Athenians haue answered it, when they slew the Lacedemonian Embassadours, that were sent to Xerxes, to draw him into a war vpon the Athenians. Neither are those Embassadours, vvhich practise against the person of that Prince, in whose Countries they reside, warranted by any Law vvhatsoeuer. For vvhereas the true Office of an Embassadour residing, is the maintenance of amitie; if it be not lawfull for one Prince, to practise against the life of another, much lesse may an Embassadour do it without incurring iustly the same danger of punishment, vvith other Traitors, in which case, his place giues him no priuiledge at all. But we will leaue this dispute to the Ciuilians, and go on with the reuenge, taken by the Romans, for the slaughter of their Embassadour Coruncanius.

The Illyrian Queen vvas secure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to stir against her. She vvas indeed in an errour; that hath vndone many of all sorts, greater and lesse than she, both before and since: Having more regard vnto fame, than vnto the substance of things. The Greekes were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Aetolians and Epirots had the name of the most warlike people in Greece; these had she easily vanquished, and therefore thought, that with the Romans she should be little troubled. Had she considered, that her whole Army, which wrought such wonders in Greece, was not much greater, than of ten thousand men; & that neuertheless, it preuailed as much, by oddes of number, as by valour, or skill in armes; she vvould haue continued to vse her aduantage against those that were of more fame than strength, vvith such good caution, that she should not haue needed to oppose her late-gotten reputation, against those that were more mighty than her selfe. But she vvas a woman, and did what she listed. She sent forth a greater fleet than before, vnder Demetrius of Pharos, with the like ample commission to take all that could be gotten. This fleet diuided it selfe, & one part of it fell with [a] Dyrrachium, the other with Corcyra. Dyrrachium, vvas almost surprised by the Illyrians; yet was it rescued by the stout Citizens. In [b] Corcyra the Illyrians landed, wasted the Ile, and besieged the Towne. Hereupon the Aetolians and Achæans, vvere called in to helpe: vvho came, and vvere beaten in a fight at Sea; losing, besides others of lesse note, Marcus Caryneus, the first Prætor of Achaia, whom Aratus succeeded. The Town of Corcyra, dismaied vvith this ouerthrow, opened the gates vnto Demetrius Pharius, vvho tooke possession of it, with an Illyrian Garrison: sending the rest of his forces to besiege Dyrrachium. In the meane season, Teuta vvas angry with her Captaine Demetrius, I know not why; but so, as she resolued to trie any other course, rather than to trust her.

The Romans vvere euen ready to put to Sea, though vncertaine which vvay to take, when aduertisement was brought to C. Fulvius the Consull, of Demetrius his feare and discontent. Likely it vvas, that such an occasion might greatly helpe to aduance the businesse in hand. Wherefore the Consull sailed thither; vvhere he found the Town of Corcyra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only receiued him willingly, but deliuered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it selfe vnto the Roman protection.

After this good beginning, the Consull sailed along the coast, to [c] Apollonia, accompanied with Demetrius, whom he vsed thenceforth as his counsailer and guide. To Apollonia came also Postumius, the other Consull, with the Land-Armie, numbred at twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they hasten towards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had besieged; but vpon newes of the Roman Armie, they disperse themselues.

b Corcyra, an Iland of the Adriatick Sea, not farre from Durazzo: called now Corfu, and in the possession of the Venetians.

c Apollonia, a Citie neere Dyrrachium, or Durazzo, vpon the Sea-coast. Pinetus calls it Sissopolis.

From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by Sea, take twenty of their ſhips, and enforce the Queene Teuta to forſake the coaſt, and to couer her ſelfe in Riſon, far within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haſte them homeward, and leaue the beſt places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part ſtaies behinde, and proſecutes the war, in ſuch ſort, that Teuta was forced to beg peace: which ſhe obtained vpon miſerable conditions; to wit, That ſhe ſhould quit the better part of Illyria, & pay tribute for the reſt; & from thenceforth, neuer ſend any of her ſhips of war, towards the coaſts of Greece, beyond the Iland of Liſſa: except it were ſome one or two veſſels, vnarmed, and by way of Trade.

After this Illyrian war, the Romanes ſent Embaſſadours into diuers parts of Greece, ſignifying their loue to the Country, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made war with good ſucceſſe vpon Teuta, and her people. They hoped, belike, that ſome diſtreſſed Cities would take this occaſion, to deſire their patronage: which if it hapned, they were wiſe enough to play their own games. But no ſuch matter fell out. The Embaſſadours were only rewarded with thankes; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Iſthmian paſtimes. This was an idle courteſie, but well meant by the vaine Greekes, & therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian Expedition got nothing in Greece, ſaue a little acquaintance, that ſhall be more hereafter.

§. VIII.

Of the warre betweene the Romans and Gaules, ſomewhat before the comming of Hannibal into Italie.

THe Gaules that dwelt in Lombardie, vvere the next, againſt whom the Romans tooke Armes. Theſe were a populous Nation, and often moleſted Rome; ſometimes vvith their own forces, and ſometimes vvith the aſſiſtance of thoſe that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good; when they tooke Rome, and burnt it: though the iſſue of that war proued not anſwerable to the beginning, if we may giue credit vnto Roman Hiſtorians. In following times, their ſucceſſe was variable, and commonly bad. Many ouerthrowes they receiued; and if they got any victory, it yeelded them no profit, but was ſoone extorted out of their hands. They were indeede more fierce, than well aduiſed: lightly ſtirred vp to vvar, and lightly giuing ouer. At the firſt brunt, they were ſaid to be more than men; but when that vvas paſt, leſſe than vvomen. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience, and knew how to handle them: yet gaue alwayes carefull heede to their approach, vvere it only bruited. For the danger of them vvas ſudden, and vncertaine; by reaſon of their neighbourhood and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts vpon Rome, vvere called warres, but tumultus Gallici, tumults of the Gaules: and rightly. For they gaue many alarms to Italie, and vſed to riſe with great Armies: but after a few dayes march, and ſometimes before their ſetting forth, any ſmall occaſion ſerued to diſperſe them. Hauing receiued an ouerthrow; they would reſt ten or twelue yeares, ſometimes twenty or thirty: till they were ſtirred vp again, by younger heads, vnacquainted with the danger. Whileſt they reſted, the ſtate of Rome, that againſt theſe made only defenſiue vvar, had leiſure to grow, by ſetting vpon others. Herein God prouided well for that Monarchie, which he intended to raiſe: that the Gaules neuer fell vpon Italie with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous war. Had they attempted to conquer it, whileſt Pyrrhus was trauailing in the ſame enterpriſe; or in either of the two former Punicke wars: it may be doubted what would haue become of this imperious Citie. But it ſeemes that the Gauls had no better intelligence in the affaires of Italie, than ſtrangers had in Gaule. At leaſt, they knew not how to vſe their times: and were therfore like to ſmart, whenſoeuer the enemies, whom they had much prouoked, and little hurt, ſhould finde leiſure to viſit them at their own home: which was now after the firſt Punike Warre. Once before this, the Romans had bin bold, to ſet vpon the Gaules in their own Country: and that was three yeares before the comming of Pyrrhus into Italie. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gaules, inuading Hetruria, and beſieging Arretium, had won a great battaile, and ſlaine L. Cecilius with the moſt of his Armie. Manius Curius the new Conſull, ſent Embaſſadours to them, to treat about ranſome of priſoners. But theſe Embaſſa-

Embaſſadors they ſlue. Therfore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it ſo well, that they expelled theſe Senones out of their Country, & ſent a Colonie of their own to inhabit it. This cauſed the [e] Boij, another people of Gaule, to feare the like measure: who thereupon tooke armes, and drew the Hetrurians to their ſide. But the Romans ouerthrew them in two great battailes; and thereby made them ſue for peace, which laſted vntill this end of the Illyrian war.

[e] There were diuers nations of the Boii; as in Pannonia, Illyria, Germanie, in Bourbonois, in France, and in Aquitane; but theſe Boii were of the French race and dwelt at this time about the mouth of the Riuer of Po.

It vexed the Gaules, to ſee a Roman Colony planted in their Country; who had bin accuſtomed to enlarge their bounds, by driuing out their Neighbours perforce. Wherfore they laboured with the Tranſalpines (ſo the Romans called thoſe in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to vs they were neerer; like as they called Ciſalpines, or by-hither the Alpes, thoſe who dwelt between them and the Mountaines) to draw them to their party: reaſonably preſuming, that as their diſ-iunction had cauſed their loſſe, ſo their vnion might recompence it, with large amends. But the buſineſſe was ſo fooliſhly carried, that the Ciſalpines and Tranſalpines, fell together by the eares, putting the Romans only to a tumult, without further trouble of war. Soone after, they were vrged by a greater indignity, to go more ſubſtantially to work. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome, propoſed a Decree which was ratified by the people; That, beſides one Colony already planted in the territory of the Senones, as many more ſhould be caried thither, as vvould ſerue to people the whole Country between Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating vterly thoſe Gaules. Such an offer, were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Guiana it ſelf, would not ouer-ioy the Multitude. But the Commonalty of Rome took this in ſo good part, notwithſtanding all danger ioyned with the benefit, that Flaminius had euer after their good will.

This dreadfull Preſident extremely deſpleaſed the Boij: who being Neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like diſplantation. And becauſe the reſt of the Gaules had reaſon to reſolue, that themſelues alſo ſhould be rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Inſubrians, which inhabited the Duchy of Milan, ioyned with the Boij, and vpon a common purſe entertained the Geſſates, Nations about Rhodanus, wageable as the Switzers in theſe times. The Geſſates hauing receiued a great Impreſt, come to the field vnder the conduct of their Kings, Concolitanus and Aneroeſtus: who with the Boij and Inſubrians, compound an Armie of fiftie thouſand foot, and twenty thouſand horſe, and thoſe of the beſt men, and beſt appointed, that euer inuaded the Roman Territorie; to whom, the Senogalli, that had bin beaten out of their poſſeſſions, gaue a great increaſe of ſtrength. On the contrary ſide, the Venetians, and the [f] Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans: as better beleeuing in their proſperitie & riſing fortune. For feare of vvhoſe incurſions therefore, the Gaules were forced to leaue a good part of their Armie, on the frontier of Milan: vvith the reſt of their forces they entred into Tuſcane. The Romans hearing of this danger, ſend Æmilius to Rimine, to ſtop their paſſage; and in the place of C. Atilius their other Conſull, who then was in Sardinia, they imploy one of their Prætors, for the defence of Tuſcane.

[f] Cenomanni, are the people about Bergama, on the Northſide of the Riuer Po in Italie. There were alſo of theſe Cenomanni in France, and inhabited the Countrie of Main.

Being at this time greatly troubled, vvith the conſideration of this powerfull Armie, which the Gaules had aſſembled, they cauſe a view to be taken, as well of all their owne forces, as of thoſe of their Allies: vvho were no leſſe willing than themſelues, to oppoſe the incurſions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cauſe, that their own deſtruction could not be preuented otherwiſe, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muſter, deſerue to be recorded: becauſe they ſet out the power of the Romans in thoſe dayes. With the Conſulls they ſent forth to the war foure Legions of their own: euery Legion conſiſting of fiue thouſand two hundred foot, and three hundred horſe; and of their Allies, thirtie thouſand foot, and two hundred horſe. There vvere alſo appointed for Supplies (if any miſaduenture came to theſe) of the Sabines and Hetrurians fifty thouſand foot, and foure thouſand horſe; vvhich Armie was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Vmbri and Sarſinates, which inhabited the Apenines, there were twentie thouſand; and of the Venetians and Cenomans, other twenty thouſand: which latter Armies were directed, to inuade the Boij, that forcing them to defend their own Territories, the generall Armie of the Gaules ſhould be thereby greatly diminiſhed. There were beſides theſe, to be ready againſt all vncertaine chances of war, thirtie thouſand foot, and fifteene hundred horſe, garriſond in Rome it ſelfe, of their own people; and of their Allies, thirty thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe. Ouer and about the sie great troopes; in the Roll of the Latines, that was sent vnto the Senate, there were numbred fourescore thousand foot, and fiue thousand horse; in that of the Samnites, seuentie thousand foot, and of horse seuen thousand; in that of the Iapygs, & Messapyges, fifty thousand foot, and sixteene thousand horse; the Lucans sent a list of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the [h] Marsi, Marrucini, [k] Ferentani, and the Vestini, of twenty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse. The Romans had also two Legions in Sicil, and about Tarentum, containing eight thousand foure hundred foot, & foure hundred horse. So as of the Romans and Campans ioyntly, reckoning men armed, and fit to beare armes, there were registred two hundred and fifty thousand foot, and of horse, three and twenty thousand: of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an hundred and fifty thousand foot, and about sixe thousand horse. Casting vp the whole forces of all the Prouinces in Italie, both of the Romans & their Confederates, it amounted to seuen hundred thousand foote, and seuenty thousand horse. But the number is somwhat misse-cast by Polybius; not with a purpose to enrich himself by the dead paies: for where hee reckons nine hundred horse too many, hee fals short nine thousand two hundred of the foot.

How great soeuer this Muster was, it seemes to haue been like vnto that, which Lodowick Sforce made, when Lewis the twelfth inuaded Milan: at what time, the better to encourage himselfe, and his subiects, he tooke a Roll of all persons able to beare armes, within the Duchie, though indeed he were neuer able to bring a tenth part of them into the field. Certaine it is, that the battailes of Trebia, Trasymene, and Cannæ, did not consume any such proportion, as was answerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans faine to arme their slaues, euen for want of other Souldiers, after their ouerthrow at Cannæ. Wherfore the marvaile is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified, with report of such a multitude. For all heads are not fit for Helmets: though the Roman Citizens were, in general, as good fighting men, as elsewhere might be found.

Notwithstanding all these counter-preparations, the Gaules keepe on their way: and entring into Tuscane, destroy, and put to fire and sword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to finde the Romans, rather in deliberation, than in the field. But their intelligence failes them. For the Roman Army, sent into Tuscane, hauing taken some other way than they did, and finding that it had missed of them, came againe fast after them, to arrest them in their iourny. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backes, they turned head: and in the same morning discouered the Roman Army, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparant necessity, that fight they must. Wherefore they helped themselues with a stratagem: that shewed no great fineneſse of wit, but such, as well beseemed those that had none other occupation than warre; and stood them in good stead at the present. In the dead of the night, they cause their foot to march away, but not farre: leauing their horse in guard; to whom they giue order, to come off at the first light of day, with such a speed, as might rather argue a running away, than a retrait, as if they had not dared to abide battaile. The Romans, interpreting this their hasty departure, as the Gaules desired they should, follow them in disorder. The Gaules returne; charge them, and kill fiue thousand vpon the place; the rest take a piece of ground of aduantage, and defend themselues, till L. Æmilius, being at Ariminum, comes to their succour. Vpon the comming of the Consull, the Gaules consult, whether they should giue the Romans battaile, or forbeare. In which dispute, Anerœstus, one of their Kings, perswades them, rather to returne into their owne Countries; where, after they had disposed of the great spoiles and riches which they had gotten, they should then renew the warre, being without carriage, pester, or other impediment. This aduice they all embrace; for seeing they that were Mercenaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the spoiles of their enemies; they thought it wisedome, to hazzard neither it, nor themselues, any further.

This indeed had been a good resolution, if they had taken it, before the enemy had been in sight. But as well in the warres of these latter ages, as in former times, it hath euer been found extreme dangerous, to make a retrait in the Head of an Enemies Army. For although they that retire, doe often turne head; yet in alwaies going on from the pursuing enemy, they finde within a few miles, either height, hedge, ditch, or place of disaduantage, which they are inforced to passe in disorder. In such cases, the Souldier knowes it, as well as the Captaine; but he which forsakes the field, perceiues, and feares some aduantage of the Enemies. Fear, which is the betrayer of those succours that Reason offereth, when it hath once possest the heart of man, it casteth thence both courage and vnderstanding. They that make the retrait, are alwayes in feare to be abandoned; they that lead the way, feare to be ingaged: and so the hindmost treads on his heels that is foremost, and consequently, all disband, run, & perish, if those that fauour the retrait, be not held to it by men of great courage. The miserable ouerthrow that the French receiued in Naples, in the yeare 1503. vpon a retrait made by the Marques of Sal, doth testifie no lesse. For although a great troupe of French horse sustained the pursuing Enemy a long time, and gaue the foot leisure to trot away; yet being retarded by often turnings, the Spanish foot ouertooke, and defeated them vtterly. During the wars betweene the Imperials, & the French; Boisi and Mont were lost at Brignolles, who in a brauery would needs see the Enemy, before they left the field. So was Strosi ouerthrowne by the Marques of Marignan, because he could not be perswaded, to dislodge the night before the Marques his arriuall. Therefore did the French King Francis the first, wisely: when without respect of point of honour, he dislodged from before Landersey, by night; as many other, the most aduised Captaines, (not finding themselues in case to giue battaile) haue done. Il ne trouue point (saith the Marshall Monluc) au fait des armes chose si difficile, qu'une retrait; I finde nothing in the art of warre so difficult, as to make a safe retrait. A sure rule it is, that there is lesse dishonor to dislodge in the darke, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof Made la Noüe giues this iudgement of a dayes retrait, made in France, presently before the battaile at Moncountour. For (saith he) staying vpon our reputation, in shew, not to dislodge by night; vve lost our reputation indeede, by dislodging by day: whereby we were forced to fight vpon our disaduantage, and to our ruine. And yet did that vvorthy Gentleman, Count Lodewick of Nassau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retrait at Moncountour with so great resolution, as he saued the one half of the Protestant Army, then broken and disbanded; of vvhich my selfe was an eye-witnesse; and was one of them that had cause to thanke him for it.

Now the Gaules, embracing the safe aduice (as they take it) of one of their Kings; turn their backs to the enemy, and their faces homeward. Æmilius followes them, as neer as he can, without ingaging himselfe, attending his aduantage. In the meane while, C. Atilius the other Consull, with the Legions of Sardinia, lands at Pisa; so as the Gaules, inclosed between two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally strengthen their Rear, and Front. To sustaine Æmilius, they appoint the Gessates, and the Milanois, in the Front, they range the Piemontois, and the rest of the Gaules inhabiting vpon the Riuer of Po. The manner of the fight Polybius describeth at large: which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gaules fell; and so did Atilius the Consull: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gaules, Concolitanus and Aneroëstus, with forty thousand of their Vassals.

After this fatall ouerthrow, the Gaules lost courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italie. For they vvere inuaded the yeare following this ouerthrow, by the new Consuls, Fuluius and Manlius. The Romans knew vvell how to vse their victory: they gaue not ten, twentie, or thirty yeares time, to the Gaules, to repaire their forces, as the Gaules had done to them. These new Consuls beat the Boij; but by reason of the great raines that fell, and the great pestilence that reigned, they were compelled for that present to surcease. In the second yeare, Furius, & Flaminius, inuade the Milanois; and, preuaile very far, being strongly assisted by the Cenomanni and the Venetians. Neuertheless these Consuls were reuoked out of their Prouince, by the Senate of Rome, & compelled to resigne their Office: because the Augures, or Soothsayers, had found, that some token or other of the Birds (in which, and all sorts of their diuination, the Romans were extreamely superstitious) had not onely foreshewed little good, vvhen they vvere chosen, but had also nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiuing letters of this reuocation, from the Senate, & being otherwise aduertised of the contents, was not hastie to open them: but first gaue battaile vnto the enemies, vanquished them, and spoiled their Country; then perused the letters, & returning home obtained a triumph for against the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bare him out, for that he sided in faction with the Commonaltie, though a man of great Nobilitie.

This

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for diuiding the Countrie of the Senones among the people of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, that vnderstanding the Maiestie of Rome to be indeed wholly in the people, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by way of Delegacie, or grand Commission; did not stand highly vpon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, and taught them to know and vse their power, ouer himselfe, and his fellow-Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the surer side, and found imitators, that rose by the same art, which in processe of time grew the onely or chiefe way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being deposed; M. Caudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were chosen Consuls, for the rest of that yeer. The Gaules about this time desired peace, and were like to haue obtained it: though the new Consuls were against it, as seeking to vse their worke. But when thirty thousand of the Gessates, following their King Britomarus, were come ouer the Alpes, & ioyned with the Insubrians: all other discourse, time of present warre, was at an end. So the Consuls hasted into their Prouince, where they besieged Acerræ, a town not farre from Nouara (so far had the Romans pierced already in the Duchie of Milan. To diuert them from this siege, Britomarus sat down before Clastidium, a towne in the same Tract, with great part of his forces, leauing the rest with the Insubrians, to attend vpon the Consuls at Acerræ, and to look to the defence of Milan. But this would not suffice, to make the Romans breake vp their siege. Marcellus, taking with him the greatest part of the horse, and sixe hundred foot lightly armed, thought to deale well enough with those at Clastidium. Britomarus heard of the Consuls comming, and met him vpon the way: so suddenly, that the Romans had no leisure to rest themselues after their iourny, but were compelled instantly to fight. Herein Britomarus had done well, if he had not forthwith, in a rash brauery, lost his game at a cast. He had aduantage enough in number, both of horse and foot: but he thought so well of his owne personall valour, that he rode out single before his Armie, prouoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no lesse daring, than the barbarous king: whether more wise in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, and that sufficed to commend him. He slue and disarmed Britomarus, in presence of both Armies: whereby his owne men tooke such courage, and his enemies were so dismaied, that without much more ado of fight, the Romans obtained a great victory.

This was the third and last time, that euer any Roman Generall slue the Generall of the enemies, with his owne hand. To this kinde of victory, belonged a peculiar triumph, three of onely, Romulus, Cossus, and this Marcellus, had the honour: yet I dare say, both the two Scipio's, and diuers other Roman Captaines, especially Cæsar, were better men of warre than any of these three, though they neuer offered vp to Iupiter, Opima spolia, The Armour of a Generall slaine by himselfe, when they were Generals, nor perhaps affected so to doe.

After this victory, Acerræ was yeelded to the Romans, & Milan soone after, with all that belonged to the Cisalpines, or Gaules, that dwelt in Lumbardie. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had so many yeers vexed the State of Rome, and in former time taken the Citie it selfe, brought to nothing in a short time; their pleasant and fertile Territorie possest by the Romans, and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italie, seruants, as would not subiect their necks to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon their Countries, or to hide themselues in the cold and barren Mountaines, like Ourlaues and Thecues. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twentie yeers, following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at such leisure, that they inclosed vp the Temple of Ianus, which they neuer did before, (it standing alwaies open, when they had any warre saue once, in the reigne of Numa, nor in long time after, till the reigne of Augustus.) But this their present happinesse was not to last long: a dangerous warre, and perhaps the greatest that had euer been, was to come vpon them, which being well ended, they might boldly vndertake, to extend their Monarchie as far, as their ambition could reach.

Chap. III.

Of the second Punick Warre.

The Warres of Hannibal in Spaine. Quarrels betweene the Romans and Carthaginians. Hannibal besieged and taketh Saguntum, whilest the Romans are busied with the Illyrians. Warre proclaimed between Rome and Carthage.

Hannibal, the sonne of Amilcar, was about sixe and twenty yeers old, when he was chosen Generall of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. He was elected by the Armie, as soone as Asdrubal was dead: and the election was ratified by the State of Carthage; wherewith Hanno and his Complices were nothing pleased. This was now the third of the Barchine family (so called of Amilcar, whose surname was Barcas) that had command in chiefe, ouer the men of warre. Which honour would perhaps haue beene lesse enuied, by these domesticall enemies, if the Allies and Friends of the Barchine house, had not also borne the whole sway in gouernment, and been the onely men regarded, both by the Senate and the people. This generall good will, as it was first purchased by the most worthy deserts of Amilcar, in sauing his Countrie from imminent ruine, inlarging the Dominion thereof, and inriching it with treasures and great reuenues; so was it retained by the same good arts, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partisans, being neither able to taxe the vertue of their enemies, that was vnreprouable, nor to performe the like seruices vnto the Common-weale, had nothing left, whereby to value themselues, excepting the generall reprehension of Warre, and cautelous aduice of not prouoking the Romans. This they seasoned other-whiles with detraction, saying, that the Barchine faction went about to oppresse the libertie of the Citie. But their malicious words were vnregarded; and if it were factious, to beare ill will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no lesse Barchine, than Hannibal himselfe. For it was long since apparant, that the oath of the Romans, to the articles of peace, afforded no securitie to Carthage, were she neuer so quiet, and officious; vnlesse she would yeeld to become their Subiect. Since therfore the peace was like to hold no longer, than vntill the Romans could finde some good aduantage, to renew the vvarre: it was rather desired by the Carthaginians, that whilest their owne state was in good case, the vvarre should begin; than that in some vnhappy time of famine or pestilence, or after some great losse of Armie or Fleet, they should be driuen to yeeld vnto the impudent demands of their enemies, and to giue away basely their lands and treasures, as they had lately done, or miserably fight, vpon tearmes of disaduantage.

This disposition of his countrimen, Hannibal well vnderstood. Neither was he ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time deuised of this businesse) that in making war with the Romans, it was no small aduantage to get the start of them. If once he could bring an Armie into Italie, without molestation; there was good hope, that he should finde friends and assistance, euen of those people, that holped to increase the Roman armies in forreine wars. But this could neuer be effected, if the matter vvere openly disputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad soeuer they would be, to heare that he had set the vvar on foot, would neuertheless be slow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterprises, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it should happen, then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not onely with the generalities of his purpose, but with such particulars as must be discoursed of, in procuring allowance to his designe. This might suffice to disorder the whole Proiect. Wherefore, he resolued to lay siege vnto Saguntum, which might seeme not greatly to concerne the Romans, and would highly please the Carthaginians, that had fresh in minde the indignitie of that Spanish Towns alliance with their halfe friends. So should he assaie both the patience of his enemies, and the disposition of his owne Citizens.

Hauing

Hauing this concluded, he neuertheleſſe went faire and orderly to worke: and beginning with thoſe that lay next in his way, approaching vnto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (ſaith Liuie) to giue ſome colour to his proceedings, as if he had not principally intended the warre againſt Saguntum, but had been drawne thither by course of buſineſſe. Yet reaſon teacheth plainly, that (without regard of ſuch formalities, it was needfull to finiſh the conqueſt of the reſt, before he did any thing that ſhould prouoke the Romans. Firſt therefore he entred vpon the Territorie of the * Oleades, and hauing beſieged Althæa (Liuie calleth it Carteia) their chiefe Citie, he became, in a few dayes, Maiſter, not onely thereof, but of all the other townes of their Countrie. This Nation which he firſt vndertooke, being ſubdued, and the winter at hand, he reſted his Armie in New Carthage, or Carthagena, and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the ſpoiles he had gotten in his late conqueſt.

In the Spring following, he purſued the warre againſt the * Vaccæi: and without any great difficulcie, wan firſt Salmantica, now called Salamanca; and after it, b Arbucala, by aſſault, though not without a long ſiege, and great difficulty. But in his returne, he was put to the height, both of his courage, and of his Martiall iudgement. For all ſuch of the Vaccæi, as were able to beare armes, being made deſperate, by the ſpoile of their country, with thoſe of Salamanca, and of the Oleades, that had eſcaped in the late ouerthrow, ioyning themſelues with the Toleans, compounded an Armie of an hundred thouſand able men: and ſtayed Hannibal on the bankes of the Riuer Tagus, which runneth into the Sea by Lisborne in Portugale. Theſe foure Nations, hauing had experience of Hannibals inuincible courage, and that he neuer ſaw enemy, vpon whom he durſt not giue charge, were throughly reſolued, that his naturall valour would at this time no leſſe neglect the cold aduiſe of diſcretion, than at other times it had ſeemed to doe, when the like occaſion perſwaded him to vſe it. But he that makes himſelfe a body of Chriſtall, that all men may look through him, and diſcerne all the parts of his diſpoſition, makes himſelfe (withall) an Aſſe: and thereby teacheth others, either how to vſe, or driue him. Wiſe men, though they haue ſingle hearts in all that is iuſt and vertuous, yet they are like Coffers with double bottomes: which when others looke into, being opened, they ſee not all that they hold, on the ſodden, and at once. It is true, that the noble Carthaginian, when he ſerued vnder Xiphares, was, of all the men of marke in the Armie, the moſt aduenturous. But that which may beſeeme a Captaine, or inferiour Commander, doth not alwaies become a Chiefe; though it hath ſometime ſucceeded well with ſuch great ones, as haue been found more fortunate, than wiſe. At this time, our great Man of warre knew as well how to diſſemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For he with-drew himſelfe from the Riuer ſide, as if fearefull of enemies, thereby to draw ouer that great multitude, from their bankes of aduantage. The Spaniards, apprehending all this in ſuch ſort, as Hannibal deſired that they ſhould, thruſt themſelues in furie and diſorder, into the ſwift ſtreame, with a full purpoſe to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for feare) the defence of the contrary ſide. But when Hannibal ſaw them in their way, and well neare ouer, he turned backe to his Elephants to entertaine the enemie at their landing: and thruſt himſelfe ouer, both aboue and beneath them, into the Riuer. Theſe carrying a ſtrong ſtreame to the ſea, ſharpe at both ends, which they held to the aduantage of the ſtreame, had ſuch aduantage ouer the foot, as ouer-went the Riuer, vnder their ſtrokes, diſperſed together, and vnable to grow to a firme footing, as on firme ground: that they (and all thoſe, (in a manner) without reſiſtance, which were already entred in ſmaller number, and purſued the reſt, chaſed like men vnarmed, with ſo great a fright, that from day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that ſide the Riuer of Ibe- rus, but Saguntines, excepted, that durſt bring to arme vp their hands againſt the Carthaginians, perceiuing the danger to others, erred before they were hurt. [illegible] ſtood, and bemoaned themſelues, as likely to ſuffer that, [illegible] afterwards they ſuffered indeed, onely because of their alliance and friendſhip [illegible] Carthaginians. This late mooued the Se- [illegible] ſtood vpon, that Saguntum was already beſieged. Hereupon ſome cry [illegible] ſhould be prouided by Land and Sea, as alſo that the two Conſuls [illegible] Spaine, the other into Affrick. But others were more Roman-like to worke, and carried it. So it was onely concluded, that Embassadours should be sent into Spaine, to view the state of their Confederates, which were indeed none other than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended warre against Rome, it was likely that he would giue them, ere it were long, a more plausible occasion to take armes against him: if he had no such purpose, yet would it be in their power, to determine what they listed themselues, vpon the report of their Embassadours: and this their grauity in being not too rash at first, would serue to countenance their following Decree. Of these Embassadours Liuie reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum, but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where also they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius an Historian of sincerities lesse questionable, tels, that they found him at Carthagena, & had conference with him, though such as left them doubtfull. This is more agreeable to the rest of Hannibal his whole course. And surely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians should afterwards admit a more peremptorie Embassage (as Liuie confesseth) & fall to disputation about the conditions of peace, if they had reiected that, which was sent vpon none other pretence, than procuration of warre.

Whilest the Embassadours passed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not onely his forces, but some Romane pretences against Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or people that should doe as the Mamertines in Sicil had done for the Romans, and implore his helpe against the Saguntines. These were the Turdetani, a Nation adioyning to Saguntum, & hauing many quarrels with them: (as happens commonly among Neighbours) of which Hannibal himselfe had hatched some. Finding therefore such an occasion, whatsoeuer it was, as made him able to say, that the Saguntines had first prouoked him, ere he meddled with them, he made no more adoe, but sat down with his whole power before their Towne. He was now more secure, than he had formerly been, of his owne Citizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Embassadors with any trembling reuerence, as of late yeers they had been wont. Neuertheless, he was glad of any hood, some colour, to shadow his actions, not onely because the warre, which he so much desired, was not proclaimed: but that he might not be checked in his course, as an open enemy, before he could set foot in Italie. The Romans had the like, though contrary desire. They were glad of the quarrell, as hoping that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, should thereby in short space become their owne. Yet were they not hastie to threaten, before they were ready to strike, but meant to temporize, vntill they had an Army in readinesse to be sent into Spaine, where they thought to make Saguntum, the seate of the Warre.

In the meane while, Demetrius Pharius, whom the Romans had made King ouer a great part of Illyria, rebelled against them: either for that he found himself ouer-mightily tyed vp by them, with hard conditions, or rather because he was of an vnnaturall disposition. The commotion of the Gaules, and afterward, the fame of the Carthaginian warre, emboldened him to despise his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to haue defended and aided, in all perils, euen with the hazard of his whole estate, which he had receiued of their gift. But he was a Traitor to his owne Queene, and therefore dealt according to his kinde, with those that had rewarded him for being such. Finally he built ships & spoiled the Iles of Greece, against the couenants to which he was bound. Thither he aduentured further, & seised vpon some places, that the Romans kept in their owne hands. If he had begun sooner, or rather if he had stayed some what longer, he might haue spoyled more. For the businesse with the Gaules was ended (with Hannibal not through) when he declared himself by his doings an enemy: and was ouercome. The Roman Consul Aemilius was sent against him: and in such order vpon the strong towres of Dimalum, and there he brought such terrour vpon the Countrie round about, that Embassadours were sent from all places, to yeeld themselues, and procure him to forbeare their Cities. And by the Citie of Phanum, in which [illegible] prepared to resist, which he might haue done long, if he had not decided [illegible] been too tedious. [illegible] night, and bestowed them in [illegible] ships before the towne, and offering to [illegible] ilfeet against the Consul, & was soone [illegible] in ambush. Wherfore he fled away through by-paths to Dimalum, [illegible] ready ready for him, and imbarqued himselfe: leauing all his estate vnto them, of whose liberality he first had it.

This businesse, though it were soone dispatched, yet preuented it not the siege of Saguntum, before which Hannibal sate downe, ere Aemilius was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the siege, the Carthaginians were much discouraged, by reason of the braue sallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their Generall receiued a dangerous wound in the thigh, that caused him to lie many dayes vnable to moue. Neuertheless he was not vnmindfull of his worke in the meane while; but gaue order to raise certaine mouable Towers, that might equall those which were built on the wals of the Citie; and to prepare to batter the curtaines, and make a breach. These being finished and applied, had soone wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of diuers Towers, and a great length of wall, whereat an hot assault was giuen: but it was so well sustained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not onely beaten from the breach, and out of some ground within the Towne, which vpon the first furie they had won: but they were pursued euen to their owne trenches and campe. Neuertheless the Carthaginian Armie, wherein were about an hundred and fiftie thousand men, did so vexe the townesmen with continuall trauaile, that at length it got within the wals; and was onely hindred from taking full possession of the Citie, by some counter-works of the Saguntines, that were also ready to be won. In this extremity, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conueyed himselfe out of the towne, to treat with Hannibal for some accord. But the conditions vvhich the Carthaginian offered, vvere so seuere, & without all compasse of honour, as Alcon durst not returne to propound them to his countrimen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had, gold, siluer, plate, and other riches within the citie: yea, the citie it selfe to be abandoned by the citizens, promising, that he would assigne some other place for their habitation: not allowing them, to carry out with them any other thing, vvherewith to sustaine themselues, than the cloathes on their backes; or other armes, to defend them, than their nailes and teeth. Yet might they haue better haue submitted themselues vnto this miserable appointment, (seeing thereby they might haue inioyed their liues, and saued the honour of their wiues and daughters) than to haue rested at the discretion of the Conquerour, as soone after they did: by whom their vvliues and daughters were deflowred before their own facts, and all put to sword, that were aboue fourteen yeers of age. For it vvas a poore comfort, which a great number of them tooke; vvhen not daring to fight, and sell their bloud at the dearest rate, they shut themselues vp like most vvretched creatures in their own houses, and therein burnt themselues vvith all that they had: so dying vnreuenged. The treasure found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept, therwith to pay his Armie: the slaues, and other bootie, he diuided among his Souldiers, reseruing some things of choice, vvherewith to present his friends at Carthage, and to animate them vnto the Warre.

These tidings exceedingly vexed the Romans, who had good cause to be angry at their own slowneſse, in forbearing to send helpe vnto the Saguntines, that held out eight moneths, looking still for succour, but in vaine. Wherefore they determined to repaire their honour, by taking sharpe reuenge. To this end they sent Embassadours against Carthage: demanding onely, whether it were by generall consent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had made warre vpon Saguntum: which if they granted (as they seemed they would) then to giue them defiance. Hereunto answere was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect: That this their second Embassage, howsoeuer qualified with milde words, vvas indeed more insolent than the former. For in that, they onely required iustice against Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Commonwealth of Carthage, was vrged to plead guilty, or not guilty. But (said the Carthaginian speaker) whether the Generall of our Armie in Spain, in besieging Saguntum, haue only followed his owne counsaile; or vvhether he did it, by direction from vs: it is not the question which the Romans ought to aske vs. That which is indeed worthy examination or dispute, is, whether it were lawfull or vnlawfull for Hannibal to do as he hath done. For it belongs to vs, to call our own Commanders in question, and to punish them according to their faults and errors, to you, to challenge vs, if we haue done any thing contrary to our late League and contracts. It is true, that in our negotiation with Lutatius the Consull, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no dispute. As touching the last agreement, between you and Asdrubal, wherein you will say, that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that haue taught vs, how to answer that particular. For whatsoeuer you found in the Treatie between vs and Lutatius, to your owne disaduantage, you call it vpon your Consuls presumption, as promising those things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and People of Rome. If then it be lawfull for the Romans, to disauow the actions of their Consuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctuall and precise warrant; the same liberty may we also assume, and hold our selues no way bound in honour, to performe those bargaines, which Asdrubal hath made for vs, without our commandement and consent.

This was an impertinent answer, and little better than a meere cauill. For Lutatius the Consul, in his Treatie of peace with the Carthaginians, had expressly reserued the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had been therefore much better, to haue dealt plainely; and to haue alleadged, That after this League was made, and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Ile of Sardinia, and withall of twelue hundred talents: which periurie the State of Carthage, being now growne able, would reuenge with open warr. As for the Saguntines, it little skilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacie; and forthwith inserted their names into the Treatie of peace with Asdrubal: seeing that the Treatie with Asdrubal, and all other businesse between Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman iniuries, as implying this commination, Do whatsoeuer we require, else will we make warre, without regard of our oath, which we haue already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alledge, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the best of their Plea. Yet since Liuie himselfe doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the spirit of Hannibal with desire of reuenge: we may reasonably thinke, that the mention of this iniurie was omitted, not so much vpon forgetfulnesse, as for that it was not thought conuenient, by ripping vp such ancient matter of quarrell, to shew that the warr, now towards, had long been thought vpon, and like to be made with extraordinary force, in other manner than heretofore. In conclusion, the Carthaginian Senate moued the Roman Embassadors, to deliuer vnto them in plain termes the purposes of those that sent them, and the worst of that, which they had long determined against them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberus, those were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering vp the skirt of his Gowne, as if somewhat had beene laid in the hollow thereof, made this short reply: I haue here (quoth he) in my Gowne-skirt both Peace and War: make you (my Masters of the Senate) election of these two, which of them you like best, & purpose to imbrace. Hereat all cryed out at once, Giue which of them you your selfe haue a fancy to offer vs. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the Warre, and share it among you. Which all the assembly willingly accepted.

This was plaine dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had resolued to make warre, it was meerely friuolous. For all these disputes of breach of peace, haue euer bin maintained by the partie vnwilling, or vnable to sustaine the warre. The naked sword, and the emptie purse, doe alwaies plead performance of couenants. There haue been few Kings or States in the World, that haue otherwise vnderstood the obligation of a Treatie, than with the condition of their owne aduantage: and commonly (seeing peace between ambitious Princes and States, is but a kinde of breathing the best aduised haue rather begun with the sword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonois with the French in Naples; Henry the second of France, with the Imperials, when he wrote to Brissac, to surprise as many places as he could, ere the war brake out; Queen Elizabeth with the Netherlands, and Philip the second of Spaine, with the English, when in the great Imbarge he robbe all our ships and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, besides the publike strength of Carthage, and the common feeling of iniuries receiued from these enemies, had another priuate and hereditarie desire, that violently carried him against the Romans. His father Amilcar, at what time he did sacrifice being ready to take his iourney into Spaine, had solemnly bound him by oath, to pursue them with immortall hatred, and to worke them all possible mischiefe, as soone as he

he should be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine yeeres old, when his father caused him to lay his hand vpon the Altar, and make this vow: so that it was no marueil, if the impression were strong in him.

That is inhumane, to bequeath hatred in this sort, as it were by Legacy, it cannot be denyed. Yet for mine owne part, I doe not much doubt, but that some of these Kings, with whom we are now in peace, haue receiued the like charge from their Predecessors, that assoone as their coffers shall be full, they shall declare themselues enemies to the people of England.

§. II.

Hannibal takes order for the defence of Spaine, and Africk. His iourney into Italy.

WArre being thus proclaimed, Hannibal resolued, not to put vp his sword, which he had drawne against the Saguntines, vntill he had therewith opened his passage vnto the gates of Rome. So began the second Punicke Warre, second to none, that euer the Senate and people of Rome sustained. Hannibal wintered at Carthagena, where he licensed his Spanish Souldiers to visit their friends, and refresh themselues against the Spring. In the meane while he gaue instructions to his brother Asdrubal, for the gouernment of Spaine in his absence. He also tooke order, to send great many troopes of Spaniards into Africke, to equall the numbers of Africans formerly drawne thence into Spaine, to the end, that so the one Nation might remaine as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he transported into Africk three thousand, eight hundred and fiftie foot, and twelue hundred horse; also eight hundred slingers of the * Balearyes. Besides these, he selected foure thousand foot, all young men, and of qualitie, out of the best Cities of Spaine, which he appointed to be garrisoned in Carthage it selfe, not so much in regard of their forces, as that they might serue for hostages: for among those foure thousand, the best of the Spanish Citizens, and those that swayed most in their seuerall States, had their Sonnes or Kinsmen. He also left with his brother, to guard the coast and Ports, fiftie and seuen Gallies, whereof thirty seuen were presently armed, and appointed for the warre. Of Africans and other Nations strangers, he left with him about twelue thousand foote, and two thousand horse, besides one and twenty Elephants.

Hauing in this sort taken order for the defence of Spaine and Africk, he sent Discouerers before him, to view the Passages of the Pyrenæan Mountaines, and of the Alpes. He also sent Embassadors to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gauls, to obtain a free passage: that he might bring his Armie entire into Italy, and not bee compelled to diminish his forces, by any warre in the way, till hee came to encounter the Romans. His Embassadors and discouerers being returned with good satisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, he past ouer the Riuer of Iberus, with an Armie consisting of fourescore and ten thousand foot, and twelue thousand horse. All those parts of Spaine, into which he had not entred before, he now subdued: and appointed Hanno (not that old enemie of his house, who sate still at Carthage) to gouern Spaine on the East side of Iberus, whom he left an Army of ten thousand foot, and one thousand horse. Being arriued at the borders of Spaine, some of his Spanish Souldiers returned home, without asking leaue; which that others might not also doe, or attempt, he courteously dismissed many more, that seemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to passe, that the iourney seemed the lesse tedious vnto those that accompanied him; as being not enforced by compulsion. With the rest of his Armie, consisting now but of fiftie thousand foot, & nine thousand horse, he past the Pyrenes, & entred into Gaule. He found the Gauls that bordered vpon Spaine, ready in Armes, to forbid his entrance into their Countrey: but won them with gentle speech, and rich presents that hee bestowed vpon their Leaders, to ioyne in his Expedition. So without any molestation, he came to the banke of Rhodanus, where dwelt, on each side of the Riuer, a people called Volcæ. These were vnacquainted with the cause of his comming; and therefore sought to keepe him from passing ouer the water. But he was greatly assisted by some of those Gaules, that inhabited on the West side of Rhodanus, to wit, by those of Viuarez and Lionnois. For although many of them had transported themselues and their goods, into the Countrie of Dauphine, phino, thinking to defend the further banke against him: yet such remained, being very desirous to free their Countrie of so many ill guests, were better pleased to haue their Countrie-men well beaten, which had abandoned them, than to haue their owne store of corne and cattell wasted, by the long stay of so great an Army, as lay vpon them. For which reason, they helped him to make boates, informed him of another more easie passage, higher vp the Riuer: and lent him guides. When the Vessels for transportation of his Armie were in readinesse, he sent Hanno, the sonne of Bomilcar, vp the Riuer: himselfe in the meane while making countenance to enter the Foord below. The end of this labour, was: that Hanno charging the Gaules vnawares vpon their owne side, and Hannibal, at the same time, passing the Riuer in their faces, the further banke was wonne, though with some difficultie, and the enemies dispersed. Yet was he greatly troubled in conueying ouer his Elephants; who maruellously feared the water. Hee was therefore driuen to make raffes of trees, and couer them with earth and Turfe; whereof he fastened one to each banke, that might serue as a bridge, to and from another of the same sort, but loose, vpon which the beasts were towed ouer.

Hauing past this first brunt, and ouer-come both the rage of the Riuer, and of those that defend it, he was visited by the Princes of the Gaules Cisalpines, that inhabited Piemont and Milan, who lately had reuolted from the Romans. These informed him of the passages of the Alpes, that they were not so difficult, as common report made them; and from these he receiued guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithstanding, he found himselfe extreamely incombred by the Sauoians: and lost diuers of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he should. For he was twice mainely assailed by them, before he could recouer the plaine Countries on the other side. And whereas this iourney ouer the Mountaines cost him fifteene dayes trauaile, hee was euery day, more or lesse, not onely charged by those Mountaingers, but withall extreamely beaten with grieuous weather and snow; it being the beginning of Winter, when he began, and ouer-came this passage. But the faire and fertile Plaines, which were now ready to receiue them; with the assistance and conduct of the Cisalpine Gaules, who by their proper forces had so often inuaded the Roman Territorie; gaue them great comfort and encouragement to goe on: hauing nothing else of difficultie remaining, but that which from the beginning they made account to ouer-come, by their proper valour and resolution; namely the Roman Armies, and resistance.

§. III.

How the Romans in vaine sollicited the Spaniards and Gaules to take their part. The malice of the Cisalpine Gaules against the Romans.

THe Countries of Spaine and Gaule, through which the Carthaginians marched thus farre, had beene sollicited before, by the same Roman Embassadors, who had denounced the warre at Carthage. These, as they were instructed by the Senate, took Spaine in their way homeward from Carthage, with a purpose to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at least to dissuade them from contracting any friendship with the Carthaginians. The first which they attempted, were the Volcians, a people in Spaine; from whom, in open assembly, they receiued by one that spake for the rest, this vncomfortable answer: With what face (saith he) can ye Romans perswade vs to value your Alliance, or to prefer it before the friendship of the Carthaginians; seeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wise than so? For they, relying on your faith and promised assistance, haue beene vtterly rooted out, & destroyed by the Carthaginians, whom they might else haue held their assured friends, and good neighbours, as wee, and other the people of Spaine haue found them. Ye may therefore be gone, with this resolution from vs, That for our parts (and so I thinke, I may answer for the rest of our Countrimen) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindnesse at our hands; who are resolued, neuer to make account of their protection, nor amitie. From the Volcians, the Embassadors tooke their way towards the Gaules, vsing their best arguments to perswade them not to suffer the Carthaginians to passe into Italy, through their Territory: and withall greatly glorifying themselues, ſelues, their ſtrength, and large Dominion. But the Gaules laught them to ſcorne, and had hardly the patience, to heare them ſpeake. For ſhall we (ſaid one of their Princes) by reſiſting Hannibals paſſage into Italy, entertain a warre which is not meant to be made againſt vs? Shall we hold the warre among our ſelues, and in our owne Territorie, by force, which marcheth with a ſpeedy pace from vs, towards our ancient enemies? Haue the Romans deſerued ſo well of vs, & the Carthaginians ſo ill, that we ſhould ſet fire on our owne houſes, to ſaue theirs from burning? No, we know it well, that the Romans haue already forced ſome Nations of ours, out of their proper Territorie and inheritance; and conſtrained others, as free as themſelues, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our enemies, who haue no way as yet offended vs, our owne.

With this vnpleaſing anſwer the Embaſſadors returned home; carrying no good newes, of friends likely to helpe them; but rather ſome aſſurance from the people of Maſſilia, which were Confederates with Rome, that the Gaules were determined to take part with their enemie. Of this inclination, the Cisalpine Gaules gaue haſtie proofe. For when the newes was brought into Italy, that the Carthaginians had paſſed Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone ſufficed to ſtirre vp the Boij, and Inſubrians, againſt the Romans. Theſe people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore vpon the Carthaginian ſuccour, which they ſuppoſed to be now at hand; they laid aſide all regard of thoſe hoſtages, which they had giuen to the Romans, and fell vpon the new Colonies. The Townes it ſeemes they could not winne; for Hannibal ſhortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commiſſioners, (who belike were abroad in the Countrie) to flie to Modena: where they beſieged them. The ſiege of Modena had continued ſome ſmall time, when the Gaules, hauing little skill in aſſaulting Cities, waxed wearie, & ſeemed deſirous to haue peace, and to come to ſome good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpoſe, to draw on ſome meeting, that they might there-by lay hand vpon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeemie their Hoſtages, in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wiſh. For the Romans ſent out Embaſſadours to treat with them, and to conclude a peace; whom they detained, Manlius the Praetor, who lay in theſe quarters with an Armie, hearing this outrage; marched in all haſte to the reliefe of the beſieged. But the Gaules, hauing laid a ſtrong ambuſh in a wood ioyning to the way, fell vpon the Praetor ſo opportunely, as hee was vtterly ouerthrowne, and all his followers left dead in the place; a few excepted, that recouered by ſwimming, a little village, but defenſible, vpon the Riuer of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Atilius, another of the Praetors, was haſtily ſent, to relieue the beſieged, with a legion, and fiue thouſand of the Roman allociates: which forces were taken out of the Conſuls Armie, and ſupplied by a new leuie.

As the Gaules were too raſh and haſtie: ſo were the Romans too ſlow, and indeed too ill-aduiſed, in the beginning of this warre. They were not perſwaded, that Carthage, which had almoſt ſeruilely endured ſo many indignities, in time of the late peace, would haſt hither ſo courageous on the ſudden, as to attempt the conqueſt of Italy it ſelfe. Therefore they appointed one of their Conſuls, to make warre in Spaine, the other in Affrick, thinking ſecure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius tooke his way toward Affrick, with an hundred and ſixty Quinqueremes, or Galleis, of ſixe to an oare, which preparation may ſeem to threaten euen the Citie of Carthage, to which it ſhall not do any harme. Cneius Scipio, the other Conſull, made all poſſible haſte, by the way of Gaul into Prouence; and vſed ſuch diligence, hauing the wind proſperous, as in fiue dayes he recouered Maſſilia. There he was aduertiſed of Hannibal his hauing paſſed the Riuer of Rhodanus, whom he thought to haue found hard by, yet as yet a while in Spaine. He had alſo newes of the Conſuls arriuall: whereat he was not halfe glad, nor ſorry; as not meaning to haue to doe with him. Each of them ſent forth Scouts, to diſcouer the others dealings and doings: Hannibal, about fiue hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his beſt appointed Romane horſe. The horſes met, and fought, and the Numidians were beaten: yet could not the Romans greatly reioyce, hauing gotten onely two hundreth, and loſt of their owne, one hundred and fortie. But when Scipio drew neere, to haue ſet with the Carthaginians; he found, that they were gone about fiue dayes before; and that, as he then found, ſtraightly purſued by the Conſull of Rome.

This

This interrupted him in good voyage into Spaine. Neuertheleſſe hee ſent away thither his brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greateſt part of his Fleet and Army, to trie what might be done againſt Aſdrubal & the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in that Countrie. He himſelfe, taking with him a few choice bands, returned by Sea to Piſa, and ſo paſſing through Tuſcane into Lombardie, drew together the broken troups of Manlius & Atilius that lately had bin beaten by the Gaules: with which forces hee made head againſt the enemie, thinking to finde him ouer-laboured, with trauaile of his painefull iourney.

§. III.

Scipio the Romane Conſul ouercome by Hannibal at Ticinum. Both of the Romane Conſuls beaten by Hannibal; in a great battell at Trebia.

How much Moneths Hannibal had ſpent in his tedious iourney from Carthagena, what great muſter he could make, when hee had paſſed the Alpes, it is not eaſily found. Some reckon his foote at an hundred thouſand, & his horſe at twentie thouſand; others report them to haue beene onely twentie thouſand foot, and ſixe hundred horſe. Hannibal himſelfe, in his Monument which he raiſed, in the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, ſpeaketh with the latter ſumme. Yet the Gaules, Ligurians, and others that ioyned with him, are likely to haue mightily increaſed his Armie, in ſhort ſpace. But when hee marched Eaſtward from the bankes of Rhodanus, he had with him eight & thirty thouſand foot, and eight thouſand horſe, of which, all ſaue thoſe remembred by himſelf in the Inſcription of his Altar in Iuno's Temple, are like to haue periſhed, by diſeaſes, enemies, Riuers, and Mountaines; which miſchiefes had deuoured, each, their ſeuerall ſhare.

Hauing newly paſſed the Alpes, and ſcarce refreſhed his wearied Armie in the Countrie of Piemont; he ſought to win the friendſhip of the [a] Taurini, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held warre at that time with the Inſubrians, which were his good friends; and refuſed (perhaps for the ſame cauſe) his amitie. Wherefore he aſſaulted their Towne; and wanne it by force in three daies. Their ſpoyle ſerued well to learne his Armie, and their calamitie, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gaules, without more adoe, fell vnto his ſide: many for feare, many alſo for good-will, according to their former inclination. This diſpoſition raunt through the whole Countrie: which ioyned, or was all in readineſſe to ioyne with the Carthaginians; when the newes of Scipio the Conſul his arriuall, made ſome to be more aduiſed, than the reſt. The name of the Romans was terrible in thoſe quarters, what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Conſull was already gotten through the moſt defenſible paſſages, ere any ſpeech had beene heard of his approach: many ſide ſtill for very feare, who elſe would faine haue concluded a League with theſe new-come friends, and ſome, for greater feare, offered their ſeruice againſt the Carthaginians, whom neuertheleſſe they had wiſhed well to ſpeed.

[a] Theſe dwelt about Turine, a goodly City, now ſubiect vnto the Duke of Sauoy: which from them tooke the name of Auguſta Taurinorum.

This wauering affection of the Prouince, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals haſten to the triall of a battaile. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pauia, where each of them wondred at the others expedition. Hannibal thinking it ſtrange that the Conſul whom hee had left behinde him on the other ſide of the Alpes, ſhould meet him in the face, before he had well warmed himſelfe in the Plaines; Scipio admiring the ſtrange aduenture of paſſing thoſe Mountaines, and the great ſpirit of his enemie. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed at Hannibals ſucceſſe, and ſudden arriuall. Wherefore they diſpatched a Meſſenger in all haſte vnto Sempronius, the other Conſul that remained in Sicilie, giuing him to vnderſtand hereof: & leauing him further to know, that whereas he had bin directed to make the warre in Africa, it was not their pleaſure that he ſhould forbeare to proſecute any ſuch attempt, but that he ſhould haſten the Armie vnder his charge, with all poſſible ſpeed, to ſaue Italy it ſelfe. According to this order, Sempronius ſent off his Fleet from Lilybæum, with direction to land the Armie at Ariminum, a Port Towne not farre from Rauenna, quite another way from Carthage, whither he was making haſte. In the meane while, Scipio and Hannibal were come ſo neere, that fight they muſt, ere they could part aſunder. Hereupon both of them preparell the minds of their Soldiers, by the beſt arguments they had: vnto which Hannibal added the Rhetoricke of a perſend example, that he ſhewed vpon ſeuen hunprisoners of the Sauoyans, which he brought along with him fitted for the purpose, into Italy. For these, hauing beene no lesse miserably fettered and chained, than sparingly fed; and withall so often scourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their desire, than to bee deliuered from their miseries by any kinde of present death, were brought into the middle of the Armie: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with some other of his Companions, til the one of them were slaine, with condition being the Victor, to receiue his libertie, and some small reward. This was no sooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cause lots to be cast, which of them should enter the List, with such weapons, as the Chieftaines of the Gaules were wont to vse in single combats. Euery one of these vnhappy men wished, that his owne lot might speed; whereby it should at least bee his good fortune, to end his miseries by death, if not to get a reward by victorie. That couple, whose good hap it was to be chosen, fought resoluedly: as rather desiring, than fearing death, and hauing none other hope, than in vanquishing. Thus were some few couples matched, it skilled not how equally: for all these poore creatures were willing, vpon whatsoeuer vneuen termes, to ridde themselues out of slauerie. The same affection that was in these Combatants, and in their fellowes which beheld them, wrought also vpon the Carthaginians, for whom the spectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by winning the victory had gotten his liberty, together with an horse and armour: but euen him also, who being slaine in fight, had escaped that miserable condition, vnto which his Companions were returned. Their Generall perceiuing what impression this dumbe shew had wrought in them, began to admonish them of their owne condition, speaking to this effect: That hee had laid before them an example of their owne estates: seeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to runne the same fortune, that these slaues had done; all to liue victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which these prisoners esteemed farre more grieuous) to liue in a perpetuall slauerie: That none of them all, in whom was common sense, could promise to himselfe any hope of life by flight, since the Mountaines, the Riuers, the great distance from their owne Countries, and the pursuit of mercilesse Enemies, must needs retrench all such innocent imaginations. Hee therefore praied them to remember, that they, who had euen now praised the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquished, would make it their owne case; seeing that there was neuer any in the world, appointed with such a resolution, that had euer had bin broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrarie, hee told them that the Romans, who were to fight vpon their owne soile, & in view of their owne Townes; who knew as many waies to saue themselues by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withall, could no way entertaine such a resolution as theirs: seeing the same necessitie, (to which nothing seemes impossible) did no way presse them, or constraine them. In this sort did Hannibal, with one substantiall argument, That there was no meane betweene Victorie and Death, encourage his Companions. For, (saith a great Captaine of France) la comodite de la retraicte aduance la fuite; The commoditie of a retrait, doth greatly aduance a flat running away.

Scipio on the other side, after that he had giuen order for the laying of a bridge ouer the Riuer of Ticinus, did not neglect to vse the best arguments and reasons he could, to encourage the Army he led: putting them in minde of the great conquests and victories of their Ancestors; against how many Nations they had preuailed; and ouer how many Princes, their Enemies, they had triumphed. As for this Armie commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late warre they had so often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withall to consider, that at this time it was not onely so diminished in numbers, as it rather seemed a troupe of Brigants and Theeues, than an Army likely to encounter the Romans, but so weather-beaten, and starued, as neither the men, nor horses, had strength or courage to sustaine the first charge that should be giuen vpon them. Nay (said he) yee your selues may make iudgement what daring they haue now remaining, after so many trauailes and miseries; seeing when they were in their best strength, after they had past the Roane, their horse-men were not onely beaten by ours, and driuen back to the very Trenches of their Camp, but Hannibal himselfe, fearing our approach, ranne head-long towards the Alpes: thinking it a lesse dishonour, to die there by frost, famine, and precipitation, than by the sharpe swords of the Romans, which had so often cut downe his people both in Africa, and in Sicil. It was not long after this, ere the two Generalles met each being far aduanced before the grosse of his Armie, with his Horse, and the Romain hauing also with him some light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they discouered the approach one of the other; Scipio sent before him his horsemen of the Gaules, to begin the fight, and bestowing his Darters in the voide ground betweene their troupes, to assist them: himselfe with his Roman men at armes followed softly in good order. The Gaules (whether desirous to trie the mettall of the Carthaginians, or hoping therby to get fauour of the Romans) behaued themselues courageously, and were as courageously opposed. Yet their foot that should haue aided them, shranke at the first brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without casting a Dart, for feare of being troden downe by the enemies horse. This notwithstanding, the Gaules maintained the fight, and did more hurt than they receiued, as presuming that they were well backt. Neither was the Consull vnmindfull to relieue them: their hardinesse deserving his aide, and the hastie flight of those that should haue stood by them, admonishing him that it was needfull. Wherefore he aduentured himselfe so farre, that he receiued a dangerous wound; and had beene left in the place, if his sonne (afterward surnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others giue the honour of this rescue to a Ligurian slaue. Whilest the Romans were busied in helping their Consull, an vnexpected storme came driuing at their backes, and made them looke about how to helpe themselues. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horse, to giue vpon the Romans in flanke, and to compasse them about, whilest hee with his men at Armes sustained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in pieces the scattered foot, that ranne away at the first encounter; and then falling on the backs of those, whose lookes were fastened vpon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impression, the Romans were shuffled together, and routed: so that they all betooke them to their speed, and left vnto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio saw his horsemen thus beaten, and the rest of his Armie thereby greatly discouraged; he thought it a point of Wisedome, hauing lost so many of his Fleet vpon the first puffe of the winde, to take Port with the rest, before the extreamest of the tempest ouertooke him. For he saw by the lowring morning what manner of day it was like to proue. Therefore his battaile of foot being yet vnbroken, he in a manner stole the retrait, and recouered the bridge ouer Ticinus, which hee had formerly built. But notwithstanding all the haste that he made, he left fiue hundred of his Reare behinde him, who were the last that should haue passed, and staid to breake the bridge. Herein he followed this rule of a good man of warre, Si certamen quandoq; dubium videatur, ita tamen ut arripiat fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which must be vnderstood in this sort: If a Generall of an Armie, by some vnprosperous beginnings doubt the successe, & finde his Army fearefull or wauering; it is more profitable to steale a safe retrait, than to abide the vncertaine euent of battaile.

It was two daies after, ere Hannibal could passe the Riuer; Scipio the whilest refreshing his men, and easing himselfe of his wound in Placentia. But as soone as Hannibal presented his Armie before the Towne, offering battaile to the Romans, who durst not accept it, nor issue forth of their Campe, the Gaules, that hitherto had followed Scipio for feare, gathered out of his feare, courage to forsake him. They thought that now the long-desired time was come, in which better Chieftaines and Souldiers, than Anerestus Istomarus, and Gessates, were come to helpe them, if they had the hearts to help themselues. Wherefore the same night they fell vpon the Roman Campe, wounded and slue many, especially of those guards that kept watch at the gate, with whose heads in their hands, they fled ouer to the Carthaginians, and presented their seruice. Hannibal receiued them exceeding courteously, and dismist them to their owne places: as men likely to bee of more vse to him, in perswading the rest of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other seruice at the present.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Consull stole a retrait, as he had done before, but not with the like ease and securitie. Hannibal had a good eye vpon him, and ere he could get farre, sent the Numidians after him, following himselfe with all his Armie. That night the Romans had receiued a great blow, if the Numidians greedy of spoile, had not staid to ransacke their Campe, and thereby giuen time to all, saue some few in Reare, that were slaine or taken, to passe the Riuer of Trebia, and saue themselues.

being vnable to trauile by reason of his wound, & withall finding it expedient to attend the comming of his fellow-Consull, incamps himselfe strongly vpon the bankes of Trebia. Necessitie required that he should so doe; yet his determined resolution for euery day, more and more of the Gaules fell to the Carthaginian side, among whom came the Boy, that brought with them the Roman Commissioners, which they had taken the late insurrection. They had hitherto kept them as pledges, to redeeme their own Hostages: but now they deliuer them vp to Hannibal, as tokens and pledges of their affections towards him; by whose help they conceiued better hope of recouering their owne men and lands. In the meane while, Hannibal, being in great scarcity of victuals, attempted the taking of Clastidium, a Towne wherein the Romans had laid vp all their store and munition. But there needed no force; a Brundusian, whom the Romans had trusted with keeping it, sold it for a little money.

The newes of these disasters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather with desire of hastie reuenge, than any great sorrow for their losse receiued, seeing that in this manner, all their foot, wherein their strength and hope consisted, were as yet entire. They therefore hasted away Sempronius, that was newly arriued, towards Ariminum, where the Armie, by him sent ouer of Sicil, awaited his comming. Hee therefore hasted thither, & from thence he marched speedily towards his Colleague: who attended him vpon the bankes of Trebia. Both the Armies being ioyned in one, the Consuls deuised what was remained to be done: Sempronius receiuing from Scipio the relation of what had passed since Hannibals arriuall, the fortune of the late fight, and by what error or default of the Romans they were therein foiled; which Scipio chiefly laid to the reuolt and treason of the Gaules.

Sempronius, hauing receiued from Scipio the state of the affaires in those parts, sought by all meanes to trie his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recouered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchase to himselfe the sole glorie of the victory, which he had already, in his imagination, certainely obtained. Hee also feared the election of newe Consuls: his owne time being well-neere expired. But Scipio perswaded the contrarie, obiecting the vnskilfulnesse of the new-come Souldiers: and withall gaue him good reason, to assure him that the Gaules, naturally vnconstant, were vpon euery occasion ready to change the party of the Carthaginians; those of them inhabiting betweene the Riuers of Trebia and Po, being already reuolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haste to finde out the disaduantage which he might otherwise easily haue auoided. This resolution of Sempronius was also exceeding pleasing to Hannibal: who feared nothing so much as delay and losse of time: for his strength of his Armie, consisting in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gaules, had more need to feare the change of affection in the one, than the impatiencie of the other: who being farre from their owne home, had many passions moouing them to turne their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gaules inhabiting neere vnto Trebia, complained of iniuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as hee supposed that they might haue done; although he daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their sakes, and to set them at libertie, he had vndertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore hee could not make them regard his words, he was bold to be his owne Caruer, & to take from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they fled to the Romans for helpe: and, to make their tale the better, say that this wrong is done them because they refused to ioyne with Hannibal. Scipio cared not much for this, but suspected their falshood, and was assured of their mutability. But Sempronius affirmed, that it stood with the honor of Rome, to preserue their Confederates from suffering iniurie: & that hereby might be wonne the friendship of all the Gaules. Therefore he sent out three hundred horse: which comming vnlooked for vpon Hannibal his forragers, and finding them heauy loaden, cut many of them in pieces, and chased the rest euen into their own campe. This indignitie made the Carthaginians sallie out against them: who easily made them retire faster than they came. Sempronius was ready to backe his owne men, and repulsed the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length, all their Roman Armie was drawne forth, and a battaile readie to bee fought, if the Carthaginian had not (new-king some; beating the Gaules that a bee-ware; and wiuning the Ligurians to his

deſirous to trie the maine chance in open field: all the perſwaſions of Magon to the contrarie notwithſtanding. Of this diſpoſition Hannibal was aduertiſed by the Gaules his ſpies, that were in the Roman Campe. Therefore he bethought himſelfe how to helpe forward the victorie, by adding ſome ſtratagem to his forces: hee found in the hollow of a water-courſe, ouer-growne with high reede, a fit trench to couer an ambuſh. Thereinto he caſt his brother Mago with a thouſand choyce horſe, and as many foot. The reſt of his Armie, after they had well warmed, and well fed themſelues in their campe, hee led into the field, and marched towards the Conſul. Early in the morning, hee had ſent ouer Trebia ſome companies of Numidian light-horſe; to braue the enemie, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his faſt. Sempronius was ready to take his opportunitie to fight: and therefore not onely iſſued out of his Campe, but forded the Riuer of Trebia, in a moſt cold and miſerable day; his foot being wet almoſt to the arme-holes: which, together with the want of food, did ſo enfeeble and coole their courages, as they wanted force to handle the armes they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their owne Nation, as of the Latines: hauing of the one, ſixteene, of the other, twentie thouſand. The maſſe of theſe they ranged in a groſſe Battalion, guarded on the flankes with three thouſand horſe: thruſting their light-armed, and Darters, in looſe troupes in the head of the reſt, in the nature of a Vantguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot, were in a manner equall to their enemies; in horſe, they had by farre the better, both in number and goodneſſe. When therefore the Roman horſe, ranged on the flankes of their foot, were broken by the Numidians, when their foot were charged both in front and flanke, by the Spaniards, Gaules, and Elephants; when finally the whole Armie was vnawares preſt in the Reare, by Mago and his two thouſand, that roſe out of their place of ambuſh: then fell the Romans, by heapes, vnder the enemies ſwords, and being beaten downe, as well fighting in diſorder, as flying towards the Riuer, of the horſemen that purſued them, there eſcaped no more of fiue and thirtie thouſand, than ten thouſand of all ſorts, Horſe and Foot.

Three great errours Sempronius committed, of which euery one deſerued to bee recompenced with the loſſe that followed. The firſt was, that he fought with Hannibal in a Champaine, being by farre inferiour in horſe, and withall thereby ſubiect to the African Elephants, which in incloſed or vn-euen grounds and wood-lands, would haue been of no vſe. His ſecond error was, that he made no diſcouerie of the place vpon which he fought; whereby he was groſſely ouer-reacht, and inſnared, by the ambuſh which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that hee drencht his footmen with emptie ſtomacks, in the Riuer of Trebia, euen in a moſt cold and froſtie day, whereby in effect they loſt the vſe of their limbs. For as one ſaith well; There is nothing more inconuenient and perilous, than to preſent an Armie tyred with trauaile, to an enemie freſh and fed; ſince where the ſtrength of body faileth, the generoſitie of minde is but a vaine vnprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Armie, was collected by Scipio, who got therewith into Placentia; ſtealing away the ſame night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians, who either perceiued him not, becauſe of the ſhowres, or would not perceiue him, becauſe they were ouer-wearied. Sempronius eſcaped with extreame danger, flying through the Countrie that was ouer-runne by the enemies horſe. Hee was attended by more, than were requiſite in a ſecret flight; yet by fewer, than could haue made reſiſtance, if the enemie had met with him. Neuertheleſſe hee got away, and came to Rome, where he did his office in chooſing new Conſuls for the yeere following: and then returned into his Prouince, with a freſh ſupply againſt Hannibal.

§. V.

The departure of Hannibal from the Ciſalpine Gaules into Hetruria. Flaminius the Conſul ſlaine; and his Army deſtroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thraſimene.

The Winter growing on apace, was very ſharpe, and vnfit for ſeruice; to the great contentment of the Romans, who being not able to keepe the field, lay warme in Placentia, and Cremona. Yet Hannibal did not ſuffer them to be very quiet: but vexed them with continuall Alarmes; eſſaying diuers places, and taking ſome; beating the Gaules their adherents; and winning the Lygurians to his part, who preſented him, in token of their faithfull loue, with two Roman Conſuls Treaſurers, Treasurers, two Colonels and fiue Gentlemen the Sonnes of Senatours, which they had intercepted. These, and in generall all such prisoners as he had of the Romans, he held in streight places, loaden with yrons, and miserably fedde: those of their followers he not onely well intreated, but sent them to their Countries without ransome; with this protestation, That he therefore vndertooke the Warre in Italie to free them from the oppression of the Romans. By these meanes he hoped, and not in vaine, to draw many of them to his partie and assistance. But the Gaules were not capable of such perswasions. They stood in feare, lest he should make their Countrie the seat of Warre, and perhaps take it from them. They were also more grieued than reason willed them, at his feeding vpon them, and wasting their Territorie. Wherefore some of them conspired against his life; others admonished him of the danger: and these that gaue him the aduice, were ready soone after to practise against him; but were in like sort detected. He was therefore glad to vse Perwigs of haire, and false beards of diuers colours, to the end that he might not be descried, nor knowne, to those that should vndertake to take him away. Faine he would haue passed the Appenines, vpon the first appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarry among the Gaules, till he had seene more Swallowes than one. At length, when the yeere was somewhat better opened, he resolued to take his leaue of these giddie Companions, and bring the warre nearer to the gates of Rome. So away he went, hauing his Armie greatly increased with Ligurians and Gaules, more seruiceable friends, abroad, than in their owne Countrie. That the passage of the Appenine Mountains was troublesome, I hold it needlesse to make any doubt. Yet since the Romane Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way: the great vexation which fell vpon Hannibal, when he was trauailing through and ouer them, ought in reason to be imputed rather to the extremity of Winter, that makes all waies foule, than to any intolerable difficultie in that iourney. Neuertheless to auoid the length of way, together with the resistance & fortifications, which may not improbably be thought to haue been erected vpon the ordinary passages towards Rome: he chose at this time, though it were with much trouble, to trauaile through the Fennes and rotten grounds of Tuscane. In those Marishes and bogges, he lost all his Elephants, saue one, together with the vse of one of his eyes, by the moystnesse of the ayre, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading through deep mire and water. In briefe, after he had with much adoe recouered the firm and fertile Plains, he lodged about Arretium: where he somewhat refreshed his wearied followers, and heard newes of the Romane Consuls.

C. Flaminius, & Cn. Seruilius had of late been chosen Consuls for this yeere: Seruilius, a tractable man, & wholly gouerned by aduice of the Senate; Flaminius, an hot-headed popular Orator; who hauing once been robbed (as he thought) of his Consulship, by a deuice of the Senators, was afraid to be serued so againe, vnlesse he quickly finished the warre. This iealous Consul thought it not best for him to be at Rome, when he entred into his Office, lest his aduersaries, by fayning some religious impediment, should detaine him within the Citie, or finde other businesse for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour, that he hoped to get in the Warre. Wherefore he departed secretly out of the Towne; and meant to take possession of his office, when the day came, at Ariminum. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, reuoked him by Embassadors: but he neglected their iniunction; and hasting to meet with the Carthaginians, took his way to Arretium, where he shortly found them.

The fierie disposition of this Consul, promised vnto Hannibal great assurance of victorie. Therfore he prouoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman; hoping thereby to draw him vnto fight, ere Seruilius came with the rest of the Armie. All the Countrie between Fesulæ & Arretium he put to fire and sword, euen vnder the Consuls nose; which was enough to make him stirre, that would not haue sitten still, though Hannibal had been quiet. It is true, that a great Captaine of France hath said, Pays gasté n'est pas perdu; A wasted Countrie is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Countrie, Flaminius thought his owne honour to be much impaired; and therefore aduanced towards the Enemie. Many aduised him (which had indeed been best) to take patience a while, and stay for his Colleague. But of this hee could not abide to heare: saying, that he came not to defend Arretium, whilest the Carthaginians went burning downe all Italie before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore he tooke horse, and commanded the Armie to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Enſignes ſtucke ſo faſt in the ground, as it could not be plucked vp by the Enſigne-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or falſe, Tully makes a ieaſt; ſaying, That the cowardly knaue did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) hauing hardily pitched it into the earth. Neither was the anſwer of Flaminius (if it were true) diſagreeable hereto: for he commaanded, that it ſhould be digged vp, if feare had made the hands too weake to lift it: asking withall; whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this their iealouſie, both hee and the Senate that did giue him cauſe, are likely to repent.

All the Territorie of Cortona, as farre as to the Lake of Thraſymene, was on a light fire; which whileſt the Conſull thought to quench with his enemies bloud, hee purſued Hannibal ſo vnaduiſedly, that hee fell with his whole Armie into an ambuſh cunningly laid for him, betweene the Mountaines of Cortona, and the Lake. There was hee charged vnawares, on all ſides, (ſaue onely where that great Lake of Peruſia permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flye from them) knowing not which way to turne, or make reſiſtance. So was hee ſlaine in the place, accompanied with fifteene thouſand dead carkaſſes of his Countrie-men. About ſixe thouſand of his men, that had the Vantguard, tooke courage, as for the moſt part it happens, out of deſperation; and breaking through the enemies, that ſtood in their way recouered the tops of the Mountaines. If theſe had returned, and giuen charge vpon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might haue greatly amended, if not wholly altered, the fortune of the day. But that violence of their feare, which kindled by neceſſitie, had wrought the effects of hardineſſe; was well aſſwaged, when they ceaſed to deſpaire, of ſauing their liues by flight. They ſtood ſtill, in a cold ſweat, vpon the Hill-top; hearing vnder them a terrible noiſe, but not any way diſcouering how things went, becauſe of the great fogge that held all that morning. When it grew toward noone, the ayre was cleared, and they might plainely diſcerne the lamentable ſlaughter of their fellowes. But they ſtaid not to lament it; for it was high time, they thought, to be gone, ere they were diſcried, and attached by the enemies horſe. This they ſhould haue thought vpon ſooner; ſince they had no minde to returne vnto the fight. For deſcried they were, and Maharbal ſent after them; who ouer-tooke them by night in a Village, which he ſurrounded with his horſe: and ſo they yeelded the next day, rendring vp their armes, vpon his promiſe of their liues and liberties.

This accord Hannibal refuſed to confirme; ſaying, That it was made by Maharbal, without ſufficient warrant, as wanting his authoritie to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his owne honour) what it was to keepe no faith: and fitted them with a tricke of their owne. For if it were lawfull vnto the Romans, to alter couenants, or adde vnto them what they liſted; if the Carthaginians muſt be faine to pay certaine hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, beſides their firſt bargaine; as alſo to renounce their intereſt in Sardinia, and be limitted in their Spaniſh Conqueſts, according to the good pleaſure of the Romans, whoſe preſent aduantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded peace: then can Hannibal be as a Roman, as themſelues; and make them know, that perfidiouſneſſe gaineth no more in proſperitie, than it loſeth in the change of fortune. Fifteene thouſand Italian priſoners, or thereabout, he had in his hands: of which all that were not Romans, he ſet free without ranſome; proteſting, as he had done before, that it was for their ſakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyrannie, that he had vndertaken this warre. But the Romans he kept in ſtraight priſon, and in fetters; making them learne to eat hard meate. This was a good way, to breed in the people of Italie, if not a loue of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this war had not concerned the generall ſafetie, but onely the preſeruing of her owne neck from the yoke of ſlauerie, which her ouer-ſtrong enemies would thruſt vpon her in reuenge of her oppreſſions. But an ancient reputation, confirmed by ſucceſſe of many ages, is not loſt in one or two battailes. Wherefore more is to bee done, ere the Carthaginians can get any Italian Partiſans.

Preſently after the battaile of Thraſymene, C. Centronius, with foure thouſand Roman horſe, drew neere vnto the Campe of Hannibal. Hee was ſent from Ariminum, by Seruilius the other Conſul, to increaſe the ſtrength of Flaminius: but comming too late, hee increaſed only the miſaduenture. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept this companie; companie, who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great ouerthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almost halfe of them, draue the rest vnto an high piece of ground, whence they came downe, and simply yeelded to mercie, the next day. Seruilius himselfe was in the meane while skirmishing with the Gaules; against whom he had wrought no matter of importance, when the newes was brought him, of his Colleagues ouerthrow and death in Hetruria; that made him hasten backe to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discerne the fruits of popular iealousie, which perswaded the Romans to the yearely change of their Commanders in the wars; which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certaine it is, that all men are farre better taught by their owne errours, than by the examples of their fore-goers. Flaminius had heard, in what a trap Sempronius had beene taken vp but the yeere before, by this subtle Carthaginian; yet suffered hee himselfe to be caught soone after in the same manner. Hee had also belike forgotten, how Sempronius, fearing to bee preuented by a new Consul, and ambitious of the sole honor of beating Hannibal in battaile, without helpe of his companion Scipio, had beene rewarded with shame and losse: else would he not, contrarie to all good aduice, haue beene so hasty to fight, before the arriuall of Seruilius. If Sempronius had been continued in his charge, it is probable that he would haue taken his companion with him the second time, and haue searched all suspected places, proper to haue shadowed an ambush: both which this new Consul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly auow it, that by being continued in his gouernment of France ten yeers, Cæsar brought that mightie Nation, together with the Heluetians and many of the Germans, vnder the Roman yoke; into which parts had there beene euery yeere a new Lieutenant sent, they would hardly, if euer, haue beene subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can doe, to informe it selfe, within one yeeres compasse, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions of the Places, Riuers, and of all good helpes, whereby to prosecute a warre to the best effect. Our Princes haue commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three yeeres; whence, by reason of the shortnesse of that their time, many of them haue returned as wise as they went out; others haue profited more, and yet when they began but to know the first rudiments of Warre, and Gouernment, fitting the Countrie, they haue beene called home, and new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great preiudice both of this and that Estate. But it hath euer beene the course of the World, rather to follow old errours, than to examine them: and of Princes and Gouernours, to vp-hold their slothfull ignorance, by the old examples and policie of other ages and people; though neither likenesse of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, haue perswaded the imitation.

§. VI.

How Q. Fabius the Roman Dictator, sought to consume the force of Hannibal, by lingring warre. Minutius the Master of the Horse, honoured and aduanced by the People, for bold but successefull attempting; aduentures rashly vpon Hannibal, and is like to perish with his Armie, but rescued by Fabius.

GReatly were the Romans amazed, at this their ill successe, and at the danger apparant; which threatned them in more terrible manner, than euer did war, since Rome it selfe was taken. They were good Souldiers; and so little accustomed to receiue an ouerthrow, that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and againe, in open field, all Italy was strangely affected with his successe, and held him in admiration, as one that could worke wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrell was not grounded vpon hate: hee onely sought honour, and fought (as it were) vpon a braueric: demeaning himselfe like a courteous enemy. This Carthaginian detested the whole Roman name, against which he burned with desire of reuenge. Varinus, Trebia, and Thrasymene, witnessed his purpose, & his ability. Which to withstand, they fled vnto a remedie that had long bin out of vse, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Consuls, and scarcely subiect vnto controll of the whole City. Wherefore this Officer was seldome chosen, but vpon some extremitie, and for no longer time than sixe moneths. Hee was to be named by one of the Consuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were so, that the Consul (if he stood vpon his prerogatiue) might name whom he pleased. At this time, the one one Consul being dead, and the other too farre off; the People tooken pon them the chauing supreme authoritie, to guild the Dignitie by their election, for Quintus Maximus the best reputed man of warre in the Citie Nouum sufficit, nouum etiam iram ferre ventos, & varie mutatos, contrarie course. Quintus Fabius chose M. Minutius Rufus Master of the Horse: which Officer was customarily, as the Dictators Lieutenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more vpon him.

The first act of Fabius, was the reformation of somewhat amisse in matter of religion: a good beginning, and commendable; had the Religion beene also good. But if it were true (as Liuie reports it) that the Bookes of Sybil were consulted, and gaue direction in this businesse of deuotion; then must we beleeue, that those bookes of Sybil, preserued in Rome, were dictated by an euill spirit. For it was ordained, that some Vow, made in the beginning of this warre to Mars, should be made anew, and amplified, as hauing not bin rightly made before: also that great Plaies should be vowed vnto Iupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with such other trumperie. This vehemencie of superstition, proceeds alwaies from vehemencie of feare. And surely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly distempered with passion: whereof that memorable accident, of two women that suddenly died, when they saw their sons returne aliue from Thrasymene, may serue to beare witnesse; though it be more properly an example of motherly loue. The walls and towers of the City were now repaired and fortified; the bridges vpon Riuers were broken downe; and all care taken for defence of Rome it selfe. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly set forth against Hannibal, word was brought that the Carthaginian fleet had intercepted all the supply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spaine. Against these Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Seruilius the Consul to put to Sea; and taking vp all the ships about Rome and Ostia, to pursue them: whilest he, with the Legions, attended vpon Hannibal. Foure Legions he had leuied in hast: and from Ariminium he receiued the Armie, which Seruilius the Consull had conducted thither.

Liu. Lib. 22.

With these forth with he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what aduantage the Numidian horse had ouer the Romans, he alwaies lodged himselfe on high grounds, and of hard accesse. Hannibal in the meane while, pursuing his victorie, had ranged ouer all the Countrie, and vsed all manner of cruelty towards the inhabitants; especially to those of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the sword, all that were able to beare arms. Passing by Spoletum & Ancona, he incamped vpon the Adriatick shores; refreshed his diseased, and ouer-trauailed Companies, armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans, and made his dispatches for Carthage, presenting his friends, which were in effect all the Citizens, with part of the spoiles that he had gotten. Hauing refreshed his Army, fed his horses, cured his wounded Souldiers, & (as Polybius hath it) healed his horse heels of the scratches, by washing their pasternes in old wine: hee followed the coast of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia, a Northerne Prouince of the Kingdome of Naples, spoiling the Marrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he ouer-ran, hee had not taken any one City: only he had assaied Spoletum, a Colonie of the Romans; and finding it well defended, presently gaue it ouer. The malice of a great Army is broken, and the force of it spent, in a great siege. This the Protestant Armie found true at Poictiers, a little before the battaile of Mont-contour, and their victorious enemies, anon after, at S. Iean d'Angely. But Hannibal was more wise. He would not engage himselfe in any such enterprise, as should detaine him, and giue the Romans leaue to take breath. All his care was to make good them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once he was absolute Master of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end he presented Fabius with battaile, how-soone as he saw him; and prouoked him with all manner of bravado's. But Fabius would not bite. Hee well knew the differences, betweene Souldiers bred vp, euer since they were Boyes, in warre, and in bloud; trayned and hardened in Spaine, made proud and adventurous by many victories there, & of late by some notable exploits against the Romans, and such, as had no other end of their enemy, than his vanquishment by him. Therefore he intended the Carthaginian so neere, as hee kept him from straggling too farre; and preserued the countrie from vtter spoyle. He inured his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees; and he brought them full vnder the eyes of the enemie, that in the end they might fix on his taile.

Now

Now Minutius had a contrary disposition, and was as fiery as Flaminius; taxlog Fabius with cowardise and feare. But all stirred not this well aduised Commander. For wise men are no more moued with such noise, than with winde breised out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indiscretion, and danger, than to pursue misfortune: It watteth it selfe sooner by sufferance, than by opposition. It is the inuading Armie that desires battaile: and this of Hannibal, was both the inuading and victorious. Fabius therefore suffered Hannibal to crosse the Apennines, and to fall vpon the most rich & pleasant Territorie of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perswaded, to aduenture the Roman Armie in battaile: but being farre too weake in horse, he alwayes kept the hils & fast grounds. When Hannibal saw he could by no means draw this warie Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on, & that the Town stood firme for the Romans, whose Legions were in sight, though a farre off, he resolued to rest his Armie, that was loaden with spoyle, in some plentifull and assured place, till the following Spring. But ere this can be done, he must passe along by the Dictators campe, that hung ouer his head vpon the hils of Callicula, and Casilinum: for other way there was none, by which he might issue out of that goodly Garden-countrie, which he had already wasted, into places more abundant of prouision for his wintering. It was by meere errour of his guide, that he first entred within these streights. For he would haue bin directed vnto Casinum, whence he might both assay the faire citie of Capua, which had made him friendly promises vnder hand, & hinder the Romans from comming neer it, to preuent him. But his guide mis-vnderstood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him into another way, from Casinum to Casilinum, whence Fabius hoped that he should not easily escape. Now began the wisedome of Fabius to grow into credit, as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, & won the victory without blowes. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himselfe, by a slight inuention, yet seruing the turne as well as a better. In driuing the country, he had gotten about two thousand Kine, whose hornes he dressed with dry faggots, and setting fire to them in the darke night, caused them to be driuen vp the hils. The spectacle was strange, and therefore terrible; especially to those, that knew it to be a worke of a terrible enemy. What it should mean, Fabius could not tell: but thought it a deuice to circumuent him; and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hil-tops, were horribly afraid, when some of these fiery Monsters were gotten beyond them, and ran therefore hastily away, thinking that the enemies were behind their backs, & fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no lesse afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Armie, recouered sure ground without molestation: where he staied till the next morning, and then brought off his light footemen, with some slaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in skirmish. After this, Hannibal made semblance of taking his iourny towards Rome: & the Dictator coasted him in the wonted manner; keeping still on high grounds, betweene him and the Citie, whilest the Carthaginian wasted all the Plaines. The Carthaginian tooke Geryon, an old ruinous Town in Apulia, forsaken by the Inhabitants; which he turned into Barnes and Store-houses for winter, and incamped vnder the broken wall. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time passed idly, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about some businesse of Religion, and left the Armie in charge with Minutius, the Master of the horse.

Minutius was glad of this good occasion to shew his owne sufficiency. He was fully perswaded, that his Romans, in plaine field, would be too hard for the Africans & Spaniards: by whom if they had been foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by subtiltie and ambush, which he thought himselfe wise enough to preuent. All the Armie was of his opinion; and that so earnestly, as he was preferred, by iudgement of the Souldiers, in worthinesse to command, before the cold and warie Fabius. In this iollity of conceit, he determined to fight. Yet had he been peremptorily forbidden to do so by the Dictator; the breach of whose command was extreame perill of death. But the honour of the victory, which he held vndoubtedly his owne; and the loue of the Armie, and the friends that he had at home, bearing office in Rome, were enough to saue him from the Dictators rods and axes, tooke he the matter neuer so hainously. Hannibal on the other side was no lesse glad, that he should play with a moderate aduersarie at gamelist. Therefore he drew neere, & to prouoke the Romans, sent for the third part of his Armie to waſte the Countrie. This was boldly done, ſeeing that Minutius incamped hard by him: but it ſeemes, that he now deſpiſed thoſe whom he had ſo often vanquiſhed. There was a piece of high ground betweene the two campes; which becauſe it would be commodious to him that could occupie it, the Carthaginians ſeized vpon by night with two thouſand of their light-armed. But Minutius, by plaine force, wan it from them the next day; and intrenching himſelfe thereupon, became their neereſt neighbour.

The maine buſineſſe of Hannibal at this time was, to prouide abundantly, not onely for his men, but for his horſes, which he knew to be the chiefe of his ſtrength; that he might keepe them in good heart againſt the next Summer: if beſides this he could giue the Romans another blow, it would increaſe his reputation, incourage his owne men, terrifie his enemies, and giue him leaue to forrage the Countrie at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes iſſue forth of his Campe, the Carthaginian ſent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in haruеſt. This aduantage Minutius wiſely eſpied, and tooke. For he led forth his Armie, and ſetting it in order, preſented battaile to Hannibal, that was not in caſe to accept it, euen at his owne Trenches. His horſes, and all his light Armature, diuided into many companies, he ſent abroad againſt the forragers; who being diſperſed ouer all the fields, and loaden with bootie, could make no reſiſtance. This angred Hannibal, that was not able to helpe them; but worſe did it anger him, when the Romans took heart to aſſaile his Trenches. They perceiued that it was meere weakeneſſe, which held him within his campe, and therefore were bold to deſpiſe his great name, that could not reſiſt their preſent ſtrength. But in the heat of the buſineſſe, Aſdrubal came from Geryon with foure thouſand men, being informed of the danger, by thoſe that had eſcaped the Roman horſe. This imboldned Hannibal to iſſue forth againſt the Romans; to whom neuertheleſſe he did not ſuch hurt, as he had receiued.

For this piece of ſeruice Minutius was highly eſteemed by the Armie, and more highly by the People at Rome, to whom he ſent the newes, vvith ſomwhat greater boaſt than truth. It ſeemed no ſmall matter, that the Roman Armie had recouered ſpirit, ſo far forth that it dared to ſet vpon Hannibal in his own campe; & that in ſo doing, it came off with the better. Euery man therefore praiſed the Maſter of the horſe, that had wrought this great alteration; and conſequently, they grew as far out of liking with Fabius, and his timorous proceedings, thinking that he had not done any thing wiſely, in all his Dictatorſhip: ſauing that he choſe ſuch a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeed in no other thing he had ſo greatly erred. But the Dictator was not ſo ioyfull of a little good lucke, as angry with the breach of diſcipline; and fearefull of greater danger, thereon likely to enſue. He ſaid that he knew his owne place, and what was to be done; that he would teach the Maſter of the horſe to doe ſo likewiſe; and make him giue account of what he had done, if he were Dictator: ſpeaking it openly, That good ſucceſſe, iſſuing from bad counſaile, was more to be feared, than calamitie; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence, the other taught men to be warie. Againſt theſe Sermons euery one cried out, eſpecially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which Office warranted him to ſpeake, and doe what he liſt, without feare of the Dictator. Is it not enough (ſaid he) that this our onely Man, choſen to be Generall, and Lord of the Towne, in our greateſt neceſſitie, hath done no manner of good, but ſuffered all Italie to be waſted before his eyes, to the vtter ſhame of our State; vnleſſe he alſo hinder others, from doing better than himſelfe can, or dares? It were good to conſider what he meanes by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius he hath not choſen any new Conſull all this while; Seruilius is ſent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and He, haue as it were taken Truce. Hannibal ſparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeed forborne to ſpoyle ſome grounds of Fabius, that ſo he might bring him into enuie and ſuſpition) and the Dictator giuing him leaue to ſpoyle all others, without impeachment. Surely his drift is euen this: He would haue the warre to laſt long, that he himſelfe might be long in Office, and haue the ſole Gouernment both of our Citie, and Armies. But this muſt not be ſo. It were better, that the Commonaltie of Rome, which gaue him this authority, ſhould againe take it from him, and conferre it vpon one more worthy. But leſt, in mouing the people hereto, I ſhould ſeeme to doe him iniurie; thus farre forth I will regard his honour: I will

onely propound, That the Master of the Horse may be ioyned in equall authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor lesse necessary, than was the election of this Dictator, by the People.

Though all men, euen the Senators, were ill perswaded of the course which Fabius had taken against Hannibal, as being neither plausible, nor seeming beneficiall at the present; yet was there none so iniurious, as to thinke that his generall intent, and care of the Weale publique, was lesse than very honourable. Wheras therefore it was the manner, in passing of any Act, that some man of credit & authority, besides the propounder, should stand vp, and formally deliuer his approbation; not one of the principall Citizens was found so impudent, as to offer that open disgrace, both vnto a worthy Personage, and (therewithall) vnto that dignity, whose great power; had freed the State at seuerall times, from the greatest dangers. Onely C. Terentius Varro, who the yeere before had beene Prætor, was glad of such an opportunity, to winne the fauour of the Multitude. This fellow was the sonne of a Butcher, afterwards became a Shop-keeper; and being of a contentious spirit, grew, by often brabbling, to take vpon him as a Pleader, dealing in poore mens causes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and rose by degrees, being aduanced by those, who in hatred of the Nobilitie fauoured his very baseneſſe. And now he thought the time was come, for him to giue a hard push at the Consulship; by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or fauouring one another, either durst or would. So he made an hot inuectiue, not onely against Fabius, but against all the Nobilitie; saying, That it grieued them to see the people doe well, and take vpon them what belonged vnto them, in matter of Gouernment; That they sought to humble the Commons by pouertie, and to impouerish them by warre; especially by warre at their owne doores, which would soone consume euery poore mans liuing, and finde him other worke to thinke vpon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wise: and since they had found one, (this worthy Master of the Horse) that was better affected vnto them and his Countrey, to reward him according to his good deserts; and giue him authority, according as was propounded by the Tribune, that so he might be encouraged and enabled, to proceed as he had begun. So the Act passed.

Before this busie day of contention, Fabius had dispatched the election of a new Consull, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the roome of C. Flaminius: and hauing finished all requisite businesse, went out of Towne, perceiuing well, that he should not be able to withstand the multitude, in hindering the Decree. The news of Minutius his aduancement, was at the campe as soone as Fabius: so that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, began to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the first, in what sort he thought it best to diuide their authority: whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them successiuely, for some longer time, should command in chiefe. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleasure of the Citizens, to make the Master of the horse equall to the Dictator, but that he should neuer be his superiour: Hee would therefore diuide the Legions with him, by lot, according to the custome. Minutius was not herewith greatly pleased; for that with halfe of the Armie he could not worke such wonders, as otherwise he hoped to accomplish. Neuertheless he meant to doe his best, and so taking his part of the Armie, incamped about a mile and halfe from the Dictator. Needfull it was (though Liuie seemes to taxe him for it) that he should so doe. For where two seuerall Commanders are not subordinate one vnto another, nor ioyned in Commission, but haue each intire and absolute charge of his owne followers, there are the forces (though belonging vnto one Prince or State) not one, but two distinct Armies: in which regard, one Campe shall not hold them both; without great inconuenience. Polybius neither findes fault with this distinction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was vnwilling to command in chiefe successiuely (as the two Consuls vsed) with Minutius, by turnes. He saith that Minutius was very refractary; and so proud of his aduancement, that continually he opposed the Dictator: who thereupon referred it to his choyce, either to diuide the forces between them, as is said before, or else to haue command ouer all by course. This is likely to be true. For Natures impatient of subiection, when once they haue broken loose from the rigour of authority, loue nothing more, than to contest with it: as if herein consisted the proofe and assurance of their liberties.

It

It behoued the Master of the horse, to make good the opinion which had thus aduanced him. Therefore he was no lesse carefull, of getting occasion to fight, than was Fabius of auoiding the necessity. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally desired, could not long be wanting. The Country lying between them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adioyning, had many and spacious caues; able some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places, Hannibal bestowed fiue hundred horse, and fiue thousand foot, thrusting them so close together, that they could not be discouered. But lest by any misaduenture they should be found out, and buried in their holes; he made offer betimes in the morning, to seize vpon a piece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eyes and the thoughts of the Romans, from their more needfull care, to businesse little concerning them. Like vnto this was the occasion, which not long before, had prouoked Minutius, to aduenture vpon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like sort as he grew, he sent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his owne troupes with fresh companies) he followed in person with the Legions. He was soone caught, and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safe retrait. In this dangerous case, whilest the Romans defended themselues, losing many, and those of their best men; Fabius drew neere, in very good order, to relieue them. For this old Captaine perceiuing a farre off, into what extremity his new Colleague had rashly throwne himselfe and his followers, did the office of a good Citizen, and regarding more the benefit of his Country, than the disgrace which he had wrongfully sustained, sought rather to approue himself by hasting to doe good, than by suffering his enemy to feele the reward of doing ill. Vpon Fabius his approch, Hannibal retyred: fearing to be well wetted with a showre, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hilltops. Minutius forthwith submitted himselfe to Fabius; by whose benefit he confessed his life to haue been saued. So from this time forwards, the Warre proceeded coldly as the Dictator would haue it; both whilest his Office lasted, which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when he deliuered vp his charge vnto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Seruilius the Consul had pursued in vaine a Carthaginian fleet, to which he came neuer within kenning. He ran along all the coast of Italie; tooke hostages of the Sardinians and Corsicans; passed ouer into Africke; and there negligently falling to spoyle the Countrie, was shamefully beaten aboord his ships, with the losse of a thousand men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, he returned home by Sicil; and (being forequired by the Dictators letters) repaired to the campe, with his fellow-Consul, where they tooke charge of the Armie.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the warre quickly, choose a rash and vnworthy Consul. Great forces leuied against Hannibal. Hannibal taketh the Romans prouisions in the Castle of Cannæ. The new Consuls set forth against Hannibal.

WIth little pleasure did they of the poorer sort in Rome, hear the great commendations that were giuen to Fabius by the principall Citizens. He had indeed preserued them from receiuing a great ouerthrow: but he had neither finished the war, nor done any thing in appearance thereto tending. Rather it might seeme, that the reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the slow proceedings, or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the worke to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole winter, contrary to all former custome; since it was neuer heard before, that any Roman Generall had willingly suffered the time of his command to run away without any performance: as if it were honourable to doe iust nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were ready euery man, to discharge the griefe and anger of his own priuate losse, vpon the ill administration of the publique.

This affection of the people, was very helpefull to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoued him to strike, whilest the Iron was hot: his owne worth being little or none, and his credit ouer-weake, to make way into that high Dignity. But the Commi-

Common alrie were then in such a mood, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Whereunto helpe, he had a Tribune, Bibius Herennius, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to vse the liberty of his place; in saying what hee listed, without all regard of truth, or modestie. This bold Orator stucke not to affirme, that Hannibal was drawne into Italie, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; That Mini- tius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to haue beene ouerthrowne, and was rescued by Fabius with the other two: but had all beene ioyned together, what they might haue done, it was apparent, by the victorie of Minutius, when hee commanded ouer all as Maister of the horse; that without a Plebeian Consull, the warre would neuer bee brought to an end; That such of the Plebeians, as had long since beene aduanced to honour by the people, were growne as proud as the old Nobilitie, and contemned the meaner sort, euer since themselues were freed from contempt of the more mightie;
That therefore it was needfull to choose a Consul, who should be altogether a Plebeian, a meere new man, one that could boast of nothing but the Peoples loue, nor could wish more, than to keepe it, by well deseruing of them. By such perswasions, the Multitude was won to be wholly for Terentius: to the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure, to see a man raised for none other vertue, than his detracting from their honour, and therefore opposed him with all their might. To hinder the desire of the People, it fell out, or at least was alleadged, that neither of the two present Consuls could well be spared, from attending vpon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpose; and he againe deposed; either (as was pretended) for some religious impediment, or because the Fathers desired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to preuaile in Choice of the new Consuls. This Inter- regnum tooke name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus; and was in vse at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the first were an hundred, parted themselues into Tens, or Decuries; and gouerned successiuely the space of fiue dayes, one Decurie, after another in order: yet so, that the Lictors, or Virgati, carrying the Fasces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited onely vpon the chiefe of them with these Ensignes of power. This custome was retained, in times of the Consuls; and put in vse, when by death, or any casualty, there wanted ordinary Magistrates of the old yeare, to substitute new for the yeere following. The aduantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the Election were not like to goe as they would haue it, there needed no more, than to slip fiue dayes, and then was all to begin a new: by which interruption, the heat of the Multitude was commonly well allwaged. Vpon such change of those, that were Presidents of the Election, it was also lawfull vnto new Petitioners, to seeke the Magistracies that lay void: which otherwise was not allowed, but a time limited, wherein they should publikely declare themselues to seeke those Offices. But no deuice would serue, against the generall fauour borne vnto Terentius. One Inter-regnum passed ouer, and the malice of the Fathers, against the vertue (as it was beleeued) of this meane, but worthy man, seemed so manifest, that when the People had vrged the businesse to dispatch, onely Terentius was chosen Consull: in whose hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Hereupon all the former Petitioners gaue ouer. For whereas men of ordinary marke had stood for the place before; it was now thought meet, that, both to supply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this vnexpert, and hot-headed man, one of great sufficiencie, and reputation, should be ioyned with him, as both Companion and opposite. So L. Æmilius Paulus, he who few yeeres since had ouer-come the Illyrians, and chased Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdome, was vrged by the Nobilitie to stand for the place: which he easily obtained, hauing no Competitor. It was not the part of this honorable man, to trouble himselfe any more in such great businesse of the Common-wealth. For, notwithstanding his late good seruice, that M. Liuius that had been his companion in Office, were afterwards iniuriously vexed by the People, and called vnto iudgement; wherein Liuius was condemned, and Æmilius hardly escaped; but of this iniustice they shall put the Romans well in mind each of them in his second Consulship, wherein they shall honorably approue their worth; the one of them nobly dying, in the most grieuous losse; the other bravely winning, the most happy victory that euer befell that Common-wealth.

These new Consuls, Varro and Paulus, omitted no part of their diligence in preparing for the warre: wherein though Varro made the greatest noise, by talking what wonders

he would fight, and that he would take no more, than one to leaue a fight of Annibal whom he proniſed to vanquiſh the very firſt day; yet the prouidence and care of Fabius, trauailed more earneſtly toward the accomplishment of them, whereof his fellow vainly boaſted. He wrote vnto the two old Conſuls Seruilius and Atilius, deſiring them to abſtaine from hazard of the maine chance; but nevertheleſſe, to plie the Carthaginians with daily skirmiſh, and weaken them by degrees: that when hee and his Colleague ſhould take the field, with the great Armie which they were now leuying, they might finde the foure old Legions well accuſtomed to the Enemie, and the Enemie well weakened to their hands. He was alſo very ſtrict in his Muſters; wherein the whole Senate aſſiſted him ſo carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the ſlanders, with which Terentius and his Adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raiſed, it is vncertaine. Foure ſcore thouſand foot, at the leaſt, and ſixe thouſand horſe, they were ſtrong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had ſo greatly deſired, of looking vpon Hannibal.

Hiero, the old King of Syracuſe, as he had relieued the Carthaginians, when they were diſtreſſed by their own Mercenaries; ſo did he now ſend helpe to Rome, a thouſand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barlie, and other prouiſions: hearing nothing more, than that one of theſe two mightie Cities ſhould deſtroy the other, whereby his owne eſtate would fall to ruine, that ſtood vpright, by hauing them ſomewhat euenly ballanced. He gaue them alſo counſaile, to ſend forces into Affrica, (perhaps) by that meanes they might diuert the warre from home. His gifts, and counſaile were louingly accepted; and inſtructions were giuen to Titus Otacilius the Prætor, which was to goe into Sicil, that he ſhould accordingly paſſe ouer into Affrica, if hee found it expedient.

The great Leuies, which the Romans made at this time, doe much more ſeeme to declare their puiſſance, than any, though larger accompt by Poll, of ſuch as were notably drawne into the field, and fitted for ſeruice. For beſides theſe Armies of the Conſuls, and that which went into Sicil; twentie fiue thouſand, with L. Poſthumius Albinus another of the Prætors, went againſt the Gaules, to reclaime that Prouince, which the paſſage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their preſent ſtrength, might well imbolden them to doe as they did. They ſent Embaſſadors to Philip the ſon of Demetrius, King of Macedon, requiring him to deliuer into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who hauing beene their ſubiect, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdome. They alſo ſent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was already paſt. What anſwer they receiued, it is not knowne: onely this is knowne, that Demetrius Pharius was not ſent vnto them; and that Philip henceforth began to haue an eye vpon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian money; by the ſhifts that they were driuen ſoone after to make, it will appeare, that the one halfe of it (how little ſoeuer) would haue beene welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cauill about ſecriture for non-paiment of the whole.

Whilſt the Citie was buſied in theſe cares, the old Conſuls lay as neere vnto Hannibal, as poſſibly they could, without incurring the neceſſity of a battaile. Many skirmiſhes they had with him, wherein their ſucceſſe for the moſt part, was rather good than great. Yet one miſchance not onely blemiſhed the honour of their other ſeruices, but was indeed the occaſion, to draw on the miſery following. Hannibal, for the moſt part of that time, made his abode at Geryon, where lay all his ſtore for the Winter. The Romans, to be neere him, lodged about Caſinium, and, that they might not be driuen to turne aſide for all neceſſaries, to the loſſe of good opportunities, they beſtowed much of their prouiſions in the Caſtle of Casinum: for the towne was razed the yeere before. This place Hannibal won, and thereby not onely furniſhed himſelfe, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, vnleſſe they would be troubled with farre cariage. Beſides this, and more to his aduantage, he enabled himſelfe to abide in that open Countrie, fit for the ſeruice of his horſe: longer than the Romans, hauing ſo many mouthes to feed, could well endure to tarry, without offering battaile, which he moſt deſired. Of this miſhap when Seruilius had informed the Senate, letting them vnderſtand, how this Peece, taken by Hannibal, would ſerue him to command no ſmall part of the Countrie adiacent; in deed ſo great, that euen vnto the Fathers themſelues, to aduenture a battaile with the Carthaginian, ſeemed little leſſe than to take Poſſe in the ground of of Italy. Neuertheleſſe, anſwer was returned vnto Seruilius, that hee ſhould haue patience a while; for that the Conſuls would ſhortly be there, with a power ſufficient to doe as need required.

When all things were ready in the Citie, and the ſeaſon of the yeere commodious to take the field, the two Conſuls, with their Armie, ſet forth againſt Hannibal. This was alwaies done with great ſolemnitie: eſpecially, whenſoeuer they went forth to warre against any noble or redoubted Enemy. For Sacrifices, and ſolemne Vowes, were made vnto Iupiter, and the reſt of their gods, for good ſucceſſe and victorie: which being performed, the Generals in warlike attire, with an honorable traine of the principall men, (not onely ſuch as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the warre, as Volunteries, for loue; but a great number of others that meant to abide at home,) were accompanied on their way, and diſmiſſed with friendly leaue taking, and good wiſhes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited vpon Æmilius Paulus, as the onely Man, whom they thought either worthy of this honour, or likely to doe his countrie remarkeable ſeruice. Terentius his Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a troupe no leſſe in greatneſſe, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Fabius the late Dictator, is ſaid to haue exhorted the Conſull Paulus, with many graue words, to ſhew his magnanimitie, not onely in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outragious follie of his fellow-Conſull. The anſwer of Paulus was, That he meant not againe to runne into danger of condemnation, by offending the multitude; that he would doe his beſt for his Countrie: but if he ſhould his beſt were likely to be ill taken, he would thinke it leſſe raſhneſſe to aduenture vpon the Enemies ſword, than vpon the malice of his owne Citizens.

§. VIII.

Diſputation betweene the two Roman Conſuls, whether it bee likely, that Hannibal was vpon point of flying out of Italie, when the Romans preſſed him to fight. The great battaile of Cannæ.

THeſe new Generals, arriuing at the Campe, diſmiſſed M. Atilius one of the laſt yeeres Conſuls, requeſting it becauſe of his age and weakneſſe; Seruilius they retained with them, as their Aſſiſtant. The firſt thing that Æmilius thought neceſſary, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words; who out of their bad ſucceſſe hitherto, had gathered more cauſe of feare, than of courage. He willed them to conſider, not onely now, their victories in times paſt againſt the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but euen their owne great numbers: which were no leſſe than all that Rome at the preſent was able to ſet forth. Hee told them in what danger their Countrie ſtood; how the ſtate and ſafetie thereof reſted vpon their hands; vſing ſome ſuch other common matter of perſwaſion. But the moſt effectuall part of his Oration, was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victory by plaine force and valour; but that onely by deceit and ambuſh he had ſtolne the honor, which he had gotten at Trebia & Thraſymene. Herewithall he taxed the inconſiderate raſhneſſe of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one ſaw not his enemies, vntill hee was ſurrounded by them; the other ſcarce ſaw them, when they ſtruck off his head, by reaſon of the thick miſt, through the darkneſſe whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their ſnares. Finally, declaring what aduantages they had againſt the Enemie; and how deſtitute the Enemie was of thoſe helpes, by which he had hitherto preuailed againſt them; he exhorted them to play the men, and doe their beſt. They were eaſily perſwaded: for the contemplation of their owne multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of armes, gaue them cauſe to thinke, that vnder a Captaine ſo well experienced, and euery way ſufficient, as Æmilius was knowne to bee, they ſhould eaſily preuaile againſt the Carthaginians: that came ſhort of them in all things elſe, ſaue craft; which would not alwayes thriue. But in one thing they miſtooke the meaning of their Generall. It was his deſire that they ſhould haue heart to fight; not that they ſhould loſe the patience of awaiting a conuenient ſeaſon. But they, hauing preconceiued a victorie, thought all delaies to bee impediments: and thereby ſought to robbe themſelues of their beſt helpe; which was good conduct. They remembred what talke they had heard at Rome: and were themselues affected with the Vulgar desire, of ending the warre quickly; wherein since Æmilius had acknowledged, that the aduantage was theirs, why did he make them forbeare to vse it? Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Consull Terentius; who was no lesse popular in the Campe, than hee had beene in the Citie. Expectation is alwayes tedious; and neuer more, than when the Euent is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Armie, to bee freed from the doubtfull passions of Hope and Feare: therefore Terentius, who hastened their desire to effect, was likely to win more thankes, than should his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus while the Romans thinke themselues to haue the better of their Enemies, they fall into an inconuenience, than which few are more dangerous; Dissension of their chiefe Commanders. Varro would fight: Æmilius would so too, but said that it was not yet time; why? because the enemy must shortly dislodge, and remoue hence, into places lesse fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, hauing eaten vp his last yeeres prouisions, returne into Campania to gather a second Harueſt? This would (said Varro) sauour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth sauour no lesse of C. Flaminius. Their deedes were like their words: for they commanded by turnes interchangeably euery day. Æmilius lodged sixe miles from Hannibal, where the ground was somewhat vneuen. Thither if the Carthaginians would take paines to come; hee doubted not to send them away in such haste, as they should not leaue running till they were out of Italie. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plaines; his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Neuertheless he sate downe close by Hannibal: who as an vnbidden guest gaue him but a rude welcome and entertainment. The Carthaginian Horse, and light armature, fell vpon the Roman Vantcourrers; and put the whole Armie in tumult, whilest it was yet in march: but they were beaten off, not without losse, for that the Romans had among their Velites, some troupes weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Æmilius, who could not handsomely withdraw the Armie out of that leuell ground, incamped vpon the Riuer Aufidus; sending a third part of his forces ouer the water, to lye vpon the Easterne banke, where they entrenched themselues. Hee neuer was more vnwilling to fight, than at this present: because the ground serued wholly for the aduantage of his enemie; with whom he meant to deale, when occasion should draw him to more equall tearmes. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himselfe; expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remoue towards Geryon, Cannæ, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of necessaries: whereof an Armie forraging the Countrie, was not likely to carry about with it sufficient quantity, for any long time.

Here it would not be passed ouer with silence, That Liuie differeth much in his Relation from Polybius: telling many strange tales, of the misery into which Hannibal had beene driuen; and of base courses that he deuised to take, if the Romans could haue retained their patience a little longer. Hee had (saith Liuie) but tenne dayes prouision of meat. He had not money to pay his Souldiers. They were an vnruly Rabble, gathered out of seuerall Nations, so that he knew not how to keepe them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Prouant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were ready to forsake him, and run ouer to the Roman side. Yea Hannibal himselfe was once vpon the point, to haue stolne away into Gaule with all his horse, and left his foot vnto their miserable destinies. At length for lack of all other counsaile, he resolued to get him as farre as he could from the Romans, into the Southermost parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his vnfaithful Souldiers might finde the more difficulty in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieued with the more early harueſt. But whilest he was about to put this deuice in execution, the Romans pressed him so hard, that they euen forced him to that, which hee most defired; euen to fight a battaile vpon open Champaine ground: wherein hee was victorious. It was not vncommendable in Liuie, to speake the best of his owne Citizens; and, where they did ill, to say, That, without their owne great folly, they had done passing well. Further also hee may be excused; as writing onely by report. For thus hee saith; Hannibal de fuga in Galliam (dicitur) agitasse; Hannibal (is said) to haue haue bin bought himselfe off, flying into Gaule: where hee makes it no better than a matter of heare-say; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the proiection selfe, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, comming out of Gaule, through the Marishes and Bogs of Hetruria, could finde victuals enough, and all things needfull vnto his Armie, the Summer foregoing: what should hinder him to doe the like this yeere; especially seeing he had plaid the carefull husband in making a great harueſt, since he had long beene Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surprise, no small part of the Romans prouisions? Suteable hereunto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but corne and cattell; his Souldiers might perhaps haue fallen into mutinie for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italy: and had so well increased his stocke, since he came into that Countrie, that he had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like; and loaden his followers with spoyle: hauing left wherewith to redeeme as many of his owne, as were taken by the Enemy; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not easie to doe the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the generall agreement of Historians, who giue it as a principall commendation vnto Hannibal, That he alwayes kept his Army free from sedition, though it were composed of sundry Nations, no lesse different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might hee so doe, hauing not onely pronounced, That which of his men soeuer fought bravely with an Enemy, was therby a Carthaginian; but solemnly protested & sworne, (besides other rewards) to make as many of them, as should deserue and seeke it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaule, was a senseleſse deuice. Hannibal, being there with his whole Army, tooke so little pleasure in the Countrie and People, that he made all haste to get him out of it. And what should he now do there with his horse? or how could he be trusted, either there or elsewhere? yea, how could he desire to liue; hauing betrayed all his Armie; and relinquished his miserable foot, to the butcherie of their enemies? This tale therfore Plutarch omitteth, who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a manner all his directions from Liuie. But of this and the like it is enough to say; That all Historians loue to extoll their own Countrie-men; and where a losse cannot be dissembled, nor the honor of the victory taken from the Enemy, and giuen vnto blinde Fortune, there to lay all the blame on some strange misgouernment of their own forces: as if they might easily haue won all, but lost all through such folly, as no Enemy can hope to finde in them another time.

Now let vs returne backe to the two Armies, where they lye encamped on the Riuer Aufidus. Varro was perswaded, that it concerned him in honour, to make good his word vnto the people of Rome: and since he had thus long waited in vaine, to get the consent of Paulus, now at length to vse his owne authoritie; and, without any more disputing of the matter, to fight when his owne day came. When therefore it was his turne to command; at the first breake of the day he began to passe the Riuer, without staying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him; and sought, as in former times, to haue dissuaded him, from putting the estate of his Countrie to a needleſse hazard. Against whose words and substantiall arguments, Terentius could alleage none other, than point of Honour. Hannibal had presented them battaile at their Trenches: should they endure this Brauado? He had sent his Numidians ouer the Riuer but euen the day before, who fell vpon the Romans that were fetching water to the lesser Campe; and draue them shamefully to runne within their defences, which also they made offer to assayle: must this also be suffered? Hee would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the spirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was liuely, and full of such courage, as promised assured victory. When Aemilius perceiued, that hee could not hinder the obstinate resolution of his Companion, hee tooke all care, that what he saw must be done, might be done well. Ten thousand Roman foot he caused to be left behinde, in the greater campe, opposite vnto the Carthaginian; to the intent, that either Hannibal might be compelled to leaue behinde him some answerable number, for defence of his Trenches: (which out of his paucitie he was lesse able to spare from the battaile, than were the Romans) or that these ten thousand, falling vpon the Carthaginian Campe, when the fight began, & taking it with all the wealth therin, might thereby (as commonly doe such accidents) terrifie and distract the Enemies in the heate of fight. This done, the two Consuls went ouer the water with their Armie to the lesser Campe, whence also they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battaile: the ground on the East part of the River, seeming perhaps more fit for marshalling of their Armie. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cause; and without any delay, passed ouer it, somewhat higher vp the streame; which ran from the South; leauing in his owne campe so many, as he thought would serue to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; Hee bad them looke about them, and view the ground well, vpon which they were to fight. They did so. And could you (said hee) pray for any greater fortune, than to ioyne battaile with the Romans vpon such a leuell ground, where the strength in horse are sure to preuaile? They all assented to him; and shewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (said hee further) yet are first of all to thanke the gods, that haue brought them hither; and then Vs, that haue trained them along, and drawne them into necessitie of playing for their liues; where they are sure to lose them. As for these Romans, I was faine to encourage you against them, when yee met them first: but now yee may euen encourage your selues, by calling to minde that they are the men, whom yee haue as often beaten as seene. Of one thing onely I will put you in minde: That whereas hitherto you fought for other respects, as, to driue them before you out of Gaule; and, to win the open Countrie, and fields of Italy, both of which yee haue obtained: now are ye to fight for the Townes themselues, and all the riches within them; which this victory shall make yours. Therefore play the stout Souldiers: and ere many houres passe, yee shall be Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had said this; his brother Mago came to him, whom he had sent to view the countenance of the Enemy. Hannibal asked him, what newes; and what worke they were likely to haue with these Romans? Worke enough (answered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replyed) I tell thee, brother, that among them all, search them neuer so diligently, thou shalt not find one man, whose name is Mago. With that he fell a laughing, and so did all that stood about him: which gladded the souldiers, who thought their General would not be so merry, without great assurance. Whether it were so, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago aboue many thousand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no lesse troubled with thinking vpon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether hee meant onely to correct the sad moode of his brother with a iest, and shew himselfe merry vnto the Souldiers: this his answer was more manly, than was the relation of his discouerer. But if Hannibal himselfe had been sent forth by Mago, to view the Romans, he could not haue recounted with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captain Gam, before the battaile of Agincourt, made vnto our King Henry the fift: saying, that of the Frenchmen, there were enow to be killed; enow to be taken prisoners; and enow to run away. Euen such words as these, or such pleasant iests as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment, but serue many times, when battaile is at hand, to worke vpon such passions, as must gouerne more of the businesse: especially, where other needfull care is not wanting; without which they are but vaine boasts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himselfe; expressing no lesse perfection of his militarie skill, than was greatnesse in his spirit and vndertakings. For to omit the commodiousnesse of the place, into which he had long before conueiued the meanes to draw his enemies to battaile; He marshalled his Armie in such conuenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where euery one might doe best seruice. His Darters, and Slingers of the Baleares, hee sent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. These were loose troupes, answerable in a manner to those, which we call now by a French name Enfans perdues; but when we vsed our owne termes, the forlorne hope. The grosse of his Armie following them, hee ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman maner, with the spoyles which they had gotten at Trebia, Thrasymene, or elsewhere; and well trained in the vse of those weapons, that were of more aduantage, than those wherewith they had formerly serued; made the two wings, very deepe in File. Betweene these he ranged his Gaules and Spaniards, armed, each after their own Countrey manner, their shields alike; but the Gaules vsing long broad swords, that were forcible in a downe-right stroake; the Spaniards, short and well-pointed blades, either to strike or thrust; the Gaules, naked from their nauell vpwards, as confident in their owne fiercenesse: the Spaniards, wearing white cassocks embroidered [illegible]

This they [illegible] like an Heard: and were with no lesse [illegible] Vpon the [illegible] stood behinde them, they needed not to [illegible] both for that there was [illegible] roome enough; and forasmuch as the Heard, or Hornes of this Moone, [illegible] the safe retrait, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to re-enforce them [illegible] when time should require. In this hasty retrait, or flight, of the Gaules and Spaniards, [illegible] it hapned, as was necessary, that they who had stood in the middle or vtter-couert of the halfe Moone, made the innermost or concaue superficies thereof disordered and [illegible] though it were; when it was forced to turne the backs outward: the hornes or [illegible] thereof, as yet, vntouched, onely turning round, & receiuing very little. So the Romans in pursuing them, were inclosed in an halfe circle; which they should not [illegible] greatly to regard, for that the sides of it were exceeding thin and broken; and the bottome of it, none other than a throng of men routed, and seeming vnable to make resistance; had all the enemies foot bin cast into this one great body, that was in a manner dissolued. But while the Legions, following their supposed victory, rushed vpon those that stood before them, and thereby vnwittingly engaged themselues deeply put in the principall strength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either side aduanced so far, that getting beyond the rearward, they enclosed them, in a manner, behinde: and forward they could not passe farre, without removing Hannibal and Magos, which made that way the least easie. Hereby it is apparant, That the great Crescent, before spoken of, was of such extent, as couered the Africans, who lay behinde it, vndiscerned, vntill now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus enuironed vnawares, and that they behaued themselues, as men that thought vpon no other worke, than what was found them by the Gaules. Neither is it credible, that they would haue beene so mad, as to run head-long, with the whole bulke of their Armie, into the throat of slaughter, had they seene those weapons bent against them at the first, which when they did see, they had little hope to escape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and rashnesse of inferiour Captaines: but since the Consull Paulus, a man so expert in warre, being vanquished in horse, had put himselfe among the Legions; it cannot be supposed, that hee and they did wilfully thus engage themselues. Afdrubal, hauing broken the troupes of Roman horse, that were led by the Consull Paulus, followed vpon them along the Riuer side, beating downe and killing, as many as he could, (which were almost all of them) without regard of taking prisoners. The Consull himselfe was either driuen vpon his owne Legions, or willingly did cast himselfe among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithstanding the defeat of his horse. But he failed of this his expectation. Neuertheless he cheared vp his men as well as he could, both with comfortable words, and with the example of his owne stout behauiour: beating downe, and killing many of the enemies with his owne hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the same part of the battaile, and with better successe. For the Consul receiued a blow from a sling, that did him great hurt: and though a troupe of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their best to saue him from further harme, yet was he so hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weakenesse, to forsake his horse. thinking that the Consul had given order so to do: as in many bat-tels men at armes had left their horses, to help their foot in distresse. When Scipio had notice at hand perceaued this, and vnderstood that the Consul had made such a diuision, he was very glad of it, and pleasantly said, I had rather they should binde both their hands and feet: meaning, that he had them safe, as if they were so bound. All this while Terentius Varro, with his Numidians, in the left wing, was mainely troubled by Hanno (or the left wing) beating vp and down about that great sandy Plaine, which lying Southwinde, blowing there accustomarily, draue in the eyes of the Romans. These, vsing their aduantage both of number and wearie the Consul and his followers exceedingly: neither giuing any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at length promised him an happy day of it. For when the battailes were ioyne, the hundred of these Numidians came pricking away from their fellowes in the rere, and behinde their backes, (as was the manner of those which vse running downe their armes, rendred themselues. This was good lucke and had been good warning. Varro had not leisure to examine them, but commaunded as they were, to get them behinde the Armie, and there rest quietly till all was done. These crafty aduenturers did as he bad for a while, till they found opportunitie to put in execution the purpose, for which they yeelded. Vnder their iackets they had short swords and poyards, which they found other scattered weapons about the field, of such as were slaine in the dew vpon the hindmost of the Romans, whilest all eyes and thoughts were another way: so that they did great mischiefe, and raised yet a greater terror, then before, in a place of aduantage, found meanes to lay an ambush at the backe of the last blow, that ended all fight and resistance, was giuen by the Cauall which gaue the first. Asdrubal hauing in short space broken the Romane troupes of horse put in pieces all, saue the Compasse of Aemilius that rushed into the grosse of the enemy, few besides, that recouered some narrow passage betweene the Riuer and the owne Battalions, did not stay to charge vpon the face of the Legions, but fell vpon the Reare of his owne, and fetching about, came vp to the Numidians:
which ioyned and gaue vpon Terentius.

A fearefull cloud, as it seemed at the first appearance, what weather it had left be-hinde on the other side: so did it prognosticate a dismall storme vnto those vpon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, hauing wearied themselues much in doing little, and seeing more worke toward, than they could hope to ouercome, thought it the best way, to auoid the danger by present flight. The Consull was wiser than they, in apprehending the greatnesse of his own perill, nor more vaine in striuing to worke impossibilities; it being impossible, when so many shranke away, to sustaine the impression alone, which he could not haue indured with their helpe. Now he found, that it was one thing to talke of Hannibal at Rome, and another to encounter him. But of this, or of ought else, excepting hasty flight, his present case would not serue him to consider. Close at the heeles of him and his flying troupes followed the light Numidians, appointed by Asdrubal vnto the pursuit, as fittest for seruice. Asdrubal himselfe, with the Gaules and Spanish horse, compassing, fell vpon the backes of the Romans, that were ere this hardly distressed, and in manner surrounded on all parts else: He brake them easily, who before made no resistance being inclosed, and laid at on euery side, not knowing which way to turne themselues, in a pittifull slaughter: the vanquished multitude thronging vp and downe, and not whither or which way, whilest euery one sought to auoid those enemies, that were nearest. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Aemilius, got vp on horse, and saued themselues: which though it is hardly vnderstood how they could do, I will rather beleeue it, than suppose that Liuie so reporteth, to grace therby his story with this following tale. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, galloping along by a place, where the Consul sitting all bloudied vpon a stone, intreated him to rise and saue himself, offering him his assistance and horse. But Paulus refused it; willing Lentulus to saue himself, and not to lose time: saying, That it was not his purpose to bee brought in question by the People, either as an accuser of his Colleague, or as guiltie him-

selfe of that dayes losse. Further, he willed Lentulus to ranke and bind vp his fainting men in particular to Fabius: willing them so for his sake, as he selfe as well they could, finish with Fabius that he liued and died mindfull of his wholesome admonitions. These words (perhaps uenture) or some to like purpose, the Consul vttered to Lentulus, either when (as it is will he was drawne to that Battaile, or when he beheld the first defeat of his cauallry: what time he put himselfe in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but he knew what he said a good while before this, when he thought the Consul & his men in little better case than if they had been bound. The whole Grosse of the Romans, inclosed indeed as within a sacke; whereof the African Battalions made the least, the Spaniards, Gaules, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians the bottome, and as it were his horse, closed vp the mouth: in which part they first of all were slaine, and began the Rout, wherein all the rest followed. Æmilius therefore, who could not sit his horse, whilest the battaile yet lasted, and whilest the spaces were somewhat open, by which he might haue withdrawne himselfe; was now (had he neuer so well mounted) vnable to flie, hauing in his way to close a throng of his owne miserable louers, and so many heapes of bodies, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It is vnto his honour, That in the Battaile he fought no lesse valiantly, than he had wisely before, both abstained himselfe, and dissuaded his fellow-Consull, from fighting: & when the day was vtterly lost, it had lien in his power to saue his own life, vnto of his country, neuer more needing it; I should thinke, that hee either too much esteemed himself, or being too faintly minded, was vweary of the World, and not thankefull Citizens. But if such a resolution were praise-worthy in Æmilius, as diligent of Roman valor, then was the English vertue of the Lord Iohn Talbot, Earle of Lisle, sonne to that famous Earle of Shrewsbury, who died in the Battaile of Chastillon, more highly to be honoured. For Æmilius was old, grieuously, if not mortally, wounded, & accomptable for the ouerthrow receiued: Talbot was in the flowre of his youth, valiant, easily able to haue escaped, and not answerable for that dayes misfortune, who he refused to forsake his Father; who foreseeing the losse of the battaile, and not willing to staine his actions past by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble sonne to be gone and leaue him.

In this terrible ouerthrow died all the Roman foot, saue two or three thousand, that Liuie saith) escaped into the lesser campe; whence, the same night, about sixe hundred of them brake forth, and ioyning with such of those in the greater campe, as were willing to trie their fortune, conueyed themselues away ere morning, about four thousand foote, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troups, partly dispersed, into Cannusium: the next day, the Roman camps, both lesse and greater, were yeelded vnto Hannibal, with all that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this escape: onely he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Æmilius had left on the West side of Aufidus (as was before) to set vpon the campe of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their desire, which they had well-neere done, the battaile was lost: and Hannibal, comming ouer the water to them, drue them into their own campe; which they quickly yeelded, hauing lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first sight of Hannibal, comming vpon them with his victorious Armie, a greater number of these did flie; and thereby escaped, whilest their fellowes, making defence in vaine, retired into their campe, and held the enemie busied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not halfe full, but made vp by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like) that hauing serued at Cannæ, were afterwards extreamely disgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their companions fighting. Of the Romane horse what numbers escaped, it is vncertaine: but very few they were that saued themselues in the first charge, by getting behinde the Riuer; and Terentius the Consul recouered Venusia, with threescore and ten at the most in his companie. That he was so ill attended, it is no maruell: for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward; so that his neerest way thither, had been through the midst of Hannibals Armie, if the passage had been open. Therefore it must needs be, that when once he got out of sight, he turned vp some by-way, so disappointing the Numidians that hunted eunuchs. Of such as could not hold pace with the Consul, but tooke other vvaies, and were scattered ouer the fields, two thousand, or thereabout, were gathered vp by the Numidians, and made prisoners: the rest were slaine, all saue three hundred; who dispersed themselues in flight, as chance led

sides Æmilius Paulus the Consul, two of the Romane Quæstors or Treasurers, foure twenty Colonels or Tribunes of the Souldiers, fourescore Senators, or such as had fied, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were all dates, as hauing been Ædiles, Prætors, or Consuls: among whom was Cn.
the last yeers Consul, and Minutius, late maister of the horse. The number of taken in this battaile, Liuie makes no greater than three thousand foot, and hundred horse: too few to haue defended for the space of one halfe houre, both Camps, which yet the same Liuie saith, to haue bin euen cowardly yeelded may therefore doe better, to giue credit vnto one of the prisoners, whom the storian shortly after introduceth, speaking in the Senate, and saying, That they lesse than eight thousand. It may therefore be, that these three thousand were as the Enemie spared, when the fury of Execution was past: but to these must about fiue thousand more, who yeelded in the greater campe, when their com-either slaine or fled. So the reckoning falls outright: which the Romanes, ly the Consul Varro, had before cast vp (as we say) without their Hoste, nothing rable, as now they finde it. On the side of Hannibal there died some foure thou-les, fifteen hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred horse; or therelosse not sensible, in the ioy of so great a victory, which if he had pursued, as l aduised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome, it is little doubted, the Warre had presently been at an end. But he beleeued not so farre in his sperity, and was therefore told, That hee knew how to get, not how to vse, a

Of things following the battaile at Canna.

Or vvithout good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian: who regarding more the pleasure of them, vnto whose honour they consecrated their trauailes, than the truth of the information of posteritie, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Romane Quirites, ers conscript. No man of sound iudgement will condemne this liberty: yet conich Polybius hath vsed. For, to recompence his iuniorite (such as it was) he pro-substantiall arguments, to iustifie his owne Relation; and confuteth the vanity of rmer Authors, out of their own writings, by conference of places ill co-herring.
aines is to be suspected, that he would not haue taken, had he been borne in f these two Cities, but haue spared some part of his diligence, and been conten-haue all men thinke better and more honourably than it deserued, of his owne ie. The like disease it is to be feared, that we shall hereafter finde in others, and e some cause to wish, that either they were somewhat lesse Roman, or else, that Yorkes of ther opposite Writers were extant, that so we might at least heare both ake: being henceforth destitute of Polybius his helpe, that was a man indifferent.
e this cannot be, we must be sometimes bold, to obserue the coherence of and beleeue so much only to be true, as dependeth vpon good reason, or (at least) obabilitie. This attentiue circumspection is needfull at the present: such is the ucie, or forgetfulnesse, which we find in the best Narration of things following taile of Cannæ. For it is said, that foure thousand foot & horse gathered together the Consul Terentius at Venusia; that others to the number of ten thousand got in-ulum, choosing for their Captaines, yong P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that ulull Terentius Varro, ioyning his company vnto those of Scipio at Canusium, into the Senate, that he had now well-neere ten thousand men about him; that ters of the Consul were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly risen, d been taking order for pacifying those tumults in the Citie, which grew vpon fame of the ouerthrow; and yet, that Embassadours from Capua (after some ation, whether it were meet to send any, or, without further circumstance, to side Hannibal) were sent vnto Tarentum, and found him at Venusia, in proces, with be-were those letters, which euer-took (in a manner) at Rome the first newes of the ouerthrow. Among ſuch incoherences, I hold it the beſt way, to omit ſo much as hath not ſome particular connexion with matter enſuing: mutuall dependencie in things of this nature, being no ſmall argument of truth.

When Hannibal had ſacked the Roman camp, and truſſed vp the ſpoiles, forthwith he diſlodged, and marched away into Samnium, finding a diſpoſition in the Hirpines, and many other people thereabout, to forſake the Roman partie, & make alliance with Carthage. The firſt towne that opened the gates vnto him, vvas Coſſa, where he laid vp his baggage: & leauing his brother Mago to take in other places, He haſted into Campania. The generall affection of the multitude, in all the cities of Italie, was inclinable vnto him; not onely in regard of their grieuous loſſes, ſuſtained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themſelues, who could not hinder him from ſpoyling the countrie, eſpecially the poorer ſort of them, did hardly indure; but in a louing reſpect vnto that great courteſie (as it ſeemed) which he vſed, vnto ſuch of them as became his priſoners. For as at other times, ſo now alſo after his great victory at Cannæ, He had louingly diſmiſſed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands: rebuking them gently for being ſo obſtinate, againſt him that had ſought to deliuer them from bondage. Neither ſpared he to win their loue by gifts, pretending to admire their valour; but ſeeking indeed, by all waies & meanes, to make them his, whileſt all other motiues were concurrent. At this time alſo he began to deale kindly (though againſt his nature) with the Roman priſoners, telling them, that he bore no mortall hatred vnto their Eſtate; but being prouoked by iniuries, ſought to right himſelfe and his countrie; & fought with them, to trie which of the two Cities, Rome or Carthage, ſhould beare ſoueraigne Rule, not which of them ſhould be deſtroied. So he gaue them leaue to chooſe ten of their number, that ſhould be ſent home to treat with the Fathers about their ranſome: and together with theſe, he ſent Carthalo a Nobleman of Carthage, and Generall of his Horſe, to feele the diſpoſition of the Senate; whether it were bowed as yet by ſo much aduerſity, and could ſtoope vnto deſire of peace. But with the Romanes theſe arts preuailed not, as ſhall be ſhewed in due place. The people of Italie, all, or moſt of them, ſaue the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not onely wearie of their loſſes paſt, but entertained a deceiueable hope, of changing their old Societie for a better. Wherefore not only the Samnites, Lucans, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, & not vntill the former generation vtterly ſubdued, began to re-aſſume their wonted ſpirits: but the Campans, a Nation of all other in Italie moſt bound vnto the State of Rome, and by many mutuall affinities therewith as ſtreightly conioyned, as were any ſaue the Latines, changed on a ſudden their loue into hatred, without any other cauſe found, than change of fortune.

Campania, is the moſt goodly and fruitfull Prouince of Italie, if not, (as ſome then thought) of all the Earth: and the citie of Capua, anſwerable vnto the country, whereof it was Head, ſo great, faire, and wealthie, that it ſeemed no leſſe conuenient a ſeat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage. But of all qualities, brauery is the leaſt requiſite vnto ſoueraigne command. The Campans were luxurious, idle, and proud and valuing themſelues like layes by their feathers, deſpiſed the vnfortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there ſome of the principal among them, as in other cities, that bore eſpeciall regard vnto the Maieſtie of Rome, and could not indure to heare of Innouation. But the Plebeian faction had lately ſo preuailed within Capua, that all was gouerned by the pleaſure of the Multitude; vvhich vvholly followed the direction of Pacuuius Calauius an ambitious Noble-man, vvhoſe credit grew, and was vp-held by furthering all popular deſires: whereof, the coniunction with Hannibal was not the leaſt. Some of the Capuans had offred their city to the Carthaginians ſhortly after the battaile of Thraſymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his iourny into Campania; the Dictator Fabius waiting vpon him. At that time, either the neerneſſe of the Roman Armie, or ſome other feare of the Capuans, hindred them from breaking into actuall rebellion. They had indeed no leiſure to treat about any article of new Confederacie: or had leiſure ſerued, yet were the multitude (whoſe inconſtant loue Hannibal had wonne from the Romans, by gentle vſage, & free diſmiſſing of ſome priſoners in good account among them) vnable to hold any ſuch negociation, without aduice of the Senate, which mainely impugned it. So they that had promiſed to yeeld vp their town to Hannibal, & meet him on the way, with ſome of their nobility, that ſhould aſſure him of all faithfull meaning, were driuen to ſit ſtill in a great perplexitie: as hauing failed to let in this their new friend, yet ſufficiently diſcouered themſelues, to draw vpon them the hatred of the Romans. In this caſe were no ſmall number of the Citizens: who thervpon grew the more incenſed againſt their Senate, on whom they caſt all the blame, eaſily pardoning their own cowardize. The people holding ſo tender a regard of liberty, that euen the lawfull Gouernment of Magiſtrates grieued them, with an imaginary oppreſſion, had now good cauſe to feare leſt the Senators would become their Lords indeed, & by helpe of the Romans bring them vnder a more ſtreight ſubiection, than euer they had indured. This feare being ready to breake into ſome outrage, Pacuuius made vſe of, to ſerue his owne ambition. He diſcourſed vnto the Senate, as they ſate in Counſell, about theſe motions troubling the citie: and ſaid, That he himſelfe had both married a Roman Ladie, and giuen his Daughter in marriage to a Roman: but, that the danger of forſaking the Roman partie was not now the greateſt: for that the people were violently bent to murder all the Senate, & after to ioyne themſelues with Hannibal; who ſhould countenance the fact, and ſaue them harmeleſſe. This he ſpake, as a man well knowne to be beloued himſelfe by the People, and priuy vnto their deſignes. Hauing throughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging ouer them: He proiſed neuertheleſſe to deliuer them all, and to ſet things in quiet, if they would freely put themſelues into his hands; offering his oath, or any other aſſurance that they ſhould demand, for his faithfull meaning. They all agreed. Then ſhutting vp the Court, and placing a Guard of his owne followers about it, that none might enter, nor iſſue forth, without his leaue; He called the people to aſſembly: and ſpeaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knew they would be glad to heare, he told them, that theſe wicked Gouernors were ſurpriſed by his policie, & all faſt, ready to abide what ſentence they would lay vpon them. Onely thus much he aduiſed them, as a thing which neceſſity required, That they ſhould chooſe a new Senate, before they ſatisfied their anger vpon the old. So rehearſing vnto them the names of one or two Senators, he asked what their iudgement was of thoſe. All cried out, that they were worthy of death. Chooſe then (ſaid he) firſt of all ſome new ones into their places. Hereat the multitude, vnprouided for ſuch election, was ſilent; vntill at laſt, ſome one or other aduentured to name whom he thought fit. The men ſo nominated, were vtterly diſliked by the whole Aſſembly; either for ſome known fault, baſeneſſe, and inſufficiency; or elſe euen becauſe they were vnknown, and therefore held vnworthy. This difficulty in the new Election appearing more and more, whileſt more were to be choſen; (the fitteſt men to be ſubſtituted, hauing been named among the firſt, and not thought fit enough) Pacuuius intreated, and eaſily preuailed with the people, that the preſent Senate might for this time be ſpared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtleſſe) they would make, hauing thus obtained pardon of all offences paſt. Henceforth, not onely the people, as in former times, honoured Pacuuius, and eſteemed him their Patron; but the Senators alſo were gouerned by him, to whom they acknowledged themſelues indebted, for ſauing all their liues. Neither did the Senate faile after this by all obſequiouſnes, to court the People; giuing the reines vnto their lawleſſe Wil, who elſe were likely to caſt them down: All the citie being thus of one mind; onely feare of the Romans kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battaile at Cannæ, this impediment was remoued: and few there were, that would open their mouths to ſpeake againſt the Rebellion. Yet foraſmuch as three hundred principal gentlemen of the Campans, did then ſerue the Romans in the Ile of Sicil: the Parents and Kinſmen of theſe preuailed ſo far, that Embaſſadors were ſent vnto Terentius the Conſul, to ſee his preſent caſe, and what it could miniſter of Hope or Feare. Theſe, whereſoeuer they found him, found him weakely attended, and as weake in ſpirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the ſeruice of their State, and deſired to know what he would command them. But he moſt baſely lamented vnto them the greatneſſe of the Roman misfortune: ſaying, that all was loſt; and that the Campans muſt now, not helpe the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to helpe themſelues, but make warre in their defence againſt the Carthaginians, as the Romans had ſometimes done for the Campans againſt the Samnites. Hereunto hee is ſaid to haue added a fooliſh Inuectiue againſt Hannibal and his Carthaginians: telling, How he had taught them to make bridges of ſlaughtered carkaſes, & to feed vpon mans fleſh; with ſuch other ſtuffe, as only bewraied his own feare. As for the Campans themſelues;

He

He put them in minde of their present strength: they having thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse; with monie, and all prouisions, in abundance. Thus he dismissed them, prouder than they came, & filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordship; whereas before, they were somewhat timorous, in aduenturing to seeke their owne libertie. Hauing reported this at Capua: the same Embassadors were dispatched away to Hannibal, with whom they easily made alliance, vpon these conditions; That the Campans should be absolutely free, and ruled by their own Lawes; That no Citizens of theirs should be subiect vnto any Carthaginian Magistrate, in what case soeuer, whether in War or Peace; and, That Hannibal should deliuer vnto the Campans three hundred Romane prisoners, such as themselues would choose, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicil.

Against all this Negotiation, Decius Magius, an honourable Citizen, opposed himselfe earnestly: vsing, in vaine, many perswasions, to the wilful and head-strong Multitude; whom he put in minde of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, willing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were sending Embassadors vnto Hannibal: and this also did he, when the new Alliance was concluded, but most earnestly, when a Carthaginian Garrison was entring the towne: at which time hee gaue aduice, either to keepe it out, or to fall vpon it, and to cut it in pieces, that by such a notable piece of seruice, they might make amends vnto the Romans, whom they had forsaken.

Aduertisement hereof was giuen to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not farre off, sent for Magius to come speake with him in the campe. This Magius refused: alleaging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from subiection vnto any Carthaginian; & therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon hasted himselfe towards Capua: forbearing to attempt any further vpon Naples; which he thought to haue taken in his way by Scalado, but found the wals too high, & was not well prouided to lay siege vnto it. At Capua he was entertained with great solemnity and pompe: all the people issuing forth of the towne, to behold that great Commander, which had won so many noble victories. Hauing taken his pleasure in the sight of that goodly Citie, and passed ouer his first Entertainments, He came into their Senate: where he commended their resolution, in shaking off the Roman yoke; promising, that ere long all Italie & Rome it selfe, should be driuen to acknowledge Capua as chiefe, and receiue Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who openly took part with the Romans their enemies; He prayed them, that they would not thinke him a Campan, but a traitor to the State: & vse him accordingly, giuing sentence out of hand vpon him, as he deserued. This was granted: and Magius deliuered vnto Hannibal; who vnwilling to offend the Capuans, at his first comming, by putting so great a man to death, yet fearing that they might sue for his libertie, if he kept him aliue, thought it best to send him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal setled his friendship with the Campanes: among whom, onely this Decius Magius had openly dared to speake against him; being assisted by Perolla the sonne of Pacuuius. This Perolla would haue murdered Hannibal, whilest he was at supper, the first night of his comming; had not his Fathers authority kept him from attempting any such attempt. All the towne (besides) were so earnest in the loue of their new Societie, that they are said to haue murdered all the Romans, vpon whom at the present they could lay hand; or, (which is all one) to haue smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The same course of fortune, with those of Capua, ranne some other townes thereabouts, which depended on this, as their Mother-Citie. Nola, Nuceria, Naples, Casiline, and Acerræ, were the Cities next adioyning, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went; thinking to finde them weakely manned; as they were indeed, though stoutly defended.

The Romanes at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled townes; but were faine to leaue all places, except a few of the most suspected, vnto the faith and courage of the Inhabitants. Rome it selfe was in extreame feare of Hannibals comming, at the first report of the ouerthrow at Cannæ: and the griefe of that losse was so generall, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the prouision against apparant danger. It was hard to iudge, whether the losse already receiued, or the feare of destruction presently threatning, were the more terrible. All the Senators found worke enough, to stint the noyse and lamentable bewailings, wherof the streets were full. Courtiers were sent forth, to bring word of ridings how all went whereof when Letters from the Consull came, that throughly informed them, they were so amazed, that they ran into barbarous superstition; & taking direction (as was said) from their fatall bookes, buried alive within their Gates a man and a woman Gaules and Greekes, in their Ox-market. If the bookes of Sibylline had such instructions; we may iustly thinke, that Sibyl her selfe was instructed by the Diuell. Yea is it not improbable, that extremity of feare caused them to hearken to wicked Sooth-sayers; whose detestable counsels they afterwards, for their own honor (as ashamed of such Authors) imputed to the bookes of Sibyl. An Embassador was sent to Delphi, to consult with the Oracle of Apollo; & enquire with what prayers & supplications they might pacifie the gods; & obtain an end of these calamities. This is enough to discouer the greatnes of their feare; though not serving to giue remedy. At that time came Letters out of Sicil, from the Prætor Otacilius; whom the Senate had appointed; if he found it meet, to passe ouer into Africk. In these were contained newes, of one Carthaginian Fleet, that wasted the kingdome of Hieron their good friend & confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the Iles of Ægates, which was in readines to set vpon Lilybæum, & the rest of the Roman Prouince, if the Prætor stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron. In the middest of these extremities, it was thought needfull to call home Terentius the Consull, that he might name a Dictator, to take soueraigne charge of the Weale publique, with absolute power, as necessity required. It must needs seeme strange, that all sorts of people went forth to meet the Consul; & bid him welcome home, giuing him thankes for that he had not despaired of the weale publique. But this was done (as may seeme) by order from the Senate: which therein (doubtlesse) prouided wisely, for vpholding the generall reputation. If his comming into the Citie, had renewed the lamentations & out-cries of the people: what else would haue followed, than a contempt of their wretchednes, among those that were subiect vnto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gaue it not) of bestowing vpon him their welcome, and thankes; they noysed abroad a fame, which came perhaps vnto the eares of Hannibal, of their Magnanimity & Confidence: that might seeme grounded on their remaining strength. This therefore was wisely done. But whereas Livie would haue vs thinke, that it was done generously; & out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I beleeue him not. It was done fearfully, and to couer their griefe: had they dared to shew their indignation, they would haue stricke off his head; as in fowr yeares after, Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question, & was banished by them, being lesse blame-worthy, for a smaller offence. M. Iunius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and Ti. Sempronius, Master of the horse. These fell presently to mustering of Souldiers, of whom they raised fowre new Legions, and a 1000. horse: though with much difficulty, as being faine to take vp some, that were very Boyes. These foure Legions are elsewhere forgotten in accompt of the forces leuied by this Dictator; and two Legions only set downe, that had bin enrolled in the beginning of the yeer for custody of the City. So it may be, that these two Legions being drawn into the field, foure new ones of Prætextati, or striplings were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, & so few, little confidence was to be reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding vnto them 8000 sturdy slaues, that were put in hope of liberty, if they should deserue it by manfull seruice. This not sufficing, the Dictator proclaimed, That whosoeuer ought mony & could not pay it, or had committed any capitall offence, should forthwith be discharged of his debt, or punishment, if he would serue in the war. To arme these Companies, they were fain to take down, out of their Temples and Porches, the spoiles of their enemies that had bin there set vp: among which, were 60 00. Armors of the Gaules, that had bin carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this War. To such mockery had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their insolent oppressions, that they were fain to issue forth of their own gates, in the habit of strangers, when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the same time it was, that Carthalo, with the Agents of the prisoners taken at Cannæ, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the City, but commanded, whilest he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territory. To the messengers of the captiues, audience was giuen by the Senate. They made earnest Petition, to be ransomed at the publike charge; not only the teares & lamentation of their poore kinsfolke, but the great need, wherin the City then stood, of able Souldiers, commending their ſute; which yet they obtained not. Beſides the generall cuſtome of the Romanes (held by long Tradition, and ſtrengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was ouerthrowne, and taken priſoner in the former Warre) not to be too tender of ſuch as had yeelded to the enemy; much was alledged againſt theſe who now craued ranſome: but the ſpeciall point was, that they were wilfully loſt, ſince they might haue ſaued themſelues, as others did. It ſufficed not vnto theſe poore men, to ſay, that their offence was no greater than the Conſuls; they were told, that this was great preſumption. The truth was, the State wanted money: and therefore could not want excuſes, whereby to auoid the diſburſement: whether it were ſo, or not, that any ſuch Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we find recorded. Neither muſt wee regard it, that the ſlaues which were armed for the warre, are ſaid to haue coſt more, than the ſumme did amount vnto, that would haue ranſomed theſe priſoners. For this is but a tale, deuiſed to countenance the Roman proceedings as if they had beene ſeuere; when as indeed they were ſuitable to the preſent fortune, poore, and ſomewhat beggarly. Hereof it is no little proofe, That Hannibal valued thoſe Roman ſlaues, whom he had taken in the Campe among their Maſters, at no more, than euery one the third part of a common Souldiers ranſome: and likely it is, that he offered them at the price, whereat hee thought them current. But if we ſhould ſuppoſe, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargaine for ſlaues might haue beene made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with priuate men; yet muſt we withall conſider, that theſe priuate men did onely lend theſe ſlaues for a while vnto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbeare the price of them (when by order from the Senate they were enfranchiſed) vntill the Warre ſhould be ended. If Hannibal would haue giuen ſuch long day of payment; it is likely that the Romans would haue beene his Chapmen: but ſeeing he dealt onely for ready money, they choſe rather to ſay, We will not giue, than, We cannot. The like auſteritie, vpon the ſame reaſon, but contrary pretence, was vſed toward the ſouldiers that eſcaped from that great Battaile. Theſe were charged for hauing fled: as the priſoners were, for not flying, when they might haue done ſo. True it is, that in ſuch caſes (if euer) that which they call raggione del State may ſerue for an excuſe: when the Common-wealth being driuen to a miſerable exigent, is faine to helpe it ſelfe, by doing iniuries to priuate men. And ſo dealt the Romans now: condemning all thoſe that had ſerued at Canne, to be tranſported into Sicil; and there to ſerue, not as others did, vntill they had fulfilled twenty yeeres in the Warres, or elſe were fifty yeeres of age; but vntill this Warre ſhould be ended, how long ſoeuer it laſted, and that without reward. The ſame thrifty cenſure, was afterwards laide vpon others, for their miſbehauiour: but neuer vpon any man of quality, ſaue only (a good while after this, at better leiſure) vpon Cecilius Metellus, and a few other hare-braind fooles his companions; who being frighted out of their wittes with the terrour of ſo great a loſſe, were deuiſing, after the battaile, which way to runne out of Italie, when Hannibal as yet had ſcarce one Towne within it. The inequality of this rigour grew ſhortly diſtaſtfull to the Commonalty: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the people; neuertheleſſe it was quietly digeſted, the excuſe being no leſſe apparant than the fault.

M. Iunius the Dictator, hauing diſpatched all needfull buſineſſe within the Citie, tooke the field with fiue and twenty thouſand men. What he did with this Armie, I cannot find: not more of him than this, That he ſpent the time about Campania; where (as may be preſumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be aſcribed, that Hannibal did no greater euill: for of any euill done to Hannibal, by the Romans in this their weake eſtate, onely Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Praetors, lay at Oſtia, with a Fleet ready to ſet ſaile for Sicil, hauing one Legion aboord his ſhips, and fifteene hundred other Souldiers newly taken vp: with which forces hee was to defend that Iland, and doe what harme he could in Africk. But hearing of the ouerthrow at Canna, hee ſent theſe of his new Leuy to Rome, for defence of the Citie; and marched haſtily with his Legion toward Canuſium: deliuering the Fleete, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magiſtrates, and chiefe Citizens of Nola, to helpe them: who were like to be forced by the multitude (affected, as were the reſt of the Campanes) to let in the Carthaginian; and knew not how to auoid this otherwiſe, than by ſeeming to deliberat about the articles of this new Confederacy. Wherefore hee made great iournies thitherward; and arriued euen time enough enough to encounter the enemy: Many did enable themselues thereby, becomming resolute, and despising the flying bands, which did assaile them, they found all the contrary to their wishing, and not suspected vpon the least touch of alarme, how they did also fare vnfaithfully by it, specially in the losse sustained in the Confederates, by spoiling of their goods and Villages abroad in the Country. But aboue all it was thought a valuable consideration, That Hannibal was Master of the field, which if he laid waste all the poore people grew vtterly vndone. So thought the Multitude, of such (as I say) some, that had feare of their own priuate moueables, more then a good desire to gratifie the Consul in the publique: of these, one Lucretius was chiefe; a noble young Gentleman, and Souldier of speciall note, but beloued in the Citie for one that had done good seruice to the same: but was found by Marcellus, halfe dead at Canna, and after much gentle vsage and vpon dainty, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with all gentle therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to render the greatest thankes he could vnto so courteous an enemy. Marcellus perceiuing this, wrought vpon the same good nature of the Gentleman, and taking notice of him, as if it had beene by chance, framed so wonderfully, that he had so well deserued of the Roman State, had more particularly him the Praetor, who desired nothing more then such acquaintance. So with many recommendations, gifts, and loning entertainment, being himselfe also a man highly esteemed for his personall valour, he made this Roman so fierce in loue with him, that nothing could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans, whereof he had not presently aduertisement. At the comming of Marcellus, Hannibal remoued from about Nola, and lay ayed, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a new Garrison, vpon confidence whereof they gaue him a peremptorie answer, to his discontent. Thence went he to Nolaria: which he tooke by composition, and so returned backe againe to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore vnto him: who although they durst not shine in his quarrell, being ouerawed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly beseed and forced to turne his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies assaying him without, like enough it seemed, that they would not be wanting vnto the accomplishment of their own desires. He therefore brought his Army close to the Towne, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to do much good, but only to make shew of a meaning to force the Towne, which he sought in the meane while to winne by intelligences. In the night time there passed messages betweene him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his forces, could be trained into the field, the Multitude within the Towne should presently rise, and seizing vpon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was aduertised: and fearing, lest the Conspirators would shortly aduenture, euen to find him busied within the Citie, whilest the Carthaginians should scale the walles, he thought it the surest way, to cut off the enemies hope, and send him away betimes.

Wherfore ordering his men in three Companies, within three seuerall gates looking towards the enemy: He gaue a streight command, that all the Citizens should keepe their houses. Thus he lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder; against whom he had customarily issued forth before more early, euery day, to skirmish.
But when it was further noted, that the walles were bare, and not a man appearing on them, then thought Hannibal, that surely all was discouered, and Marcellus now busied with the Citizens. Wherupon he bad his men bring ladders, and make ready for the assault: which was done in all haste. But when the Carthaginians were at the very walls, and thought nothing lesse, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: suddenly the middle gate was opened, whereat Marcellus, with the best and oldest of his Souldiers, brake forth vpon them, with a great noise, to make his vnexpected sally the more terrible. Whilest the Carthaginians, much out of order, were some of them flying before Marcellus, the rest making head against him: the other two gates opened, whereat in like sort issued they of the new leuied Companies, vpon the enemies backes.
The sudden terror was more auaileable vnto the Romans, than their force: yet the Execution was so great, that this was accounted as a victory, and reputed one of the bravest things performed in all that Warre; forasmuch as hereby it was first prooued, that Hannibal might be ouercome. After this, Marcellus, being freed from his enemies that were departed, tooke a strict accompt of the Citizens of Nola: condemning about therefore beten of high Tarolum, or beside, and be fraid off, & so leaning the Town in quiet obedience vnto the Romans, vvould be contented by abdue [illegible] into the meane season vvas gotte be[illegible] in, & they hauing concluded, the thought of new reuolt out, lose time in perswasions, but bidde fight out, & began on all sides to clime vp. This amused the People, who knew [illegible] hold out. There- fore before his Workes vvere finished, and they quite surrounded, they stole out by night, and left him the Towne empty, vvhich he fasked and burnt. Then hearing newes of the Dictator, that he vvas about Casilinum, thither vvent Hannibal, as being vvilling that an Enemy so neere should disquiet him at home vvhere he meant to Winter. It seemeth, or rather indeed it is plaine, that the late victory of Marcellus had nothing abated the spirit of the Carthaginian: vvho durst with a small part of his Army seeke out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Romane strength. Wherefore the ioy of the Romanes vpon so slight an occasion as the death of some two thousand of his men, the most, and those not slaine in plaine battelle, but by a sudden eruption; vvherein chiefly, in vvhat great feare they stood of Hannibal, & how Crest-fallen they vvere hauing three yeeres since demanded at Carthage, the body of Hamilcar, to be deliuered into their pleasure by his own Citizens, could not please themselues, as vvith good reason to heare, That in a skirmish not far from Rome he appeared to be a man, and not irresistible. At Casilinum the Dictator vvas not: but many Companies of Italian Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Towne, & held it. Five hundred of the Prae- nestines vvere there, and about foure hundred of Aricia, vvith some of the Lanuvini. All these had the good hap, to come too late to the battaile at Cannae, being sent by the Se- nate all Straits to the Campe; whither whilest they vvere marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountred them, & sent them back sorrowfull; for they loued well their Lords the Romans, vnder vvhose gouernment they liued happily. So came they all one after another to Casilinum, where they met and stayed. Neither had they stayed there long, ere they heard newes from Capua, How that great Citie became the ring- leader of all the Campanes into rebellion. The people of Casilinum were affected as they of Capua: and therefore sought how to rid their hands of those Praenestines and their fel- lowes; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many traines laide vnto for another, at last they slew all the Townsmen in a night, and fortified the Westerne part of the Towne (for it was diuided by the Riuer Vulturnus) against the Enemy. If they had run away with the goods, and pretended, that these of Casilinum were as the rest of the Campanes, all Traitors, they themselues might haue bin reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their constancy in defence of the place witnesseth, vpon what honest reason they surprised it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to haue encountred with greater forces: but these few found him more vvorke than he expected. Diuers assaults he gaue, but was still repelled with losse: and many sallies they made, with vari- able euent. The Enemy mined, and they countermined: opposing so much industry to his force, that he was driuen to close them vp, and seeke to winne them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Master of the horse, lay with the Roman Army higher vp the Riuer: who faine would haue relieued Casilinum, but that the Dictator, being gone to Rome about some matters of Religion, had giuen him expresse charge not to fight till his returne. Marcellus from Suessula could not comes his way being stopped by the ouerflowings of Vulturnus; the Nolans also beseeching him not to leaue them, vvho were in danger of the Campanes, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the water stayed his iourney, such entreaties were needlesse. Neither is it like that the Dictator tarryed at Rome so long, as till extreme famine had consumed the Garrison in Casilinum. Wherfore it may be thought, that the Towne vvas lost, because the Romans durst not aduenture to raise the siege. Barrels of corne were sent by night, floting down the Riuer; & when some of these, being carryed awry by an Eddie of the water, stucke among the Willowes on the bank, wherby this manner of relieue was discouered and preuented; Gracchus cast a great quantity of Nuts into the streame, which faintly sustained the poore besieged men. At length when all food vvas spent, and whatsoeuer grew greene vnder the Walles was gathered for Sallets; the Carthaginians ploughed vp the ground: whereon the besieged presently sowed Rape-seede. Hannibal seeing this, admired their patience; and said, That he meant not to stay at Casilinum, vntill the Rapes were grown. Wherefore, though hitherto he had refused to hearken vnto any Composition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by punishing their obstinacy; yet now he was content, to grant them their liues at an indifferent ransom, which when they had paid, he quietly dismissed them according to his promise. Seuen hundred Carthaginians he placed in Casilinum, as a Garrison for defence of the Campanes; vnto whom he restored it. To the Praenestins Souldiers great thankes were giuen, and louing rewards; among which they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their present condition pleased them so well, that they chose rather to continue, as they were, in Praeneste: which is no weake proofe, of the good estate wherein the Cities flourished, that were subiect to the Roman Gouernment. This siege of Casilinum was not a little beneficiall to the Romans, as hauing long detained Hannibal, and consumed much of his time, that might otherwise haue bin better spent. For Winter ouer-took him, long before he could dispatch the businesse: which how to quit with his honour he knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where he refreshed his Army, or rather corrupted it, as all Historians report, & made it effeminate; though, notwithstanding as it was, He therewithall did often beate the Romans in following times, as shall appeare hereafter.

The great supply that was decreed at Carthage to be sent to Hannibal into Italie. How by the malice of Hanno, and sloth or parsimony of the Carthaginians, the supply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faster, than of the Romans. Of Fabius and other old Roman Historians, how partiall they were in their writings.

WHen Mago, the son of Amilcar, had spent some time about the taking in of such Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battaile at Canne, his brother Hannibal sent for him to Capua, & thence dispatched him away to Carthage, with the ioyfull message of Victory. He told the Carthaginian Senate, with how many Generals his brother had fought, what Consuls he had chased, wounded, or slain; how the stout Romans, that in the former war neuer shunned any occasion of fight, were now growne so calme, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Captain, because he neuer durst aduenture to come to battaile; That, not without reason, their spirits were thus abated, since Hannibal had slain of them aboue two hundred thousand, and taken aboue fifty thousand prisoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italy, that following the fortune of those great victories, had reuolted vnto the Carthaginians. Among the rest he magnified Capua, as a goodly City, and fit to be not only (as already it was) Head of all the Campanes, but the chiefe seate of their Dominion in Italie: and there he informed them, how louingly his brother had bin entertained, where he meant to rest that winter, attending their supply. As for the warr, He said it was euen at an end, if they would now pursue it closely, and not giue the Romans any breathing time, wherein to recollect themselues, and repaire their broken forces. He willed them to consider, that the warr was far from home, in the Enemies Country; that so many battailes had much diminished his brothers Armie: that the Souldiers, who had so well deserued, ought to be considered with liberall rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of mony, corne, and other necessaries; but that these things must be sent from Carthage: which the victory would requite with large amends. Finally, hee caused the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were slaine, to be powred out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three bushels, or (as others would rather haue it) no more than one, adding, that by this might appeare the greatnesse of the Roman calamity, for as much as none but the * principall of that Order, were accustomed to weare that ornament.

Who so considers the former Punicke Warres, may easily find, that the State of Carthage neuer did receiue, in all the distance therof, any such hopefull aduertisements from their Captaines abroad. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if the errand of Mago found extraordinary welcome. In the vehemency of this ioy, Himilco, a Senator aduerse to the faction of Hanno, is said to haue demanded of that great perswader vnto peace with Rome,

* Thus Liuie reports it: and credible it is that while Rome was poore, the bravery of priuate men was not altogether so great, as the Law would haue permitted; though otherwise Ius Annuli. The wearing of the Ring, was the generall priuiledge of the Roman Equites.

Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should be yeelded vp vnto the Romans, or whether he would forbid them to giue thanks vnto the gods, for this their good successe. Hereunto though it be not likely that Hanno made the same formall answer, which Liuie puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres conscripti, by a terme proper to the Romans, and putting them in minde of his owne shamefull ouerthrow receiued at the Ilands Aegates: yet the summe of his speech appeares to haue been no lesse malicious, than it is set downe, forasmuch as Hannibal himselfe, at his departure out of Italie, exclaimed against the wickednesse of this Hanno, saying, that his hatred against the Barcines, had oppressed their Familie, when otherwise it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a iest of these victories, as is reported; saying, It ill beseemed him, who had vanquished the Romans, to call for more helpe, as if he had been beaten, or him, that had taken their campe, filled forsooth with spoyle, to make request and money. To these cauils, if answer were needfull, it might be said, That other booty than of horses and slaues, little was to be found in the Roman campe: the best of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few [a] siluer studs in the bridles and trappings of their horses. If Hannibal had taken any maine conuoy of money and prouisions, going to supply all wants of a great Army in some other Prouince, (as the two Scipio's are afterwards said to haue done, when they wanne the campe of Asdrubal, that carried along with him all the wealth of Spaine, in his iourney towards Italy) then might such an obiection more iustly haue been made vnto his demand of a supply. But the most likely part of Hanno his Oration, and wherein he best might hope to preuaile, contained a perswasion to vse their fortune with moderation, and now to seeke peace, whilest they had so much the better in warre.

What would haue been the issue of his counsaile, if it had been followed, it were not easie to say. For though it be likely, that the Roman pride would haue brooked much indignity, in freeing Italy from the danger of warre, yet it is not likely that the faith so often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would haue been kept entire, when any opinion of good aduantage had called for reuenge of so many shamefull ouerthrowes; since after this warre ended, and a new league concluded, no submissiue behauiour could preserue Carthage from ruine, longer than vntill such time, as Rome was at leisure from all other warres. This counsaile therefore of Hanno, though it might seeme temperate, was indeed very pestilent, and serued onely to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a maine consent of the Senate, that forty thousand Numidians, forty Elephants, and great abundance of siluer, should be sent ouer to Hannibal: and that, besides these, twenty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, should be leuied in Spaine, not onely to supply, as need should require, the Armies in that Prouince, but to be transported into Italy.

This great aide, had it beene as carefully sent, as it was readily decreed, the Roman Historians would not haue found cause, to taxe the retchlesse improuidence of Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Cannæ to Rome, or in refreshing his Army among the delights of Capua: the next yeeres worke would haue finished the businesse, with lesse dangerous aduenture, and the pleasures, which his men enioyed among the Campanes, would haue been commended, as rewards by him well thought vpon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to be imployed in the following Warre. But either the too much carelessnesse of these, that were loth to make haste in laying out their money, before extreame necessity required it, or the crafty malice of Hanno, and his fellowes, working vpon the priuate humours of men, that had more feeling of their owne commodity, than sense of the publike needs, vtterly peruerted, and made vnprofitable in the performance, the order that had been so well set downe. The Elephants were sent: and some money peraduenture, vncertaine it is, how long after. But those great forces of threescore thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, came not into Italy, till much was lost of that which already had been gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Army, was first consumed by time, and sundry accidents of warre. Onely some small numbers, no way answering vnto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spaine, and the iourney of Asdrubal thence through France into Italie much talked of, but he not enabled thereunto, till many yeeres were past, and the Romans had recouered their strength.

Heere we may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their Citie, both by

by the Tributes receiued from their subiects, and by their wealthy Trade of Merchandize. For it is not long, since the Warre of the Mercenaries, and the perfidious tyranny of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessitie twelue hundred talents, had exceedingly impouerished Carthage, which was before brought into great want, euen by the expence of so much money, as was to be disbursed for redeeming of peace, after the losse at Egatis. Yet wee see, what great Armies of Numidians, and Spaniards, besides those already on foote, are appointed to the seruice in Italy, and how little the Carthaginians feare the want of money in these chargeable vndertakings: whereas the Romans, on the other side, hauing three or foure yeeres together beene forced to some extraordinary cost, are faine to goe vpon credit, euen for the price of those slaues, which they bought of their owne Citizens to arme for their defence. Such aduantage, in meanes to enrich their Treasury, had the wealthy Merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterrain Sea, euen from Tyrus their Mother-Citie in the bottome of the streights vnto the great Ocean, about the Romans: who liued on the fruites of their ground and receiued their Tributes from people following the same course of life. When time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leisure to shew it selfe, in the destruction of Carthage; the impudence of Roman falshood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of faith, discouered plainly whence the iealousie was bred, that this mighty City would againe rebell. For the Carthaginians, hauing giuen vp hostages, euen before the Roman Army did set forth, to performe whatsoeuer should be enioyned them, with condition that their City might not bee destroyed; and hauing accordingly, when they were so required, yeelded vp all their weapons, and engines of Warre; the Romans told them plainely, That the Citie of Carthage, which was the body of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withall, but the Towne must needes be demolished, and remoued into some other place, that should be twelue miles distant from the Sea. For (said the Romans) this Trade of Merchandize, by which yee now liue, is not so fit for peaceable men, such as yee promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of Husbandry; an wholesome kind of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities, which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conuersation. This villainous dealing of the Romans, though sugred with glosing words plainly shewes, what good obseruation the elder Cato had made of the hasty growth of Carthage in riches. For when, being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatsoeuer it were, he added still this conclusion, That I think, and that Carthage should be destroyed; He may seeme, not onely to haue had regard vnto that present wealth, which at his being there hee had found in the City, but much more vnto these times, and the great height whereunto it rose, euen suddenly as wee see, out of many calamities, whilest the Romans thought, that it had not been in case to dare sometime a Warre.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skilfull than the Romans; so came they farre short of them, in the honourable care of the publike good: hauing euery one, or most of them, a more principall regard of his owne priuate benefit. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in victors) when the first heate of their affection (wherein they concluded to pursue the warre strongly) was ouer-past, goe more leisurely to worke, than had been requisite in the execution. It was easie for Hanno to perswade couetous men, that they should first of all defend their owne in Spaine. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Prouince was secured, they might send an Army into Italie; so going to worke orderly by degrees. For it were no wisdome, to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to the hazard of fortune, against the enemies; or (which perhaps were worse) to the Gouernment of an ambitious man, and his brethren, who hauing once (if they could so do) finished the warre, might easily make Hannibal a King, and subdue Carthage, with the forces that he had giuen them to the conquest of Rome.

By such malicious working of Hanno, and by their owne slacknesse, incredulity, dulnes, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were perswaded rather to make final disbursements in Spain, than to set vp all their rest at once in Italy. Yet was it indeed impossible, to hold a Country of so large extent, and so open a coast as that of Spaine, free from all incursion of the Enemy: especially the affection of the Naturals being (as in a new Conquest) ill established. A better way therefore it had beene to make a running Warre, by which

which the Romans might haue bin found occupied, euen vvith the ordinary Carthaginian Garrisons, or some little addition thereunto. For if it were thought meet, to defer the prosecution of their maine intendment against Rome it self, vntill such time as euery little thorne were pulled out of the sides of so great a Prouince, then must Emporiæ haue bin besieged and forced: vvhich by reason of alliance with the Massilians, gaue vnto the Romans, at all times when they pleased, a ready and secure Harbour. But the towne of Emporiæ vvas not so strong to be woon in haste: it had long defended it selfe against the Barbarians, hauing not aboue foure hundred paces of wall to the main Land, and exceedingly well fortified. A great Spanish Town of the same name, lying without it, that was three miles in compasse, very strong likewise, and friend vnto the Gnecians, though not ouer-much trusted. Wherefore to force this towne of Emporiæ, that was, besides the proper strength, like to be so well assisted by the Massilians, Romans, and some Spaniards, would haue bin a worke of little lesse difficulty, than vvas the Roman warre (in appearance) after the battaile at Cannæ: yet it had bin in effect none other, than to alter the face of the vvarre, which Hannibal had already fixed, with better iudgement, neere vnto the gates of Rome. The difficulty of this attempt, being such as caused it altogether to be forborne, great folly it was, to be much troubled about expelling the Romans vtterly out of Spaine: vvhom they might more easily haue diuerted thence, and drawn home to their own doores, by making strong vvar vpon their City. For euen so the Romans afterwards remooued Hannibal into Affrick, by sending an Army to Carthage; and by taking the like course, they now endeuoured to change the seate of the vvar, transferring it out of Italie into Spaine. But the priuate affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwise, than as it is accessary to their owne purposes, did make them easily winke at opportunities, and hope, that some what would fall out well of it selfe, though they set not too their helping hands. Hanno vvas a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him so, were well enough contented to hearken vnto his discourses, so long as they were plausible, and tended to keepe the purse full. In the meane vvhile they suffered Hannibal, & all the noble house of Amilcar, to weary themselues in trauaile for the Common-wealth: vvhich all Carthage in generall highly commended, but weakly assisted, as if the industry of these Barcliues had bin somwhat more than needfull. Surely the Carthaginians, in generall, were far lesse honourable than the people of Rome, not only in gouernment of their subiect Prouinces, but in administration of their own Estate, few of them preferring the respect of the Weale publike aboue their priuate interest. But as they thriued little in the end, by their parsimony vsed toward their own Mercenaries, vvhen the former Roman war was finished: so the conclusion of this vvar present, will make them complaine, with feeling sighes, of their negligence in supplying Hannibal, after the victory at Cannæ; vvhen gladly they vvould giue all their Treasures, to redeme the opportunity, that now they let passe, as if it vvere cost enough to send a few handfuls into Spaine.

That both the Spanish businesse, and the estate of Affrick it self, depended wholly, or for the most part, vpon successe of things in Italie; the course of actions following will make manifest. Particularly how matters vvere ordered in Spaine by the Carthaginian Gouernours, it is very hard, and almost impossible, to set downe. For though we must not reprehend, in that worthy Historian Liuie, the tender loue of his own Country, vvhich made him giue credit vnto Fabius &c others: yet must vve not, for his sake, beleeue those lies, which the vnpartiall iudgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gaue them originall. It were needlesse to rehearse all that may be found in Polybius concerning the vntruth of that Roman Historian Fabius. One example may suffice. He saith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former vvar, That hauing cleane spent their strength, and being euen broken with many miseries, they were glad to submit themselues vnto the Romans. Contrary hereunto we find in the life of Amilcar, set downe by Æmilius Probus, That Eryx vvas in such sort held by the Carthaginians, that it seemed to be in as good condition, as if in those parts there had not bin any vvar. These words, being referred to the braue resolution of the Carthaginian souldiers, and the singular vertue of their Generall infusing such spirit into them; may be taken as not ouer liberall. For in the treaty of peace between Amilcar and Catulus when the Romans first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay downe their Armes and forsake Sicily, threatning, that otherwise he vvould not talke of any composition:

Pol. lib. 1.

which holdly had him chuse, whether he would take of it, or no; for that the Armes, which the Country had put into his hands to vse against her Enemies, it was not his purpose to giue vp vnto them. Now since the Romans, contrary to their custome vpon like aduantages, were content to let Annibal haue his will, & not to stand with him vpon point of honour, whilest otherwise they might quietly rid their hands of him; plaine enough is it, that they were forgone from thinking him a man consumed with miseries, as Fabius would haue him seeme. How due to ignore the relation of Polybius: who flatly, & by name, charged Fabius with untruth in saying, that how soeuer Amilcar, & his Souldiers, had endured extremities, yet they behaued themselues as men that had no sense thereof; and that for the foode being either vanquished, or tired, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference between Fabius (as also perhaps between other old Writers of the Roman fame) & these that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mighty City of Rome: we will take it in good part, that howsoeuer Liuie introduceth Hanno, in one place, ioying foolishly, his own shamefull ouerthrow at the Ilands, Ægates, with the great * Aegatis Insulis, Eryce-que ante oculos proposito, &c. Liu. lib. 21. a Liu. lib. 23. slaughter of Amilcar his army: as if both of them had had a like euent; yet * elsewhere he forbeares so to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his own happy conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him say, That the affaires of Carthage went neuer better, than a little before the losse of their Fleet in that battaile at Sea, wherein himselfe was Generall. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine, there is cause to wish, that this Fabius, with Val. Antias, & others of the like stamp, had neuer written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the good affection of Liuie to his Rome, had not caused him to thinke too well of their relations, which are such as follow.

The reports of the Roman victories in Spaine, before Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar followed thence his brother Hannibal into Italie.

We haue shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul, returning from Gaule into Italie, to encounter with Hannibal at his descent from the Alpes, sent before him his brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Army, into Spaine. Two Roman legions, with fourteene thousand foot of the Confederates, and twelue hundred horse, had bin allotted vnto the Consul, therewith to make war in Spaine against Hannibal: who since he was marching into Italie with the strength of his Army, did not beleeue, that a good part of these his own forces might well be spared from the Spanish Expedition; & therefore made bold to carry some of the number backe with him, sending on his brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publius himselfe remained in Italie all the time of his Consulship: which being expired, He was sent Proconsul into Spaine by the Senate, with an Armie of eight thousand men, and a Fleet of thirty Gallies.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Prouince, were very great; and, as they are reported, somewhat maruellous. For they continually preuailed in Spaine, against the Carthaginians: whom they vanquished in so many battailes, and with-drew from their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates; that we haue cause to wonder, how the enemy could so often find meanes to repaire his forces, and returne strong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliuer the Country from the tyranny of Carthage, might easily win vnto their Confederacy, as many as were galled with the Punian yoke, and durst aduenture to breake it: so the ancient reputation of the first Conquerors might serue to arme the Naturals against these Inuaders; and to reclaime those, that had reuolted vnto the Romans, were it only by the memory of such ill successe, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian Treasure, which easily raised Souldiers, among those valiant, but (in that Age) poore, and gold-thirsty Nations. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinsmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian Warre, or serning the Carthaginians in Affrike. And peraduenture, if we durst be bold to say it, the victories of the Scipio's were neither so many, nor so great as they are set out by Liuie. This we may be bold to say, That the great Captaine Fabius, or Liuie in his person, maketh an obiection vnto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Liuie for him,

Liu.lib.28. doth answer, That if Asdrubal were vanquished, as Scipio would say, by him in Spaine, strange it was, and as little to his honour, if it had been a thousand leagues to Rome, that the same vanquished man should invade Italie. And in this indeede is somewhat incredible appearing: That Asdrubal being enclosed on all sides, and not hauing bow or scope out at battaile, saue onely by the steepe descent of Rockes, (vpon a great Riuer that lay at his backe) ran away with all his mony, Elephants, & broken troupes, ouer Pyrene; directly vnto the Pyrenees, and so toward Italy; vpon which he fell with about three thousand armed souldiers. Neither doe I see, how it hangs well together, That he chose a peece of ground very defensible, but most incommodious for his retraite, if ill should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his money and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the Enemy: Or how it could be, that the Elephants, being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for so at least they said it was done in the last battaile between him & Scipio) from breaking into his Campe: Wherefore we can no more than be sorry, that all Carthaginian records of this Warre, and specially, (if there were any) being vtterly lost, we can know no question thereof, than that it hath pleased the Romans to tell vs: vnto whom it were no wisedome to giue ouermuch credit. In this regard, I will summarily run ouer the doings of the Scipio's in Spaine, not greatly insisting on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporie, an Hauen towne, not farre within the Pyrene, retaining still the same name with little inflection. That by the fame of his clemency he allured many Nations to become subiect vnto Rome, as the storie begins of him, I could easily beleeue, if I vnderstood by what occasion they had need to vse his clemency, or he to giue such famous example thereof, being a meere stranger, and hauing no iurisdiction in the Country. Yet is it certaine, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himselfe into the loue of the Barbarians; among whom, his dexterity in practice had the better successe, for that he seemed to haue none other end, than setting them at liberty. This pretext availed with some: others were to be bought with mony: and some he compelled to yeeld by force or feare; especially, when he had won a battaile against Hanno. Into all Treaties of accord, made with these people, likely it is that he remembred to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances neuer forgate, vnlesse in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, as their Superiours; Maiestatem Pop. Rom. comiter conseruent, which is, as Tullie interprets it, That they should gently (or kindly) vphold the Maiestie of the People of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome: yet implyed it indeed an obscure couenant of subiection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became diuisi Romanæ; of the Romane iurisdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Country wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italy; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience. Particularly in the Bargusians; Hannibal had found, at his comming among them, such an apprehension of the Roman greatnesse, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Gouernour ouer them, as ouer the rest of the Prouince between Iberus and the Pyrenees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceiue it; for I doe not think he gaue the Principality of their Country vnto Hanno and his Heires,) He made him not only Lieutenant generall ouer them, in matters of Warre, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but tooke from them all inferiour Officers of their own, leauing them to be gouerned by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to reioyce at the comming of Scipio: with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to ioyne; it being the custome of all conquered Nations, in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselues indiscreetly into the protection of others, that many times proue worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanois, in the age of our Grand-fathers, weary by turnes of the Spaniards, and French; as more sensible still of the present euill which they felt, than regardfull of the greater mischiefe, whereinto they ran by seeking to auoide it. This bad affection of his Prouince, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left vnto him: besides which it is like, that some forces he was able to raise out of his Prouince. Therfore he aduentured a battaile with Scipio, wherein he was ouerthrowne and taken. Following this victory, Scipio besieged Stissum, a Towne hard by, and wonne it.

it. But Asdrubal hauing passed Iberus, and comming too late to the reliefe of Hanno, with eight thousand foot, and a thousand horse, fell vpon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not farre about Tarracon, whom he found careleſſe, as after a victory, rouing abroad in the countrey; and with great slaughter draue them aboord their ships. This done, hee ranne vp into the Countrey, where he withdrew the Illergetes from the Roman partie, though they had giuen Hoſtages to Scipio. Scipio in the meane ſeaſon was gone to viſit and aide his Fleete: where hauing ſet things in order, he returned backe, and made toward Asdrubal, who durſt not abide his comming, but withdrew himſelfe againe ouer Iberus. So the Illergetes were compelled by force; hauing loſt Athanagia their chiefe Citie, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increaſe the number of their Hoſtages. The Auſetani likewiſe, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were beſieged in their chiefe Towne: which they defended thirty dayes; hoping, in vaine, that the ſharpe Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell, would haue made the Romans to diſlodge. But they were faine at length to yeeld: and for this their obſtinacy, they were amerced twenty talents of ſilver. During the ſiege, the Lacetani came to helpe their diſtreſſed Neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leauing twelue thouſand of their Company dead behinde them. I cannot but wonder, how theſe Lacetani, that are ſaid to be the firſt which embraced the friendſhip of Scipio, ſhould without any cauſe remembred, become Carthaginian on the ſudden, in the next newes that we heare of them. As alſo it is ſtrange, that all the Sea-coaſt Northward of Iberus, hauing lately become voluntarily ditionis Romanæ, ſubiit vnto Rome, ſhould in continuance of the Story, after a few lines, hold Warre Liu. lib. 21. against Scipio, without any reſiſtance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I beleeue, that Asdrubal, as it were by a charme, ſtirred vp the Illergetes, making them lay aſide all care of their Hoſtages, and take Armes in his quarrell; whileſt himſelfe had not the daring to ſtand againſt Scipio, but ranne away, and ſaued himſelfe beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or ſome Carthaginian Writer, would haue told it thus: That Scipio aduenturing too farre into the Countrey, was beaten by Aſdrubal backe to his ſhips, whence he durſt not ſtirre, vntill Winter came on: at what time the Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Prouince, leauing ſome few Garriſons to defend thoſe places, that after Scipio was gone, by returning vpon them, vnlooked for through a deepe ſnow. As for the Lacetani, Illergetes, and the reſt, wee may reaſonably thinke, that they ſought their owne benefit: helping themſelues one while by the Romans againſt the Carthaginians; and contrariwiſe, vpon ſenſe of iniuries receiued, or apprehenſion of more grieuous tyranny, vnder which they feared to be brought by theſe new Maſters, harkening againe vnto the comfortable promiſes of thoſe, that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to liue vnder their owne Countrey Lawes, and not vnder Gouernours ſent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may teſtifie: euen from hencefoorth vnto the dayes of Auguſtus Cæſar; till when they were neuer throughly conquered.

The yeere following this, Cn. Scipio had a victorie againſt the Carthaginians in fight at Sea, or rather came vpon them vnlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, moſt of their men being on ſhore. All their ſhips, that ranne not two farre on ground, he tooke: and thereby grew Maſter of the whole coaſt; landing at pleaſure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defenced. After this victory, aboue one hundred and twenty Nations, or petty Eſtates, in Spaine, are ſaid to haue ſubmitted themſelues vnto the Romans, or giuen Hoſtages: whereby Aſdrubal was compelled to flie into the vtmoſt corners of the land, and hide himſelfe in Lucitania. Yet it followes; that the Illergetes did againe rebell; that Aſdrubal hereupon came ouer Iberus; and that Scipio (though hauing lately vanquiſhed the Illergetes) went not forth to meete him, but ſtirred vp againſt him the Celtiberians, that lately were become his ſubiects, and had giuen him Hoſtages. Theſe tooke from the Carthaginian three Townes, and vanquiſhed him in two battailes; wherein they ſlew fifteene thouſand of his men, and tooke foure thouſand Priſoners. Then returned P. Scipio, with the ſupply before mentioned: and henceforward the two brethren iointly adminiſtred the buſineſſe in Spaine.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian warre, the two Scipio's did both conſenter, without both feare or doubt, paſſe ouer Iberus, and beſieged Seguntum. Little cauſe of doubt had they, if Cn. had already ſubdued many Nations beyond it, and among many others, the ſame Celtiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquiſh

Asdrubals Lieutenant, the Gouernor of Tarracon, a simple man, suffered himself to be perswaded by one Acidas a Spaniard, that the only way to get the fauour & hearty good will of the Contrey, was by freely restoring vnto them their Hostages, receiuing, without any pledge, assured of their faith. But the crafty Spaniard, being inabled with this message & restitution of the Hostages, carried them all to the Romane Generals, perswading them, as he had done Bostar, to make the Liberality their owne. Hereby the Romans purchased much loue, if the tale were true, & if it were not rather vtter, as afterward, and by this we find, that all the Spanish Hostages were left in new Carthage. I am weary of rehearsing so many particularities, whereof I can beleeue so few. But since we find no better certainties, we must content our selues with these.

The yeare following was like vnto this: Asdrubal must be beaten again, by Scipio, diuide their forces: Cn. makes war by Land; P. by Sea. Asdrubal, with much labour and entreaty, hauing gotten foure thousand foot, & fiue hundred horse, out of Celtiberia, He repaires his Fleet; and prouides euery way to make resistance. But all his chiefe Sea-men, and Masters of his ships, reuolt vnto the Romans, because they had bin chidden the last yeare for their negligence, which had betrayed the Nauy. The reuolt of these ship-masters animates to rebellion the Carpetani, or Carpesani, an warlike people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spaine. These do much mischiefe, so that Asdrubal is fain to make a iourney to them. His sudden comming cuts off some of them, that were found scattered abroad in the fields. But they, making head, so valiantly assaile him, that they driue him, for very feare, to encampe himselfe strongly on an high peece of ground; whence he dares not come forth to giue them battaile. Soone after, take a Towne by force, wherein he had laid vp all his prouisions; and shortly make themselues Masters of the Country round about. This good successe breeds negligence, for which they dearely pay. Asdrubal comes vpon them, takes them vnprepared, beates them, kills the most of them, and disperseth the rest; so that the whole Nation yeelded vnto him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Asdrubal should leade his Army forth into Italy: which we may wonder, why the Carthaginians would appoint him to do, if they had bin informed by his letters in what hard case he was, and had so weakly supplyed him, as is shewed before. But thus we find it reported: and that vpon the very rumour of this his iourney, almost all Spaine was ready to fall to the Romans. Asdrubal therfore sends word presently to Carthage, That this must not be so: or, if they will needs haue it so, that then they must send him a Successor, and well attended with a strong Army, which to imploy they should find worke more than enough; such notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage is not much mooued with this excuse: Asdrubal must needs be gone; Himilco, with such forces as are thought expedient for that seruice both by Land & Sea, is sent to take the charge of Spaine. Wherefore Asdrubal hath now no more to do, than to furnish himselfe with store of money, that he might haue wherewithall to win the friendship of the Gauls; through whose Countries he must passe, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly to blame, for not remembring to ease him of this care. But since it can be no better, he layes great Impositions vpon all the Spaniards his subiects: and hauing gotten together as much treasure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Romans hearing these newes, are carefull how to arrest him on the way. They besiege Ibera (so called of the Riuers name running by it) the richest towne in all those quarters, that was confederate with Asdrubal; who thereupon steps aside to relieue it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battaile with him: which they winne the more easily, for that the Spaniards, his followers, had rather be vanquished at home, than get the victory, and afterwards be haled into Italy. Great numbers are slaine: and few should haue escaped, but that the Spaniards ranne away, ere the battailes were fully ioyned. Their Camp the Romans take, and spoile: whereby (questionlesse) they are maruellously enriched, all the money that could be raked together in Spaine, being carried along in this Italian expedition. This dayes euent ioynes all Spaine to the Romanes. If any part of the Country stood in doubt before, and puts Asdrubal so far from all thought of trauelling into Italy, that it leaues him small hope of keeping himselfe safe in Spaine. Of these exploits aduertisement is sent to Rome and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Commons are, That they haue neither money, apparell, nor bread, wherewith to sustaine their Army and Fleet; That all is wanting, to vs vnlesse they may be supplyed from

...ment, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarry any longer in the Prouince. ...ters come to Rome in an euill season, the state being scarcely able, after the ...at Cannæ, to helpe it selfe at home. Yet reliefe is reliefe, how hardly, and how much ...the commendations of that loue and care, which the priuate Citizens of Rome bare ...the Common-wealth, shall be inserted elsewhere, into the relation of things where ...the truth is lesse questionable. At the comming of this supply, the two Scipios pur...sue Asdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What else can we thinke, that remember the last newes of him, and how fearefully he mistrusted his own safetie? They find him, and Magos & Amilcar the sonne of Bomilcar, with an Army of threescore thousand men, besieging Illiturgi: (which the learned Ortelius, and others, probably coniecture to haue stood where Carmona is now, in the Kingdome of Aragon, for there was Illiturgi, afterward called Forum Iulij, quite another way) a Towne of the Illergetes their nearest Neighbours, for hauing reuolted vnto the Romans. The towne is greatly distressed, but most of all, for want of victuals. The Romans therefore brake through ...the Enemies Campes, with terrible slaughter of all that resist them: and hauing ...the place, incourage the townesmen to defend their walls as stoutly, as ...should behold them fighting manfully with the besiegers, in their behalfe. Sallie forth, about sixteen thousand against threescore thousand: and killing more Liu. lib. 23. ...enemies, than themselues were in number, draue all the three Carthaginian Com...manders, euery one out of his quarter, and tooke that day, besides prisoners and other ...spoyle, nine and eight Ensignes.

The Carthaginian Armie, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall vpon Incibili, that ...Citie Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too ...greedy of earning money by warre, for thus re-inforcing the broken Carthaginians. But ...may be wondred, whence the Carthaginians had money to pay them: since Asdrubal ...was lately driuen to poll the Country, wanting money of his owne; and being beaten ...in battaile, had lost his wealthy carriages, when his Campe was taken after the battel ...at Baecula. Howsoeuer it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custome) are ...beaten againe at Incibili: where there were of them aboue thirteen thousand slaine, Liu. lib. 23. ...and aboue three thousand taken; besides two and forty Ensignes, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spaine fell from them vnto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius Antias, or some other Historian, to whom Liuie gaue credit, conquer all Spaine twice in one yeere, by winning famous victories; whereof these good Capitaines, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware.

The Romans, notwithstanding this large accesse of Dominion, winter on their owne ...side of Iberus. In the beginning of the next yeere, great Armies of the Spaniards rise a...gainst Asdrubal, and are ouerthrowne by him. P. Scipio, to helpe these his friends, is ...forced to make great hast ouer the Riuer. At Castrum altum, a place in the mid-way ...between new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, Publius Scipio incampeth: and stores the place with victuals, being strong and defencible, ...intending to make it his seate for a while. But the Country round about is too full of ...Enemies: the Carthaginian horse haue charged the Romans in their march, & are gone off cleare, falling also vpon some stragglers, or such as lagged behind their fellowes in ...march, they haue cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought behoueful, to ...remoue vnto some place more assured. So Publ. withdrawes himselfe vnto Mons victoriæ: ...that rising somewhat Eastward from Incibili, ouer-looketh the Southerne Out-let of ...Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians pursue him. His brother Cn. repaires vnto him, & Ap...dabalus the sonne of Gesco, with a full Army, arriues to helpe his Companions. As they lie ...here incamped together, P. Scipio, with some light-armed, going closely to view ...the places thereabouts, is discouered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that ...withdrawes himselfe to an high piece of ground, where they besiege him, vntill his ...brother Cn. fetcht him off. After this (but I know not why) Castulo, a great city of Spaine, ...where Hannibal had taken him a wife, ioyneth with the Romans, though being farre ...distant from them, and seated on the head of the Riuer Bœtis. Neuertheless the Carthaginians passe ouer Iberus, to besiege Illiturgi again, wherein lodgeth a Roman garrison, ...hoping to win it by famine. We may iustly wonder, what should moue them to neglect ...the rebellion of Castulo, yea and the Roman Army lying so close by them, and to seeke ...aduantages further off, in that very place, wherein they had been so grieuously beaten the yeer before. But thither they goe: and thither followes them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Towne by force, breakes out vpon them the next day, and in two battels kils aboue twelue thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with sixe and thirty Ensignes. This victorie (doubtlesse) is remarkable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than fiue thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra: but that siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remoue to Manda, where the Romans are soone at their heeles. There is a great battaile fought, that lasteth foure houres, wherein the Romans get a notable victory; and a more notable would haue gotten, had not Cn. Scipio beene wounded. Thirty nine Elephants are killed, & twelue thousand men, three-thousand prisoners taken, and seuen and fifty Ensignes. The Carthaginians flie to Auringes; and the Romans pursue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquisheth the Carthaginians againe: but kils not halfe so many of them, as before; good cause why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithstanding all these ouerthrowes, the Spaniards, a people framed euen by nature to set warre on foot, quickly fill vp the broken troups of Asdrubal, who hauing also hired some of the Gaules, aduentures once more to trie his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten againe: and loseth eight thousand of his men; besides Prisoners, Elephants, Ensignes, and other appurtenances. After so many victories, the Romans are euen ashamed, to leaue Saguntum enthralled vnto the Carthaginians; since, in behalfe of that Citie, they had at first entred into this warre. And well may we thinke it strange, that they had not recouered it long before, since we may remember, that long before this they had wonne all the Country once and againe. But it must not be forgotten, that they had ere now besieged Saguntum; and were faine (as appeares) to goe their way without it: so as they need not to blush, for hauing so long forborne to doe that, which ere now they had attempted, but were vnable to performe. At the present they wonne Saguntum: and restored the possession thereof vnto such of the poore dispersed Citizens, as they can finde out. They also waste and destroy the country of the Turdetani, that had ministred vnto Hannibal matter of quarrell against the Saguntines. This last action (questionlesse) was much to their honour; and wherein we may be assured, that the Carthaginians would haue disturbed them, if they had been able.

But ouer-looking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans haue gotten in Spaine, other print or token of all their braue exploits, we can perceiue none, than this recouery of Saguntum: excepting the stopping of Asdrubals iourny; which was indeed of greatest importance, but appertaining to their owne defence. For they haue landed at Emporiæ, an Hauen towne, built and peopled by a Colonie of the Phocæans, kinne to the Massilians, friends to the Romans. They haue easily wonne to their party, lost, recouered, and lost againe, some petty bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perswasion, other-whiles by force, and sometimes by their owne vnsettled passions; and now finally they haue won a town, whereof the Carthaginians held intire possession, who had rooted out the old inhabitants. Wherefore we may easily beleeue, that when they took Saguntum (if they tooke it not by surprise; which is to be suspected, since in this Action we finde no particulars remembred, as when the same place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in some notable fight. In like sort also must we thinke, that all those battailes lately remembred, after euery one of which Asdrubal sate down before some place, that had rebelled, or seemed ready to rebell, were prosperous vnto the Carthaginians. For it is not the custome of Armies vanquished, to carry the warre from Town to Towne, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themselues within their owne places of strength, and therein to attend the leuie and arriuall of new supplies. And surely, if the Romans had been absolute Masters of the field, when they won Saguntum, they would not haue consumed a whole yeere following, in practising onely with the Celtiberians the next adioyning people. Yet made they this, little lesse than two yeers businesse. Of these Celtiberians we heare before, That they haue yeelded vp themselues vnto the Romans; for securitie of their faith, giuen Hostages to Scipio, and, at his appointment, made warre against the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is strange, that they are now thus hardly wrought, and not without expresse condition of a great summe, hired to serue in the Roman camp. How this may hold together I cannot perceiue;

perceiue, whether perhaps in those daies it were the Romane custome, or rather the custom of some bad Author whom Liuie followes, to call euery messenger, be he straggler, that entred their campe, an Hostage of that people from whom he came.

11. The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, send an Army of thirty thousand to helpe the Romans: out of which, three hundred the fittest men are chosen, and ordered immediately, there to dwell with their Country-men that follow Hannibal in his warres. But if any of these three hundred returne backe into Spaine, it is to be feared, that he bring with him such news of the riches and welfare of Hannibal, men, that all the followers, in hope are the lesse vnwilling to follow Asdrubal, when he shall haue inuited them into Italy. Hereof we find more than probability, when these mercenary Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Armyes in the field. The two Scipio's, presuming on this accesse of strength, diuide their forces, and seeke out the Enemies, who lay not all with three Armies. Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, is nearest at hand, encamped among the Celtiberians, at Anitorgis. With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the feare is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed, the sonnes of Gesco, hearing the newes, will make vse of their distance, which is but dayes march, and, by running into the further parts of the Country, saue themselues from being ouer-taken. Publius therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better souldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Armie, leauing the third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his brother. He that hath the longer iourny to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his liues end. Mago, and Asdrubal the sonne of Gesco, not studying how to runne away, they finde no such necessity. They ioyne their forces together, meet with Publius Scipio, and lay vp him so hardly, that hee is driuen to keepe himselfe close within his Trenches: wherein he thinkes himselfe not well assured. Especially hee is vexed by Masinissa, Prince of the Massæsylij, Numidians bordering vpon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremizen: to whom the chiefe honor of this seruice is ascribed, for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case, P. Scipio gets intelligeance, that Indibilis a Spanish Prince, is comming with seuen thousand & fiue hundred of the Suessetani, to ioyne with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be streight shut vp, and besieged, he issues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis vpon the way, leauing C. Punteius his Lieuetenant, with a small company to defend the camp. He meets with Indibilis, but is not able, according to his hope, to defeate him at the first incounter. The fight continues so long, that the Numidian horse espie (whom he thought to haue been ignorant of his departure) and fall vpon the Romans on all sides: neither are the Carthaginians farre behinde, but come so fast vpon him in Reare, that P. Scipio, vncertaine which way to turne, yet fighting, and animating his men, where need most requireth, is strucke through with a lance, and slaine: very few of his Army escaping the same destinie, through benefit of the darke night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twenty dayes after. At his meeting with Vsdrubal the Celtiberian Mercenaries all forsake him, pretending that they had warre in their owne Country. If Anitorgis, where Asdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Strabo takes it, a Celtiberian towne, this was no vaine pretence, but an apparant truth. Whereas we may iustly beleeue, that they were wonne by Asdrubal, and easily perswaded to take as much mony for not fighting, as they should haue had for hazarding their liues. Scipio therefore being vnable to stay them, and no lesse vnable, without their helpe, either to resist the enemie, or to ioyne with his brother, maketh a very violent retraict: therein onely differing from plaine flight, that he keeps his men together. Asdrubal presently followes, and ouertakes him: and Mago, with Asdrubal the sonne of Gesco, hauing made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his brother after him. Scipio steales from them all by night; but is ouertaken the next day by their horse, and arrested in an open place of hard stony ground, where growes not so much as a shrubbe, vnfit for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill he findes of easie ascent on euery side, which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with packe-saddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Pallisado. These weake defenses the Carthaginians soone teare in sunder: and, breaking in on all hands, leaue very few of them aliue; that hauing themselues, I know not how, within some woods adioyning, escape vnto Publius, not from Publius had left in his campe but before. It is a terrible ouerthrow, they say, out of which no man escaped. Yet, how they that were thus hemmed in on euery side, in so bare a ground as afforded not a shrub to cover them, could breake out, and shrowd themselues within woods adioyning, I should much wonder, did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Pontius is in P. Scipio's campe, on the North side of Iberus, fearefull (as may be supposed) of his owne life, since his Generall, with two parts of the Roman Armie, had little hope to remaine long safe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a yong Roman Gentleman of a notable spirit: who hauing gathered together the scattered Souldiers, and drawne some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a prettie Armie. The Souldiers, being to choose a Generall by most voices, preferre this L. Martius before Pontius the Lieutenant, as well they may. For Asdrubal, the sonne of Gesco comming vpon them; this L. Martius so incourageth his men, (fondly weeping when he led them forth, vpon remembrance of their late honourable Generals lately slaine) and admonisheth them of their present necessity, that he beates the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victory perhaps he might haue gotten but that he wisely sounds the retrait, reseruing the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldnesse growes, in enemies lately vanquished, and now againe little better than taken: but when they see, that the Roman dares not follow his aduantage, they return to their former security; and vtterly despising him, set neither Corps du guard, nor Sentinell, but rest secure, as if no enemy were neere. Martius therefore animates his souldiers with lively words; and tels them, That there is no aduenture more safe, than that which is furthest from suspition of being vnder-taken. They are soone perswaded to follow him, in any desperate piece of seruice. So he leades them forth by night, and steales vpon the Campe of Asdrubal: vvhere finding no guard, but the enemies fast asleepe, or very drowzie, He enters without resistance, fires their Cabbines, and giues a terrible alarme; so that all affrighted, the Carthaginians run head-long one vpon another, they know not which way. All passages out of their Campe, Martius hath prepossessed, so that there is no way to escape, saue by leaping downe the Rampart: which as many doe, as can thinke vpon it, and run away toward the Campe of Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar, that lay sixe miles off. But Martius hath way-led them. In a Valley betweene their two campes he hath bestowed a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horse; so that into this Ambush they fall euery one, and are cut in pieces. But lest perchance any should haue escaped, and giue the alarme before his comming; Martius hastens to be there as soone as they. By which diligent speed, He comes early in the morning vpon this further campe: which with no great difficulty he enters, and partly by apprehension of danger which the Enemies conceiued, when they beheld the Roman shields, foule, and bloudied vvith their former execution, Hee driues head-long into flight, all that can saue themselues from the fury of the sword. Thirty seuen thousand of the enemies perish in this nights worke; besides a thousand eight hundred and thirty, taken prisoners. Hereunto Valerius Antias addes, that the campe of Mago was also taken, and seuen thousand slaine: and that in another battaile with Asdrubal, there were slaine ten thousand more; besides foure thousand three hundred and thirtie taken prisoners. Such is the power of some Historians. Liuie therefore hath elsewhere vvell obserued, That there is none so intemperate, as Valerius Antias, in multiplying the numbers that haue fallen in battailes. That, whilest Martius was making an Oration to his souldiers, a flame of fire shone about his head, Liuie reporteth as a common tale, not giuing thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth. That this Captaine Martius got a great name; which he might well doe, if with so small forces, and in such distresse, He could cleerely get off from the Enemies, & giue them any parting blow, though it were farre lesse than that which is here set downe.

Of these occurrents L. Martius sent word to Rome, not forgetting his owne good seruice, whatsoeuer it was, but setting it out in such wise, as the Senate might iudge him worthy to hold the place of their Vicegerent in Spaine: which the better to intimate vnto them, He stiled himselfe Propretor. The Fathers were no lesse moued with the tidings than the case required: and therefore took such carefull order, for supplying their forces in Spain, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the companies leuied to serue in that Prouince, could be sent away; yet would they not stay a tide for defence of the Citie it selfe, but shipped them in all haste for Spaine. As for that title of Propretor, which Martius had assumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended ded at his presumption in usurping: foreseeing well, That it was a matter of ill consequence, to haue the Souldiers abroad make choice among themselues of such as should command Armies and Prouinces. Therefore C. Claudius Nero was dispatched away, with all conuenient haste, into Spaine: carrying with him about foure thousand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Romain horse, & of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well, that about these times, the affaires of Rome began to prosper in Italy, & afforded meanes of sending abroad such a strong supply: otherwise, the victories of Martius would ill haue serued, either to keep footing in Spain, or to stop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alpes. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, tooke charge of that remainder of the Army, which was vnder Martius and Manlius, he found surer tokens of the ouerthrowes receiued, than of those miraculous victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts vnto the Senate. The Romain party was forsaken by most of the Spanish friends: whom how to reclaime, it would not easily be deuised. Yet Claudius aduanced boldly towards Asdrubal the brother of Hannibal: whom he found among the Ausetani, neer enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides nigri, out of which there was no issue, but onely through a streight, whereon the Romain seized at his first comming. What should haue tempted any man of vnderstanding to incampe in such a place, I doe not finde: and as little reason can I find in that which followed. For it is said, That Asdrubal, seeing himselfe thus lockt vp, made offer to depart forth-with out of all Spaine, and quit the Prouince to the Romans, vpon condition, that he and his Armie might be thence dismissed. That he spent many dayes, in entertaining parlee with Claudius about this businesse. That night by night he conueighed his footmen (a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking aduantage of a misty day, He stole away with all his Horse and Elephants, leauing his Campe empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Asdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generals in Spaine; we shall finde no lesse cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargaine for so great a Country, with one of these three Chieftaines, than at the strange nature of those passages: through which the footmen could hardly creepe out by night, the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a darke misty day. Wherefore in giuing beliefe to such a tale, it is needfull that we suppose, both the danger wherein the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to haue been of far lesse value. Howsoeuer it was, neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could doe, serued to purchase any new friends in Spaine, or to recouer the olde which they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Martius their Propretor, tooke it not well, that the Senate, regardlesse of their good deserts, had repealed their election, and sent a Propretor whom they fancied not so well. Some such occasion may haue moued them to desire a Proconsul, and (perhaps) young Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignity, were needfull to worke regard in the Barbarians, and the beloued memory of Cn. and Publius, likely to doe good, were it reuiued in one of the same family. Whether vpon these, or vpon other reasons; C. Claudius was recalled out of the Prouince; and Publius the sonne of P. Scipio sent Proconsul into Spaine.

This is that Scipio, who afterward transferred the warre into Africk: where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Country. He was a man of goodly presence, & singularly well conditioned: especially he excelled in Temperance, Continency, Bounty, and other vertues that purchase loue; of which qualities what great vse he made, shall appeare in the tenour of his Actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, sauouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanity; How he vsed to walke alone in the Capitoll, as one that had some secret conference with Iupiter; How a Dragon (which must haue been one of the gods; and, in likelihood, Iupiter himselfe) was thought to haue conuersed with his Mother, entring her Chamber often, & vanishing away at the comming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtfull answers; I hold them no better than fables, deuised by Historians, who thought thereby to adde vnto the glory of Rome: that this noble Citie might seeme, not onely to haue surpassed other Nations in vertue of the generality, but also in great worth of one single man. To this end nothing is left out, that might serue to adorne this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as matter of vnquestionable truth, That when a Proconsull was to be chosen for Spaine, there durst not any Captaine of the principall Citizens offer himselfe as Petitioner, for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the people of Rome were much astonished thereat; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the Citie stood looking one another in the face, not one of them having the heart to aduenture himselfe in such a desperate seruice; and finally, That this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about foure and twentie yeeres of age, getting vp on an high place where he might be seen of all the multitude, requested, and obtained, that the Office might be conferred vpon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martius no better than dreames: and either very vnreasonable was the feare of all the Roman Captains, who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spain Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Prouince, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard euen now, was ready to abandon. But vpon these incoherences, which I finde in the two partiall Roman Historians, I doe not willingly insist.

P. Scipio was sent Proconsull into Spaine; and with him was ioyned M. Iunius Syllanus, as Propretor, and his Coadiutor. They carried with them tenne thousand foot, and a thousand horse, in thirty Quinquereme Gallies. With these they landed at Emporiæ, and marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the fame of Scipio's arriuall, it is said, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Prouince: which he entertained with such a maiestie, as bred a wonderfull opinion of him. As for the enemies, they were greatly affraid of him: and so much the greater was their feare, by how much the lesse they could giue any reason of it. If we must beleeue this, then must we needs beleeue, that their feare was euen as great as could be: for very little cause there was, to be terrified with the fame of so young a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the Winter following (or, as some thinke, all the next yeare) hee did nothing: but spent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, in treating with the Spaniards. His first enterprize was against new Carthage: vpon which he came vnexpected, with fiue and twenty thousand foot, and two thousand fiue hundred horse; his Sea forces coasting him, and moderating their course in such wise, that they arriued there together with him. He assailed the Towne by Land and Sea; and wonne it by assault the first day. The Carthaginians lost it, by their too much confidence vpon the strength of it: which caused them to man it more slenderly, than was requisite. Yet it might haue beene well enough defended, if some Fisher-men of Tarracon had not discouered vnto Scipio, a secret passage vnto the walles; whereof the Townsmen themselues were either ignorant, or thought (at least) that their enemies could haue no notice. This Citie of new Carthage, resembled the old and great Carthage in situation; standing vpon a demi-Iland, betweene an Hauen and a great Lake. All the Westerne side of the walls, and somewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fisher-men of Tarracon had sounded; and finding some part thereof a shelfe, whereon at low water men might passe knee-deep, or (at most) wading vp to the Nauill, Scipio thrust therinto some Companies of his men; who recouered the top of the walles without resistance: the place being left without guard, as able to defend it selfe by the naturall strength. These falling suddenly vpon the backes of the Carthaginians within the Citie; easily forced a gate, and gaue free entrance to the Roman Army. What booty was found within the Towne, Liuie himselfe cannot certainly affirme; but is faine to say, That some Roman Historians told lies without measure, in way of amplification. By that small proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treasury, we may easily perceiue, how great a vanity it was to say, That all the wealth of Africk & Spaine, was heaped vp in that one Towne. But therein were bestowed all the Spanish Hostages: (or at least of the adioyning Prouinces) whom Scipio intreated with singular courtesie; restoring them vnto their kindred and friends, in such gracious manner, as doubled the thankes due to so great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Celtiberians, and two petty Kings of the Ilergetes & Lacetani, neerest Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North-side of Iberus, forsook the Carthaginian party, & ioyned with the Romans. The speech of Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes, is much commended: for that he did not vaunt himselfe, as comonly fugitiues vse, of the pleasure which he did vnto the Romans, in reuolting from their enemies; but rather excused this his changing side, as being thereto compelled by iniuries of the Carthaginians, & inuited by the honourable dealing of Scipio. This temperate eſtimation of his new profeſſed friendſhip, was indeed no vnſure token, that it ſhould be long-laſting. But if the Ilergetes had long ere this (as wee haue heard before) forſaken the Carthaginian party, and ſtoutly held themſelues as friends to Cn. Scipio; then could nothing haue bin deuiſed more vaine, than this Oration of Indibilis their King; excuſing, as new, his taking part with the ſame, when hee ſhould haue rather craued pardon for his breach of Alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Vncle. Moſt likely therefore it is, that howſoeuer the two elder Scipio's had gotten ſome few places among theſe their Neighbours, & held them by ſtrength; yet were the Romans neuer maſters of the Countrie, till this worthy Commander, by recouering their Hoſtages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in ſending them home, won vnto himſelfe the aſſured loue and aſſiſtance of theſe Princes. The Carthaginian Generals, when they heard of this loſſe, were very ſorry: yet neuertheleſſe they ſet a good face on the matter; ſaying, That a young man, hauing ſtolne a Towne by ſurpriſe, was too farre tranſported, and ouer-ioyed, but that ſhortly they would meet with him, and put him in minde of his Father and Vncle; which would alter his moode, and bring him to a more conuenient temper.

Scipio.

Now if I ſhould here interpoſe mine owne coniecture; I ſhould be bold to ſay, That the Carthaginians were at this time buſie, in ſetting forth toward Italy; and that Scipio, to diuert them, vnder-tooke new Carthage, as his Father and Vncle, vpon the like occaſion, ſate downe before Ibera. And in this reſpect I would ſuppoſe, that it had not been much amiſſe, if the paſſage ouer the Lake had beene vndiſcouered, and the Towne held out ſome longer while. For howſoeuer that particular Action was the more fortunate, in comming to ſuch good iſſue vpon the firſt day: yet in the generality of the buſineſſe, betweene Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wiſhed, that Aſdrubal ſhould be ſtayed from going into Italy, than that halfe of Spaine ſhould be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to doe, that ſhould hinder his iourney; Mago, and Aſdrubal, the ſonne of Geſco, were thought ſufficient to hold Scipio worke, in that lingring warre of ſeiſing and retaking Townes, whileſt the maine of the Carthaginian forces, vnder Aſdrubal the ſon of Amilcar, went to a greater enterpriſe: euen to fight in tryall of the Empire. But the Roman Hiſtorians tell this after another faſhion; and ſay, That Aſdrubal was beaten into Italy: whither he ran for feare, as thinking himſelfe ill aſſured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but heare the name of Scipio. Scipio, ſay they, comming vpon Aſdrubal; his Vantcurrers charged ſo luſtily the Carthaginian horſe, that they draue them into their Trenches: and made it apparant, euen by that ſmall peece of ſeruice, how full of ſpirit the Roman Armie was, and how deiected the Enemie. Aſdrubal therefore by night retyred out of that euen ground, and occupied an Hill, compaſſed on three ſides with the Riuer, very ſteepe of aſcent, and not eaſie of acceſſe on the foreſide; by which himſelfe got vp, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plaine, whereon he ſtrongly encamped himſelfe: and in the mid-way, betweene the top and root of the Hill, was alſo another Plaine; into which he deſcended, more vpon brauery, that he might not ſeeme to hide himſelfe within the Trenches, than for that he durſt aduenture his Army to the hazzard of a battaile, for which this was no equall ground. But ſuch aduantage of place could not ſaue him from the Romans. They climed vp the Hill to him; they recouered euen footing with him; droue him out of this lower Plaine, vp into his Campe on the Hill top: whither although the aſcent were very difficult, and his Elephants beſtowed in the ſmootheſt places to hinder their approach; yet compaſſing about, and ſeeking paſſage where it was hardeſt to be found; but much more ſtrongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got vp before them, they draue both Men and Elephants head-long, I know not whither: for it is ſaid, that there was no way to flie. Out of ſuch a battaile, wherein hee had loſt eight thouſand men, Aſdrubal is ſaid to haue eſcaped; and gathering together his diſperſed troupes, to haue marched towards the Pyrenees, hauing ſent away his Elephants ere the fight began. Neuertheleſſe, Mago, and Aſdrubal the ſonne of Geſco, are reported after this, to haue conſulted with him about this Warre; and finally to haue concluded, that goe hee needes muſt, were it but to carry all the Spaniards as far as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to haue bin true, it ſhall appeare at his comming into Italy; whence theſe incoherent relations of the Spaniſh affaires, haue too long detained vs.

§. XII.

The great troubles that Hannibal raised in all quarters, to the Citie of Rome. Posthumius the Roman Generall, with his whole Army, is slaine by the Gaules. Philip King of Macedon, entereins into a League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans ioyning with the Aetolians, make warre vpon Philip in Greece: and afterwards continue a peace with him; the better to intend their businesse against the Carthaginians.

WE left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where he and his new Confederates reioyced (as may be thought) not a little, to heare the good newes from Carthage of such mighty aide, as was decreed to be sent thence vnto him. In former times he had found worke enough, to carry the Romans corne into his owne barnes, and to driue away their Cattell to Geryon: his victories affording him little other profit, than sustenance for his Armie; by making him Master of the open field. He might perhaps haue forced some walled townes, in like sort as he did Geryon, and the Castle of Cannæ: but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended; the hunger, that his Army must haue endured the Winter and Spring following, vntill corne were ripe, would haue grieuously punished him for such imployment of the Summer. This may haue been the reason, why he forbore to aduenture vpon Rome, after his victorie at Cannæ. For had hee failed (as it was a matter of no certaintie) to carry the Citie at his first comming; want of victuals would haue compelled him to quit the enterprise. Yea, many of the people that opened so hastily their gates vnto him, vpon the fresh bruit of his glorious successe, would haue taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the euent of another battaile: if being, either for want of meanes to force the Citie, or of necessaries to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might seeme) from the walles of Rome, he had presented himselfe vnto them with a lessened reputation, somewhat later in the yeere; when time to force their obedience was wanting, vnlesse they would freely yeeld it. But this great part of the care and trauell was past, when so many States of Italy were become his: the yeere following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receiue a notable pleasure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay siege vnto that proud Citie, which so long had held them in subiection. Thus the Winter was passed ouer ioyfully, hauing that there came not any tydings of the preparations, to second the welcome report of those mighty forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring drew on: and of the promised supply there arriued no more, than onely the Elephants. How late it was ere these came, I finde not: onely we finde, that after this he had aboue thirty of them; whereas all, saue one, that he brought ouer the Alpes, had bin lost in his iourney through the Marishes of Hetruria. Very bad excuse of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make vnto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truely, what mischiefes the perswasion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwise, they might perhaps informe him, that it was thought a safer, though a farther way about, to passe along through Spaine and Gaule, as he himselfe had done; and increase the Army, by hyring the Barbarians in the iourney; than to commit the maine strength of their Citie, to the hazzard of the Seas: especially wanting a commodious Hauen, to receiue the Fleet that should carry such a number of Men, Horses, and Elephants, with all needfull prouisions. With these allegations Hannibal must rest content; and seeke, as well as he can, to satisfie his Italian Confederates. Therefore when time of the yeere serued, He tooke the field: and hauing finished what rested to be done at Casilinum, sought to make himselfe Master of some good Hauen-towne therabout, that might serue to entertaine the Carthaginian Fleet, or take from his Enemies at home all excuse, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the same purpose, and to doe what else was needfull, He sent Himilco vnto the Locrians, and Hanno to the Lucans: not forgetting at once to assay all quarters of Italy, yea, the Iles of Sicil & Sardinia; since the siege of Rome, must needs be deferred vnto another yeer. Hanno made an ill iourney of it, being met, or ouer-taken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who slue aboue two thousand of his men; with the losse of fewer, than three hundred Romans. But Himilco sped farre better. By helpe of the Brutians, his good friends, he won Petellia or Petilia by force; after it had held out some moneths. He won likewise Consentia; and Croton, that was forsaken by the Inhabitants. Also the City of Locri, which was of great importance, yeelded vnto him; and did all other places thereabout, except onely the Towne of Rhegium, ouer against Sicill.

But the great faith of the Petilians is worthy to be recorded, as a notable testimony of the good gouernment, vnder which the Roman subiects liued. As for the Samnites, Campanes, and others, whose continuall rebellion may seeme to proue the contrary; we are to consider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Soueraignty, and were now transported with ambition: which reason can hardly moderate, or howeuer allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did send to Rome for helpe: where their Messengers receiued answer from the Senate, That the publike misfortunes had not left meanes, to relieue their Associates that were so farre distant. The Petilian Messengers, Embassadours they are termed, as were all others, publikely sent from Cities of the Roman subiection, that had a priuate iurisdiction within themselues) fell down to the ground, and humbly besought the Fathers, not to giue them away: promising to do and suffer whatsoeuer was possible, in defence of their Towne, against the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to consultation againe: and hauing throughly considered all their forces remaining, plainely confessed, that it was not in their power to giue any reliefe. Wherefore these Embassadours were willed to returne home, and to bid their Citizens prouide hereafter for their owne safetie, as hauing already discharged their faith to the vtmost. All this notwithstanding, the Petilians (as was said) held out some moneths, and hauing striuen in vaine to defend themselues, when there was no apparant possibilitie, gaue to the Carthaginians a bloudy victorie ouer them, being vanquished as much by famine, as by any violence of the Assailants.

The Romans at this time were indeed in such ill case, that Hannibal, with a little helpe from Carthage, might haue reduced them into termes of great extremitie. For whereas in a great braverie, before their losse at Cannæ, they had shewed their high mindes, by entertaining the care of things farre off, notwithstanding the great warre that lay vpon them so neere at hand: it now fell out miserably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better than at home. L. Postumius Albinus their Prætor they had sent, with an Armie of fiue and twenty thousand, into Gaule; to the Illyrian king Pineus they had sent for their tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past, willing him, if he desired forbearance, to deliuer hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip king of Macedon they had sent, to require, that he should deliuer vp vnto them Demetrius Pharius, their Subiect and Rebell, whom he had receiued. But now from all quarters they heare tidings, little suitable to their former glorious conceits. Postumius with all his Armie was cut in pieces by the Gaules, in such sort, that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his ouerthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gaules, Litana; through which he was to passe. Against his comming, the Enemies had lopped the Trees so far, that a little force would serue to cast them downe. When therefore Postumius, with his whole Armie, was entred into this dangerous passage, the Gaules, that lay about the wood, began to cast downe the Trees: which falling one against another, bore all downe so fast, that the Romans were ouer-whelmed, Men and Horses, in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before. How this tedious worke of sawing so many Trees, could take desired effect, and neither be perceiued, nor made frustrate, either by some winde, that might haue blowne all downe before the Romans entred, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the deuice was subiect; I do not well conceiue. Yet some such thing may haue beene done: and what failed in the stratagem, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthy to be omitted, as a monument of the sauage condition, wherwith Lombardie, a Countrie now so ciuill, was infected in elder times, That of Postumius his skull, being cleansed, and trimmed vp with gold, a drinking cup was made, and consecrated in their principall Temple, as an holy vessell, for the vse of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great ouerthrow, when word was brought to Rome; the amazement was no lesse than the calamity. But sorrow could giue no remedie to the mischiefe: and anger was vaine, where there wanted forces to reuenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none, neither do I finde, that any was a second time demanded; this we finde, That with Pleuratus, and Scerdilætus Illyrian kings, as also with Gentius, who reigned within a few yeers following, the Romans dealt vpon euen tearmes; entreating their assistance against Philip and Perseus, not commanding their duties, as Vassals. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For hauing assured his affaires in Greece, & enioying leisure to looke into the doings abroad, He sent Embassadours to Hannibal: with whom he made a league, vpon these conditions: That the King in person should come into Italy, and with all his forces, by Land and Sea, aide the Carthaginians in the Roman warr, vntill it were finished; That Rome, and all Italy, together with all the spoile therein to be gotten, should be left entire vnto the State of Carthage: And that afterwards Hannibal with his Armie should passe into Greece, and there assist Philip, vntill hee had subdued all his Enemies (which were the Rodians, Thracians, King Attalus, and others) comming semblably vnto him the full possession of that country, and the Ile adioyning. But such predisposition of Kingdoms and Prouinces, is lightly controlled by the diuine Prouidence, which therein serued to selfe, as Herodotus fully termes it, and like an Atheist) enuious or malicious, charity iustly would make it call, in vp-holding the vnspeakable greatnesse of Soueraignty, by which it rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The first Embassadours that Philip sent, fell into the Romans hands, in their iourney towards Hannibal: & being examined what they were, & durst vpon a bolding say, That they were sent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a league with the Senate and People, and offer his helpe in this time of great necessitie. These newes were so welcome, that the ioy thereof tooke away all care of making better inquiry. So they were louingly feasted, and freely dismissed with guides that should leade them the way, and shew them how to auoide the Carthaginians. But they being thus instructed concerning their iourney, fell wilfully into the campe of Hannibal: who entertained them after a better fashion, and concluded the businesse, about which they came, vpon the points before remembred. In their returne homeward, they happened againe vnluckily to bee descried by the Roman fleete; which, mistrusting them to be of the Carthaginian party, gaue them chase. They did their best to haue escaped: but being ouer-taken, they suffered the Romans to come aboord; and trusting to the lie that once had serued them, said it againe, That hauing beene sent from King Philip, to make a league with the People of Rome, they were norable, by reason of the Carthaginians lying between, to get any farther than to M. Valerius the Prætor, vnto whom they had signified the good affection of the King their Master. The tale was now lesse credible than before: and (which marred all) Gesco, Boster, and Magos, with their followers, Carthaginians that were sent with them from Hannibal to ratifie the agreement, being presently detected, made the matter apparant. Wherefore a little inquisition serued to finde all out: so that at length Hannibals owne letters to King Philip were deliuered vp, and the whole businesse confessed. The Embassadours and their followers were sent close prisoners to Rome: where the chiefe of them were cast into prison; and the rest sold for bond-slaues. Yet one of their ships that escaped, carried word into Macedon of all that had happened. Whereupon new Embassage was sent, that went and returned with better speed; concluding, as was agreed before; onely with some losse of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed: thinking with what heauy weight this Macedonian warre, in an euill houre, was likely to fall vpon them, when their shoulders were ouer-burdened with the loade of the Carthaginian. Yet they tooke a noble resolution; and suitable vnto that, whereby they kept off the storme, that else would haue beaten vpon them from Spaine. They iudged it more easie, with small forces to detaine Philip in Greece, than with all their strength to resist him in Italy. And herein they were in the right. For, that the very reputation of a King of Macedon, ioyning with Hannibal in such a time, would haue sufficed to shake the allegeance, not onely of the Latines, and other their most faithfull Subiects, but euen of the Roman Colonies that held all priuiledges of the City, it will appeare by the following successe of things. M. Valerius the Prætor, with twenty Quinqueremes Gallies, was appointed to attend vpon the Macedonian, and to set on foot some commotion in Greece, or to nourish the troubles already therein begunne. Philip was busie about the Sea-townes, that looked towards Italy, setting vpon Apollonia, and thence sailing vpon Oricum, which he won, and so returned to Apollonia againe. The Epirots craued helpe of M. Valerius (or rather accepted his kinde offers; who had none other businesse to doe. The Garrison that Philip had left in Oricum, was strong enough to hold the Townsmen in good order, but not to keep out the Romans: of whose daring to attempt any thing against him, on that side the Sea, Philip as then had no suspition. Valerius therefore easily regained the Towne; and sent thence a thouſand men, vnder Nunius Criſpus, an vnder-taking and expert Captaine; which got by night into Apollonia. Theſe made a notable ſallie, and brake into Philips Trenches with ſo great ſlaughter, that they forced him to forſake his campe, and raiſe the ſiege. The King purpoſed (as it is ſaid) to haue departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, coming with his fleet from Oricum, ſtopped vp the mouth of the Riuer, ſo that he was faine to burn his ſhips, (which belike were no better than long boates) and depart ill furniſhed of carriages, by Land. After this Valerius dealt with the Ætolians, a Nation alwayes enemie to the Crowne of Macedon: and eaſily perſwaded them (being ſo affected, as hath elſe-where beene ſhewed) to make ſtrong warre on Philip; wherein he promiſed them great aſſiſtance from the Romans. That which moſt moued the troubleſome ſpirits of the Ætolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania: after which they had gaped long; and whereof the Roman was as liberall in making promiſe, as if already it had bin his owne. So a league was made betweene them: and afterward ſolemnely publiſhed at Olympia, by the Ætolians; and by the Romans, in their Capitoll. The conditions were, That from Ætolia to Corcyra, in which ſpace Acarnania was contained, all the Countrey ſhould be ſubdued, and left vnto the Ætolians, the pillage onely to be giuen to the Romans. And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it ſhould bee with Prouiſion, to hold no longer than whileſt hee abſtained from doing iniurie to the Romans, or their Aſſociates. This was indeed the onely point, whereat Valerius aimed, who promiſed as much on the Romans behalfe, That they ſhould not make peace with the Macedonian, vnleſſe it were with like condition of including the Ætolians. Into this league was place reſerued for the Lacedæmonians and Eleans, as to thoſe that had made or fauoured the ſide of Cleomenes againſt the Macedonian, to enter at their pleaſure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus: the firſt of which reigned at Pergamus, in Aſia the leſſe, a Prince hereafter much to be ſpoken of; the other two held ſome part of Illyria, about which the Romans were ſo farre from contending with them, that gladly they ſought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of theſe Aſſociates, are thruſt into the Treatie; rather to giue it countenance, than for any readineſſe which they diſcloſe to enter thereinto. The Ætolians alone, and chiefly Scopas their Pretor, with Dorimachus and others, are yet a while the onely men, of whom the Roman Generals muſt make much; as the late French King, Henry the fourth, when he had onely the title of Nauarre, was ſaid to court the Maioss of Rochel. Philip was not idle, when hee heard whereunto the Ætolians tended. He repaired his Armie; made a countenance of warre vpon the Illyrians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to infeſt the kingdome of Macedon, waſted the Countrie about Oricum & Apollonia; and ouermaſing the Pelagonians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held ſuſpected, came downe into Theſſaly, whence he made ſhew as if he would inuade Ætolia. By the fame of this Expedition, He thought to ſtir vp all the Greeks adioyning, againſt the Ætolians; whom they generally deteſted as a neſt of Robbers, troubleſome to all the Countrie. To which purpoſe, and to hinder the Ætolians from breaking into Greece, He left Perſeus, his ſon and heire, with foure thouſand men, vpon their borders: with the reſt of his Armie, before greater buſineſſe ſhould ouer-take and entangle him, Hee made a long iourney into Thrace, againſt a people called the Medes; that were wont to fall vpon Macedon, whenſoeuer the King was abſent. The Ætolians, hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could againſt the Acarnanians; in hope to ſubdue thoſe their daily enemies, and winne their little Countrie, ere he ſhould be able to returne. Hereto it much availed, that the Romans had already taken Oeniadæ and Naxos, Acarnanian Townes conueniently ſituated to let in an Armie; and conſigned them vnto the Ætolians, according to the tenor of the contract lately made with them. But the ſtout reſolution of the Acarnanians, to die (as we ſay) euery Mothers ſonne of them, in defence of their Countrie; together with the great haſte of the Macedonian (who layed aſide all other buſineſſe) to ſuccour theſe his friends; cauſed the Ætolians to forſake their enterpriſe. When this Expedition was giuen ouer, the Romans and Ætolians fell vpon Ancyra, which they took: the Romans aſſailing it by Sea, the Ætolians by Land. The Ætolians had the Towne, and the Romans the ſpoile.

For theſe good ſeruices M. Valerius was choſen Conſul at Rome; and P. Sulpitius ſent in his ſtead, to keepe the warre on foot in Greece. But beſides the Roman helpe, Attalus out of Aſia came ouer to aſſiſt the Ætolians. Hee was chiefly mooued by his owne ieaſlouse of Philips greatnesse: though somewhat also tickled with the vanity, of being chosen by the Ætolians their principall Magistrate; which honour, though no better than titularie, he tooke in very louing part. Against the forces which Attalus and the Romans had sent, being loyned with the maine power of Ætolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battailes: and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, these his troublesome neighbours desired peace of him, and vsed their best meanes to get it. But when the day appointed for the conclusion thereof, was come: their Embassadours, in stead of making submission, proposed vnto him such intolerable conditions, as all beseemed vanquished men to offer: and might therefore well testifie, that their minds were altered. It was not any loue of peace, but feare of being besieged in their owne Townes, that had made them desirous of composition. This feare being taken away, by the incouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as euer: and thrust a garrison of their owne, and some Roman friends, into Elis, which threatned Achaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut ouer the streight from Naupactus, wasted the country in a terrible brauery: wherein Philip requited them; comming vpon them in great haste from the Nemæan Games (which he was then celebrating) and sending them faster away, but nothing richer, than they came.

In the heate of this contention, Prusias King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no lesse than Attalus held suspected the power of Philip, sent a Nauie into Greece, to assist the Macedonian party. The like did the Carthaginians: and vpon greater reason, as being more interessed in the successe of his affaires. Philip was too weake by Sea: and though he could man some two hundred ships, yet the vessels were such, as could not hold out against the Roman Quinqueremes. Wherfore it behoued him, to vse the helpe of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aide came somewhat too late: which might better at first haue kept those Enemies from fastening vpon any part of Greece, than afterward it could serue to driue them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that country. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea, it was needfull that he should correct the Eleans, bad neighbours to the Achaians his principall Confederates. But in assailing their Town, he was incountred by the Ætolian and Roman garrison, which drane him backe with some losse. In such cases, especially where God intendeth a great conuersion of Empire, Fame is very powerfull in working. The King had receiued no great detriment, in his retrait from Elis: rather he had giuen testimonie of his personall valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slaine vnder him. He had also soone after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of foure thousand, with some twenty thousand head of Cattaile, which they had brought together into a place of safetie, as they thought, when their Country was inuaded. But it had happened that in his pursuit of the Roman forragers about Sicyon, his horse running hastily vnder a low tree, had torne off one of the hornes, which (after the fashion of those times) the King wore in his Creast. This was gathered vp by an Ætolian, who carried it home, and shewed it as a token of Philips death. The horne was well knowne, and the tale beleeued. All Macedon therefore was in an vproare: and not only the Borderers, ready to fall vpon the Country, but some Captains of Philip, easily corrupted; who thinking to make themselues a fortune in that change of things, ranne into such treason, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuse. Hereupon the King returned home, leauing not three thousand men, to assist his friends the Achæans. He also tooke order, to haue beacons erected, that might giue him notice of the Enemies doings, vpon whom he meant shortly to retume. The affaires of Macedon, his presence quickly enabled. But in Greece all went ill-fauouredly: especially in the Ile of Eubœa, where one Plator betrayed to Attalus and the Romans, the Town of Oreum, ere Philip could arriue to helpe it: where also the strong Citie of Chalcis was likely to haue been lost, if he had not come the sooner. He made such hastie marches, that he had almost taken Attalus in the Citie of Opus. This Citie, lying ouer against Eubœa, Attalus had wonne, more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had vsed: now because the Roman souldiers had defrauded him in the sacke of Oreum, and taken all to themselues: It was agreed, that Attalus should make his best profit of the Opuntians, without admitting the Romans to be his sharers. But whilst he was busie, in drawing as much money as he could out of the Citizens, the sudden tidings of Philips arriuall, made him leaue all behinde him, and runne away to the Sea-side, where he got aboord his ships, finding the Romans gone before, vpon the like feare. Either the indignity of this inſaduenture, or tydings of Prusias the Bithynian his inuaſion vpon the kingdome of Pergamus, made Attalus returne home, without ſtaying to take leaue of his friends. So Philip recouered Opus, wanne Torone, Tritonos, Drymus, and many ſmall townes in thoſe parts; performing likewiſe ſome actions, of more braueric than importance, againſt the Ætolians. In the meane ſeaſon, Machanidas, the tyrant of Lacedæmon, had beene buſie in Peloponneſus; but hearing of Philips arriuall, was returned home.

The Lacedæmonians, hearing certaine report of Cleomenes his death in Ægypt, went about to chooſe two new Kings, and to conforme themſelues to their old manner of gouernement. But their Eſtate was ſo farre out of tune, that their hope of redreſſing things within the Citie, proued no leſſe vnfortunate, than had beene their attempts of recouering a large dominion abroad. Lycurgus a tyrant roſe vp among them: vpon whom ſucceeded this Machanidas, & ſhortly after came Nabis, that was worſe than both of them. They held on the Ætolian & Roman ſide, for feare of the Achæans, that were the chiefe Confederates of Philip, and hated extreamely the name both of Tyrant, and Lacedæmonian. But of theſe we ſhall ſpeake more hereafter.

Philip entring into Achaia, and ſeeing his preſence had brought the contentment of aſſurance to that Countrey, ſpake braue words to the Aſſembly of their States, ſaying, That he had to doe with an Enemie, that was very nimble, and made warre by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Orcum, to Opus, and now into Achaia: but could no where finde them, ſuch haſte they made, for feare of being ouertaken. But flight, hee ſaide, was not alwayes proſperous: hee ſhould one day light vpon them; as ere this he ſundry times had done, and ſtill to their loſſe. The Achaians were glad to heare theſe words, and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For hee reſtored vnto their Nation ſome Townes that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewiſe to the Megalopolitans their Confederates, he rendered Aliphera. The Dymæans, that had beene taken by the Romans, and ſold for ſlaues, he ſought out, ranſomed, and put in quiet poſſeſſion of their owne Citie. Further, paſſing ouer the Corinthian Gulfe, he fell vpon the Ætolians: whom hee draue into the mountaines and woods, or other their ſtrongeſt holds, and waſted their Country. This done, he tooke leaue of the Achæans: and returned home by Sea, viſited the people that were his ſubiects, or dependants: and animated them ſo well, that they reſted fearleſſe of any threatning danger. Then had he leiſure to make warre vpon the Dardanians, all neighbours to Macedon: with whom neuertheleſſe he was not ſo far occupied, but that he could goe in hand with preparing a fleet of an hundred gallies, whereby to make himſelfe Maſter of the Sea; the Romans (ſince the departure of Attalus) hauing not dared to meet or purſue him, when he lately ranne along the coaſt of Greece, faſt by them where they lay.

This good ſucceſſe added much reputation to the Macedonian, and emboldned him to make ſtrong warre vpon the Ætolians, at their owne doores. As for the Romans, either ſome diſpleaſure, conceiued againſt their Confederates, or ſome feare of danger at home, when Aſdrubal was ready to fall vpon Italy; cauſed them to giue ouer the care of things in Greece, and leaue their friends there to their owne fortunes. The Ætolians therefore, being driuen to great extremitie, were faine to ſue for peace vnto Philip; and accept it, vpon what euer conditions it beſt pleaſed him. The agreement was no ſooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thouſand foot, a thouſand horſe, and thirtie fiue gallies, came ouer in great haſte (though ſomewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Ætolia, he turned aſide to Dyrrachium, & Apollonia, making a great noiſe as if with theſe his owne forces he would worke wonders. But it was not long ere Philip came to viſit him, and found him tame enough. The King preſented him battell, but he refuſed it: and ſuffering the Macedonians to waſte the Country round about, before his eies kept himſelfe cloſe within the wals of Apollonia, making ſome Ouertures of peace: which cauſed Philip to return home quietly. The Romans had not ſo great cauſe to be diſpleaſed with the Ætolians, as had Philip, to take in euil part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithſtanding the royall offer that he made them, to ſerue their turne in Italy, and aſſiſt them, in getting their hearts deſire, before he would expect any requital: they had not ſent any fleet, as in reaſon they ought, and as (conſidering his want of ſufficient abilitie by Sea) it is likely they were bound, either to ſecure the tranſportation of his Armie, or to free his coast from the Romans and Aetolians Pyracies. Onely once they came to his helpe, which was at his first comming into Achaia: but they were gone againe before his arriuall, hauing done nothing, and perceiuing feare of being taken by the Romans, euen at Sicyon as Philip with his owne hand, durst hardly passe by sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This was the ordinary dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seeme to haue lien vpon him, one of Hannibals strictest, wherof Hannibal so bitterly complained. For it could not but grieue this ambitious man exceedingly, to vnderstand that so great a King had offered seruice in person vnder Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, who of all men likeliest to make Monarchs, and ouer the affaires of the world at pleasure. Therefore behold reason, such as Rome could suggest, to perswade the Carthaginians vnto a safe and thrift course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian warres so mighty a Prince, whose change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire, as much affection as both Hannibal, more dangerous to their liberty. Rather they should doe well to spare charges: and face the Macedonian with hopes: by making many promises of sending a fleet and souldiers for euer: which would cost nothing, yet would it serue to terrifie the Romans, & compell them to send part of their forces from home, that might finde his Enemie worke abroad. So should the Roman Armies be lessened in Italy: and Philip, when once he was ingaged in the warre, bound vnto the prosecution by his owne necessities: paying the Carthaginians to little or no charges: yea, secure to the labours of giuing him thankes. Now if it might come to passe, as Hannibal euery day did promise, that Rome and all Italy should within a while be at the deuotion of Carthage: better it were that the Citie should be free, so as the troublesome Greekes might addresse their complaints vnto the Carthaginians, as competent Iudges betweene them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Africke, should waite vpon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such iniuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hatefull in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no lesse impudent in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the counsaile of Hanno and his fellowes were such as this: or whether the Carthaginians, of their owne disposition, without his aduice, were carelesse, and careless, the matter (as farre as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning: for they did him no manner of good: but rather dodged with him; euen in their little courtesie which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why he began the building of an hundred Gallies, as if thee would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would haue reached, had hee not vainely giuen credit to fatherlesse promises. When therefore the Aetolians had submitted themselues already: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very feare of him, with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to haue succoured them in their necessitie, he might giue ouer the warre, and, without reprehension, leaue them to themselues: For he had wilfully entred into trouble for their sakes, but they despised him, as if the quarrell were meerely his owne, and he vnable to manage it.

The vanity of which their conceits would appeare vnto them, when they should see, that with his proper strength he had finished the warre, and concluded it highly to his honour. So that warre following it was agreed, by mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans should retaine three or foure Townes of Illyria, which they had conquered in this warre, being part of their old Illyrian conquest. Places no way belonging to the Macedonian; and therefore perhaps inserted into the conenants, that somewhat might seeme to haue been gotten. On the other side, the Atintanes were appointed to returne vnder the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius probably coniectures) the people of the Countrey about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their conquests: whereby it appeares, that they did not giue peace, as they would seeme to haue done, but accepted it, vpon conditions somewhat to their losse.

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Prusias King of Bithynia, the Achaians, Boeotians, Thessalians, Acarnanians, & Epirots. On the Roman side were named first, the people of Ilium, as an honourable remembrance of the Romans descent from Troy: then, Attalus king of Pergamus; Pleuratus, an Illyrian Prince; & Nabis, tyrant of Lacedæmon: together with the Eleans, Messenians, and Athenians. The Ætolians were omitted, belike, as hauing agreed for themſelues before. But the Eleans and Meſſenians, followers of the Ætolians, (and by them, as is moſt likely, compriſed in their League with Philip) were alſo inſerted by the Romans; that were neuer ſlow in offering their friendſhip to ſmall and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians: they ſtood much vpon their old honour; and loued to beare a part, though they did nothing, in all great actions. Yet the ſetting downe of their names in this Treaty, ſerued the Romans to good purpoſe: foraſmuch as they were a buſie people, and miniſtred occaſion to renew the warre, when meanes did better ſerue to follow it.

How the Romans began to recouer their ſtrength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in relieuing the publike neceſſities of their Common-weale.

IT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing ſo many Enterpriſes at once, they followed all by the halues: and waſted more men and money to no purpoſe, than would haue ſerued (if good order had beene taken) to finiſh the whole warre, in farre ſhorter ſpace; and make themſelues Lords of all that the Romans held. This errour had become the leſſe harmfull, if their care of Italy had bin ſuch as it ought. But they ſuffered Hannibal, to wearie himſelfe with expection of their promiſed ſupplies: which being ſtill deferred from yeere to yeere, cauſed as great opportunities to be loſt, as a Conquerour could haue deſired. The death of Poſthumius, and deſtruction of his whole Armie in Gaule; the begun rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hiero their friend in Syracuſe; with great alterations, much to their preiudice, in the whole Iſle of Sicil; as alſo that warre, of which we laſt ſpake, threatned from Macedon; happening all at one time; and that ſo neerely after their terrible ouerthrow at Cannæ, among ſo many reuolts of their Italian Confederates, would vtterly haue ſunke the Roman State, had the Carthaginians, if not the firſt yeere, yet at leaſt the ſecond, ſent ouer to Hannibal the forces that were decreed. It is not to be doubted, that euen this diuerſitie of great hopes, appearing from all parts, adminiſtred matter vnto Hanno, or ſuch as Hanno was, whereupon to worke. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to performe all that was decreed for Italy: yet could not that proportion hold, when ſo many new occurrences brought each along with them their new care, and required their ſeuerall Armies. This had not beene a very bad excuſe, if any one of the many occaſions offered had beene throughly proſequuted: though it ſtood with beſt reaſon, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the proſperitie of Hannibal in his Italian warre, ſhould haue beene ſtrengthened; whatſoeuer had become of the reſt. But the ſlender troupes, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the warre in Spaine; the lingring aide which they ſent, to vp-hold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was already wel-neere beaten downe; their trifling with Philip; and (amongſt all theſe their attempts) their haſtie catching at Sicil: little deſerued to bee thought good reaſons of neglecting the maine point, whereto all the reſt had reference. Rather euery one of theſe Actions, conſidered a part by it ſelfe, was no otherwiſe to be allowed as diſcreetly vnder-taken, or ſubſtantially followed; than by making ſuppoſition, That the care of Italy, made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things elſe. Yet if theſe allegations would not ſerue to content Hannibal, then muſt hee patiently endure to know, that his owne Cirizens were iealous of his Greatneſſe, and durſt not truſt him with ſo much power, as ſhould enable him to wrong the State at home.

Whatſoeuer he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himſelfe to Neceſſity; to feed his Italian friends with hopes; & to trifle away the time about Nola, Naples, Cuma, and other places: being loth to ſpend his Armie in an hard ſiege, that was to be reſerued for a worke of more importance. Many offers he made vpon Nola, but alwayes with bad ſucceſſe. Once Marcellus fought a battell with him there: yet vnder the very walls of the Towne; hauing the aſſiſtance of the Citizens, that were growne better affected to the Roman ſide, ſince the Heads that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thouſand men Hannibal in that fight loſt: which was no great maruaile; his forces being then diuided, and imployed in ſundry parts of Italy at once. Naples was, then in thoſe dayes, a ſtrong City, and required a yeers worke to haue taken it by force.

Wherefore the earneſt deſire of Hannibal to get in, was alwaies fruſtrate. Vpon the town of Calliæ they of Capua had their plot, & were in hope to take it by cunning. They ſent to the chief Magiſtrates of the Cumans, deſiring them (as being alſo Campans) to be preſent at a ſolemne ſacrifice of the Nation, where they would conſult about their generall good: promiſing to bring thither a ſufficient guard, to aſſure the whole Aſſembly from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made ſhew to entertaine; but priuily ſent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus the Roman Conſul.

Gracchus was a very good man of warre, and happily choſen Conſull in ſo dangerous a time. His Colleague ſhould haue beene Poſthumius Albinus, that was lately ſlaine by the Gaules: after whoſe death Marcellus was choſen, as being iudged the fitteſt man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found ſome religious impediment that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at leaſt they fained ſo to haue done, becauſe this was the firſt time, that euer two Plebeian Conſuls were choſen together. Marcellus therefore gaue ouer the place: and Q. Fabius Maximus the late famous Dictator, was ſubſtituted in his roome. But Fabius was detained in the City, about matters of religion, or Superſtition: wherewith Rome was commonly, eſpecially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Conſular Armie, waited vpon Hannibal among the Campans: not able to meet the Enemie in field; yet intentiue to all occaſions, that ſhould be preſented. The Volones, or Slaues, that lately had beene armed, were no ſmall part of his followers. Theſe, and the reſt of his men, He continually trained: and had not a greater care, to make his Army skilfull in the exerciſes of warre, than to keepe it from quarrels, that might ariſe by vpbraiding one another with their baſe conditions.

Whileſt the Conſul was thus buſied at Linternum; the Senators of Cumæ ſent him word of all that had paſſed betweene them and the Capuans. It was a good occaſion to fleſh his men, and make them confident againſt the Enemie; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracchus therefore put himſelfe into Cumæ: whence hee iſſued at ſuch time, as the Magiſtrates of that Citie were expected by the Campans. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hamæ, three miles from Cumæ. There lay Marius Alfius the chiefe Magiſtrate of Capua, with foureteene thouſand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather deuiſing how to ſurpriſe others, than fearing himſelfe to be aſſailed. The Conſul therefore ſuffering none to goe forth of Cumæ, that might beare word of him to the Enemies, iſſued out of the towne when it grew darke: his men being well refreſhed with meate and ſleepe, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights ſeruice. So he came vpon the Capuans vnawares: and ſlew more than two thouſand of them, together with their Commander; loſing not aboue a hundred of his owne men. Their campe he tooke: but tarried not long to rifle it, for feare of Hannibal, who lay not farre off. By this his prouidence, he eſcaped a greater loſſe, than he had brought vpon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hamæ, forthwith he marched thither: hoping to finde thoſe young ſouldiers, and ſlaues, buſied in making ſpoile, and loading themſelues with the booty. But they were all gotten ſafe within Cumæ; which partly for anger, partly for deſire of gaining it, and partly at the vrgent entreatie of the Capuans, Hannibal aſſailed the next day. Much labour, and with ill ſucceſſe, the Carthaginians and their fellowes ſpent, about this towne. They raiſed a woodden Tower againſt it, which they brought cloſe vnto the walls, thinking thereby to force an Entrie. But the Defendants, on the inſide of the wall, raiſed againſt this an high Tower: whence they made reſiſtance; and found meanes at length, to conſume with fire the worke of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were buſie in quenching the fire; the Romans, ſallying out of the towne at two gates, charged them valiantly, and draue them to their trenches, with the ſlaughter of about foureteene hundred. The Conſull wiſely ſounded the Retreat, ere his men were too farre engaged, and Hannibal in a readineſſe to requite their ſeruice. Neither would he, in the pride of his good ſucceſſe, aduenture forth againſt the Enemie; who preſented him battell the day following, neere vnto the walls. Hannibal therefore, ſeeing no likelihood to preuaile in that which he had taken in hand, brake vp the ſiege; and returned to his old campe at Tifata. About theſe times, and ſhortly after, when Fabius the other Conſul had taken the field; ſome ſmall rowes were recouered by the Romans, and the people ſeuerely punished for their reuolt.

The

The Carthaginian Armie was too small, to fill with garrisons all places that had yeelded; and withall to abide (as it must doe) strong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the supply from home, that should enable him to strike at Rome it selfe, was driuen in the meane time to alter his course of war: and, in stead of making (as formerly he had done) a generall inuasion vpon the whole Countrie, to passe from place to place; and wait vpon occasions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemy, than to him. The Countrie of the Hirpines and Samnites was grieuously wasted by Marcellus, in the absence of Hannibal: as also was Campania, by Fabius the Consul; when Hannibal hauing followed Marcellus to Nola, and receiued there the losse before mentioned, was gone to winter in Apulia. These people shewed not the like spirit in defending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done; when they contended with the Romans, in their owne behalfe, to get the Soueraignrie. They held it reason, that they should be protected, by such as thought to haue dominion ouer them: whereby at once they ouerburdened their new Lords; and gaue vnto their old, the more easie meanes, to take reuenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intentiue, as necessitie constrained them, to the worke that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Consulship: and ioyned with him Marcus Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed vnto that honour the yeere before. Of these two, Fabius was called the Shield: and Marcellus the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and vpon iust reason, commended, That being himselfe Consul, and holding the Election, he did not stand vpon nice points of formality, or regard what men might thinke of his ambition, but caused himselfe to bee chosen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the City stood of able Commanders. The great name of these Consuls, & the great preparations which the Romans made, serued to put the Campans in feare, that Capua it selfe should be besieged. To preuent this, Hannibal, at their earnest entreaty, came from Arpi: (where he lay, hearkening after newes from Tarentum) and, hauing with his presence comforted these his friends, fell on the sudden vpon Puteoli, a Sea-towne of Campania; about which he spent three dayes in vaine, hoping to haue wonne it. The garrison in Puteoli was sixe thousand strong: and did their dutie so well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good successe, could onely shew his anger vpon the fields there, and about Naples; which hauing done, and once more (with as ill successe as before) assayed Nola, he bent his course to Tarentum: wherein hee had very great intelligence. Whilest hee was in his progresse thither; Hanno made a iourney against Beneuentum: and T. Gracchus the last yeeres Consul, hasting from Nuceria, met him there; and fought with him a battell. Hanno had with him about seuenteene thousand foot, Brutians & Lucans for the most part: besides twelue hundred horse; very few of which were Italians, all the rest, Numidians and Moores. Hee held the Roman worke foure houres, ere it could be perceiued to which side the victory would incline. But Gracchus his souldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late-armed slaues, had receiued from their Generall a peremptory denunciation, That this day, or neuer, they must purchase their liberty, bringing euery man, for price thereof, an Enemies head. The sweet reward of liberty was so greatly desired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it: howbeit that vaine labour, imposed by their Generall, of cutting off the slaine enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindred the seruice, by imployment of so many hands, in a worke so little concerning the victorie. Gracchus therefore finding his owne errour, wisely corrected it: proclayming aloud, That they should cast away the heads, and spare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all should haue libertie immediately after the battell, if they wonne the day. This encouragement made them runne headlong vpon the Enemie; whom their desperate furie had soone ouerthrowne, if the Roman Horse could haue made their part good against the Numidian. But though Hanno did what he could, and pressed so hard vpon the Romans battell, that foure thousand of the slaues, (for feare either of him, or of the punishment which Gracchus had threatned before the battel, vnto those that should not valiantly behaue themselues) retired vnto a ground of strength; yet was he glad at length to saue himselfe by flight, when the Grosse of his Armie was broken; being vnable to remedy the losse. Leauing the field, hee was accompanied by no more than two thousand: most of which were horse; all the rest were either slaine or taken. The Roman Generall gaue vnto all his souldiers that reward of liberty which he had promised: but vnto those foure thousand, which had recoiled vnto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they serued in the wars, they should neither eat nor drink otherwise than standing; vnlesse sickenesse forced them to breake his order. So the victorious Armie returned to Beneuentum: where the newly enfranchised souldiers were feasted in publike by the townsmen; some sitting, some standing, and all of them hauing their heads couered (as was the custome of slaues manumised) with Caps of white wooll. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthy of remembrance) was afterward hung vp in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Libertie, which his father had built and dedicated. This was indeed the first Battell, worthy of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the comming of Hannibal into Italy: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Hamæ, being things of small importance.

Thus the Romans through industry, by little and little, repaired that great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Cannæ. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasurie was so poore, that no industrie nor art could serue to helpe it. The fruits of their grounds did onely (and perhaps hardly) serue, to feed their Townes and Armies, without any surplusage, that might be exchanged for other needfull commodities. Few they were in Italy, that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worse doe than before; as liuing vpon the same trade; and subiect to the same inconueniences, which enfeebled Rome it selfe. Sicil & Sardinia, that were wont to yeeld great profit, hardly now maintained the Roman Armies, that lay in those Prouinces, to hold them safe, and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, euery one of them suffered his part of the detriment, which the Common-wealth sustained, and could now doe least for his Countrey, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised vpon them by the Poll, yet must it be farre lesse, than in former times. The Senate therefore, diligently considering the greatnesse of the warre within the bowels of Italy, that could not be thence expelled, without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the perill, wherein Sicil and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturalls declining from the friendship or subiection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, ready to land in the Easterne parts of Italy, if they were not at the cost to finde him worke at home; the greater threats of Asdrubal, to follow his brother ouer the Alpes, as soone as he could rid himselfe of the Scipio's in Spaine; and the pouertie of the Common-wealth, which had not money for any one of these mortall dangers; were driuen almost euen to extreme want of counsell. But being vrged by the violence of swift necessitie, signified in the letters of the two Scipio's from Spaine; they resolued vpon the onely course, without the which the Citie could not haue subsisted.

They called the people to assembly: wherein Quintus Fuluius the Pretor laid open the publique wants; and plainely said, That in this exigent, there must be no taking of money for victuall, weapons, apparell, or the like things needfull to the Souldiers; but that such as had stuffe, or were Artificers, must trust the Common-wealth with the Loane of their commodities, and labours vntill the warre were ended. Hereunto he so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had liued vpon their dealing in the common Reuenues, that the charge was vndertaken by priuate men; and the Armie in Spaine as well supplied, as if the Treasurie had beene full. Shortly after this, Marcus Atilius Regulus, and Publius Furius Philus the Roman Censors, taking in hand the redresse of disorders within the Citie, were chiefly intentiue to the correction of those, that had mis-behaued themselues in this present warre. They began with L. Cecilius Metellus: who, after the battell at Cannæ, had held discourse with some of his Companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italy, had beene no better than lost. After him they tooke in hand those, that hauing brought to Rome the message of their fellowes made prisoners at Cannæ, returned not backe to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselues thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once backe into his Campe; with pretence of taking better notice of the Captiues names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also vere a great many more; euen whosoeuer had not serued in the warres, after the terme which the Lawes appointed: Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as otherwise it had vsed to be) hurtfull onely in reputation; but greater weight was added thereunto, by this Decree of the Senate,

Senate, following; That all such as were noted with infamie by these Censors, should bee transported into Sicil, there to serue vntill the end of the warre, vnder the same hard conditions, that were imposed vpon the Remainder of the Armie beaten at Canna. The office of the Censors was, to take the List and accompt of the Citizens; to choose or displace the Senatours; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) vpon those, whose vnhoneſt or vnseemely behauiour fell not within the compasse of the Law. They tooke also an accompt of the Roman Gentlemen: amongst whom they distributed the publique Horses of seruice, vnto such as they thought meet; or took them away for their misbehauiour. Generally, they had the ouer-sight of mens liues and manners: and their censure was much reuerenced and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of ranke; or making them change their Tribe; or (vvhich was the most that they could doe) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasurie, from which others were exempted. But besides the care of this generall Taxe, and matters of Moralitie, they had the charge of all publique Workes; as mending of High-wayes, Bridges, and Water-courses; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other buildings. If any man incroached vpon the streets, High-wayes, or other places that ought to be common; the Censors compelled him to make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customes, and other publique Reuenues, to farme: so that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding vnto this Office; as maintaining themselues by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small helpe to conserue the dignitie of the Senate: the commonalty being obnoxius vnto the Censors, which were alwaies of that Order, and carefull to vp-hold the reputation thereof. But the Common-weale being now impouerished by warre, and hauing small store of lands to let, or of customes that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themselues much with putusing the Temples, or other decayed places, that needed reparations: or if they took a view of what was requisite to be done in this kinde; yet forbore they to set any thing in hand, because they had not wherwith to pay. Herein againe appeared a notable generositie of the Romans. They that had been accustomed, in more happy times, to vndertake such pieces of worke, offered now themselues as willingly to the Censors, as if there had been no such want: promising liberally their cost and trauell; without expectation of any payment, before the end of the warre. In like sort, the Masters of those slaues, that lately had been infranchised by Gracchus, were very well contented to forbeare the price of them, vntill the Citie were in better case to pay. In this generall inclination of the Multitude, to relieue, as farre forth as euery one was able, the common necessity; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widowes liuing vnder Patronage, were brought into the Treasurie; and there the Quæstor kept a Booke of all that was layed out for the sustenance of these Widowes and Orphans: whilest the whole stocke was vsed by the Citie. This good example of those which remained in the Towne, preuailed with the Souldiers abroad: so that (the poorer sort excepted) they refused to take pay; and called those Mercenaries, that did accept it, when their country was in so great want.

The twelue hundred Talents, wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any iniuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride; yeelded halfe so much commoditie, as might be laid in ballance against these miseries, whereinto their Estate was now reduced. Neuertheless, if we consider things aright, the calamities of this Warre did rather inable Rome to deale with those Enemies, whom she forthwith vnder-tooke, than abate or slacken the growth of that large Dominion, whereto she attained, ere the youngest of those men was dead, whose names we haue already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman mettall grew more hard and solide: and by paring the branches of priuate fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the Citie of Athens; when Xerxes had burnt the Towne to ashes, and taken from euery particular Citizen, all hope of other felicity, than that which rested in the common happinesse of the vniuersality. Certaine it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath iudiciously obserued) That a State, whose dimention or stemme is small, may aptly serue to be foundation of a great Monarchie: which chiefly comes to passe, where all regard of domesticall prosperity is laid aside; and euery mans care addressed to the benefit of his Country. Hereof I might say, that our Age hath seen a great example, in the vnited Prouinces in the Netherlands; whose present riches and ſtrength grew chiefly from that ill aſſurance, which each of their Townes, or almoſt of their Families, perceiued it ſelfe to hold, whileſt the generality was oppreſſed by the Duke of Alua; were it ſo, that the people had thereby growne as warlike, as by extreme induſtrie, and ſtraining themſelues to fill their publike Treaſuries, they are all growne wealthy, ſtrong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their ſeruices by Land. Wherfore if we value at ſuch a rate as we ought, the patient reſolution, conformitie to good Order, obedience to Magiſtrates, with many other Vertues, and aboue all other, the great loue of the Common-weale, which was found in Rome in theſe dangerous times: we may truely ſay, That the Citie was neuer in greater likelihood to proſper. Neither can it be deemed otherwiſe, than that if the ſame affections of the people had laſted, when their Empire, being grown more large and beautifull, ſhould in all reaſon haue been more deare vnto them, if the riches and delicacies of Aſia had not infected them with ſenſualitie, and carried their appetites mainly to thoſe pleaſures, wherin they thought their well-being to conſiſt; if all the Citizens, and Subiects of Rome could haue beleeued their owne intereſt to be as great, in thoſe vvarres which theſe latter Emperours made for their defence, as in theſe which were managed by the Conſuls: the Empire, founded vpon ſo great vertue, could not haue been throwne downe by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they neuer ſo many. But vnto all Dominions God hath ſet their periods: Who, though he hath giuen vnto Man the knowledge of thoſe waies, by which kingdomes riſe and fall; yet hath left him ſubiect vnto the affections, which draw on theſe fatall changes, in their times appointed.

The Romans winne ſome Townes backe from Hannibal. Hannibal winnes Tarentum. The ſiege of Capua. Two victories of Hannibal. The iourney of Hannibal to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

AS the People of Rome ſtrained themſelues to the vtmoſt, for maintaining the warre: ſo their Generals abroad omitted no part of induſtrie, in ſeeking to recouer what had beene loſt. The towne of Caſiline, Fabius beſieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian garriſon; and likely to haue been relieued by thoſe of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola had not come to the aſſiſtance of his Colleague. Neuertheleſſe the place held out ſo obſtinately, that Fabius was purpoſed to giue it ouer: ſaying, that the enterpriſe was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrary opinion. He ſaid, That many ſuch things, as were not at firſt to haue been vnder-taken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to be proſequuted vnto the beſt effect. So the ſiege held on: and the towne was preſſed ſo hard, that the Campans dwelling therein grew fearefull, and craued parlee; offering to giue it vp, ſo as all might haue leaue to depart in ſafetie, whither they pleaſed. Whileſt they vvere thus treating of conditions: or vvhileſt they were iſſuing forth, according to the compoſition already made; (for it is diuerſly reported) Marcellus ſeizing vpon a Gate, entred with his Armie, and put all to ſword that came in their way. Fiftie of thoſe that were firſt gotten out, ran to Fabius the Conſul: who ſaued them, and ſent them to Capua in ſafety; all the reſt were either ſlaine, or made priſoners. If Fabius deſerued commendations, by holding his vvord good vnto theſe fifty; I know not how the ſlaughter of the reſt, or impriſonment afterward of ſuch, as ſcaped the heat of execution, could be excuſed by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himſelfe, after the Roman faſhion, with ſome æquiuocation, but he ſhall pay for it hereafter. In like ſort was Mount Marſam in Gaſcoigne taken by the Marſhall Monluc, vvhen I was a young man in France. For vvhileſt he entertained parlee about compoſition; the beſieged ranne all from their ſeuerall guards, vpon haſty deſire of being acquainted with the conditions propoſed. The Marſhall therefore diſcouering a part of the vvalls vnguarded, entred by Scalado, and put all ſaue the Gouernour vnto the ſword. Herein that Gouenour of Mount Marſam committed two groſſe errours; the one, in that he gaue no order for the Captaines and Companies, to hold themſelues in their places; the other, in that he was content to parlee, without pledges for aſſurance giuen and receiued. Some ſuch ouer-ſight, the Gouernour of Caſiline ſeemeth to haue committed; yet neither the aduantage taken by Marcellus, or by Monluc, was very honourable.

rable. When this Worke vvas ended, many ſmall townes of the Samnites, and ſome of the Lucans and Apulians, were recouered: vvherein were taken, or ſlaine, about fiue and twenty thouſand of the Enemies; and the country grieuouſly vvaſted by Fabius, Marcellus lying ſicke at Nola.

Hannibal in the meane while was about Tarentum, waiting to heare from thoſe, that had promiſed to giue vp the towne. But M. Valerius the Roman Propretor had thruſt ſo many men into it, that the traitours durſt not ſtirre. Wherefore the Carthaginian vvas faine to depart, hauing vvearied himſelfe in vaine vvith expectation. Yet he vvaſted not the country, but contented himſelfe vvith hope, that they would pleaſe him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia: vvhich he choſe for his vvintring place, and began to victuall it, when Summer was but halfe paſt. It is ſaid, that he vvas in loue vvith a yong Wench in that towne, in vvhich regard if he began his vvinter more timely, than otherwiſe he required, He did not like the Romans, whom neceſſity inforced, to make their Summer laſt as long as they were able to trauell vp & down the country.

About this time began great troubles in Sicil, vvhither Marcellus the Conſul vvas ſent, to take ſuch order for the Prouince, as need ſhould require. Of the doings there, vvhich vvare out more time than his Conſulſhip, vve vvill ſpeake hereafter.

The new Conſuls, choſen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the ſonne of the preſent Conſul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the ſecond time. The Romans found it needfull for the publique ſeruice, to imploy oftentimes their beſt able men: and therefore made it lawfull, during the vvarre, to recontinue their Officers, and chooſe ſuch, as had lately held their places before; vvithout regarding any diſtance of time, which was otherwiſe required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant vnto his ſonne: which was perhaps the reſpect, that moſt commended his ſonne vnto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the campe, and his ſonne rode forth to meet him: eleuen of the twelue Lictors, which carried an axe with a bundle of rods before the Conſul, ſuffered him, in regard of the reuerence, to paſſe by them on horſe-backe, which was againſt the cuſtome. But the ſonne perceiuing this, commanded the laſt of his Lictors to note it, who therupon bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Conſul on his feete. The father cheerfully did ſo, ſaying, It was my minde, ſonne, to make triall, whether thou diddeſt vnderſtand thy ſelfe the Conſul. Caſsius Altinius a wealthy Citizen of Arpi, who, after the battell at Cannæ, had holpen the Carthaginian into that town, ſeeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend, came priuily to this Conſul Fabius, and offered to render it backe vnto him, if he might be therfore vvell rewarded. The Conſul purpoſed to follow old examples: and to make this Altinius a patterne to all traitors, vſing him, as Camillus and Fabricius had done thoſe, that offered their faithfull ſeruice againſt the Faliſci, and King Pyrrhus. But Q. Fabius the father, was of another opinion: and ſaid, it was a matter of dangerous conſequence, That it ſhould be thought more ſafe to reuolt from the Romans than to turne vnto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that he ſhould be ſent to the towne of Gales, and there kept as priſoner, vntill they could better reſolue, what to doe with him, or what vſe to make of him. Hannibal, vnderſtanding that Altinius was gone, and among the Romans, took it not ſorrowfully, but thought this a good occaſion, to ſeize vpon all the mans riches, vvhich were great. Yet that he might ſeeme rather ſeuere, than couetous, he ſent for the wife and children of Altinius into his campe: where hauing examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intention of this fugitiue, partly, and more ſtrictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, He condemned them, as partakers of the reaſon, to be burnt aliue, and tooke all their goods vnto himſelfe. Fabius the Conſul ſhortly after came to Arpi, which he wonne by Scalado, in a ſtormy and rainy night. Fiue thouſand of Hannibals Souldiers lay in the towne, and of the Arpines themſelues, there were about three thouſand. Theſe were thruſt formoſt by the Carthaginian Garriſon, when it was vnderſtood, that the Romans had gotten ouer the wall, and broken open a Gate. For the Souldiers held the townſmen ſuſpected, and therfore thought it no wiſedome, to truſt them at their backs. But after ſome little reſiſtance, the Arpines gaue ouer fight, and entertained parlee with the Romans: proteſting, that they had been betrayed by their Princes, and were become ſubiect to the Carthaginians againſt their wills. In proceſſe of this diſcourſe, the Arpine Preton went vnto the Roman Conſul, and receiuing his faith for ſecurity of the Town,

presently made head against the garrison. This notwithstanding, like it is, that Hannibals men continued to make good resistance. For when almost a thousand of them, that were Spaniards, offered to leaue their companions, and serue on the Roman side, it was yet couenanted, That the Carthaginians should be suffered to passe forth quietly, & returne to Hannibal. This was performed: and so Arpi became Roman againe, with little other losse, than of him that had betrayed it. About the same time, Citernum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus, one of the Pretors: and vnto Cneus Fuluius, another of the Pretors, an hundred & twelue Gentlemen of Capua offred their seruice, vpon no other condition, than to haue their goods restored vnto them, when their citie should be recouered by the Romans. This was a thing of small importance: but considering the generall hatred of the Campans toward Rome, it serued to discouer the inclination of the Italians in those times, and how their affections recoiled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of those mighty succours, that had been promised from Carthage. The Consentines also, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, which had yeelded themselues to Hannibal, returned againe to their old allegeance. Others would haue followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himselfe a Captaine, and gotten reputation by some petty exploits in forraging the Country, was slaine by Hanno, with a great multitude of those that followed him. Hannibal in the meane while had all his care bent vpon Tarentum, which if he could take, it seemed that it would stand him in good stead, for drawing ouer that helpe out of Macedon, which his Carthaginians failed to send. Long he waited, ere he could bring his desire to passe: & being loth to hazzard his forces, where he hoped to preuaile by intelligence, He contented himselfe, with taking in some poore townes of the Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum, found meanes to accomplish their purpose, and his wish. One Philemenes, that was of their conspiracie, who lay at Rome as Embassadour, practising with the Hostages of the Tarentines, and such as had the keeping of them, conueighed them by night out of the Citie. But he and his company were the next day so closely pursued, that all of them were taken, and brought backe to Rome, where they suffered death as traitors. By reason of this cruelty, or seuerity, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans, more generally and earnestly than before. As for the Conspirators, they followed their businesse the more diligently, as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention should happen to be discouered. Wherefore they sent againe to Hannibal: and acquainting him with the manner of their plot, made the same composition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico and Philemenes, two the chiefe among them, vsed much to goe forth of the towne on hunting by night, as if they durst not take their pleasure by day, for fear of the Carthaginians. Seldome or neuer they missed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it readie for their hands, that they might not seeme to haue beene abroad vpon other occasion. From the campe of Hannibal, it was about three dayes iourny to Tarentum, if he should haue marched thither with his whole Armie. This caused his long abode in one place the lesse to be suspected: as also to make his Enemies the more secure, He caused it to be giuen out, that he was sicke. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were growne careless of such his neighbourhood, and the Conspirators had set their businesse in order, He tooke with him ten thousand the most expedite of his horse and foot, and long before breake of day, made all speed thitherward. Fourescore light horse of the Numidians ran a great way before him, beating all the wayes, and killing any that they met, for feare lest he, and his troupe following him, should be discouered. It had beene often the manner of some few Numidian horse, to doe the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Gouernour, when he heard tell in the euening, that some Numidians were abroad in the fields, tooke it for a signe, that Hannibal was not as yet dislodged, and gaue order, that some companies should be sent out the next morning, to strip them of their bootie, and send them gone. But when it grew darke night, Hannibal guided by Philemenes, came close to the towne: where, according to the tokens agreed vpon, making a light to shew his arriuall, Nico, that was within the towne, answered him with another light, in signe that he was ready. Presently Nico beganne to set vpon one of the Gates, and to kill the watchmen. Philemenes went toward another gate: and whistling (as was his maner) called vp the Porter, bidding him make haste, for that he had killed a great Bore, so heauy, that scarce two men could stand vnder it. So the Porter opened the wicket: and forthwith fastened two young men, loaded with the Boare, which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to be worth the looking on. Which the Fort-souldiers wondring at the largenesse of the beast, Philomenes ran him through with his Boare-speare: letting in some thirty armed men, fell upon the watch, whom when he had slaine, the battered great gate to the Agrold of Hannibal, entring Tarentum at two gates, went directly towards the higher place, where both parts met. Thence they were distributed by their Generall into all quarters of the City, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans, and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof, Hannibal willed the Conspirators, that when any of their friends appeared in sight, they should bid him be quiet, and of good cheare. All the towne was in a profound silence, and knew not what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was vnskilfully sounded by a Souldier in the Theater: which helped the suspition, both of the Tarentines that he should not be about to spoyle the Towne, and of the Romans that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governour fled into the Port, and taking boat, got into the Citadell, that stood in the mouth of the Hauen, whence he might easily perceive next morning, how all had passed. Hannibal, assembling the Tarentines, gave them to vnderstand, what good affection he bore them; inveighed bitterly against the Romans, as tyrannous oppressors, and spake what else he thought fit for the present. This done, and having gotten such prisoners and booties of the Souldiers goods in the Towne, he addressed himself against the Citadell, hoping that if the Garrison would fall out, he might give them such a blow, as should make them vnable to do him harme. Answering to his expectation it partly fell out. For when he began to make his approaches, the Romans in a bravery sallying forth, fell with great charge upon them: who fell backe of purpose according to direction, till they had drawn out as many as they could, and so farre from their strength, as they durst adventure. Then gave Hannibal a signe to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared ready for the purpose: and fiercely setting upon the Enemy, drave him backe with great slaughter, as fast as he could runne; so that after words he durst not issue forth. The Citadell stood upon Dens-land, that was plaine ground, and fortified onely with a ditch and wall against the Towne, whereunto it was joyned by a causey. This causey Hannibal intended to fortifie in like sort against the Citadell, to the end that the Tarentines might be able without his helpe, to keepe themselves from all danger thence. His worke in few dayes went so well forward, without impediment from the besieged, that he conceived hope of winning the Piece it selfe, by taking a little more paines. Wherfore he made ready all sorts of engines, to force the place. But whilest he was busied in his workes, there came but a strong supply from Metapontum, which took away all hope of pruuailing, and made him return to his former travaile. Now for as much as the Tarentine fleet lay within the hauen, and could not passe forth, whilst the Romans held the Citadell in seruice: likely, that the towne would suffer want, being debarred of accustomed trade and provisions by Sea: whilest the Roman garrison, by help of their shipping, might easily be relieved, and inabled to hold out. Against this inconvenience, it was rather wished by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the hauen, to guard the mouth of it, and cut off all supply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done: for that their Towne standing in plaine ground, and their streets being faire and broad, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies ouer land, and so bring them into the Sea without. This he vndertooke, and effected: whereby the Roman garrison was reduced into great necessity; though with much patience it held out, and busied Hannibal often-times otherwise busied, than his affaires requited.

Thus with mutuall losse on both sides, the time passed, and the Romane forces growing daily stronger, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately chosen Consuls, prepared to besiege the great Citie of Capua. Three and twenty Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and hastie growth from that want of men, and of all necessaries, wherinto the losse at Canne had reduced them. But especially in these Legions they were faine to take vp young Boyes, that were vnder seuenteen yeeres of age: and to send Commissioners about fifty miles round, for the seeking out of such Lads as might become serviceable and pressing them to the warres, making void a Law. That their yeeres of service, wherinto they were bound by order of the Citie, should be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning so young, as if they had been of lawfull age.

Before the Roman Armie drew neere, the Campans felt great want of victuall, as if they had already been besieged. This happened partly by sloth of the Nation, partly by the great waste and spoyle, which the Romans had in fore-going yeers made vpon their grounds. They sent therefore Embassadours to Hannibal, desiring him to succour them ere they were closed vp, as they feared to be shortly. He gaue them comfortable words: and sent Hanno with an Armie to supply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day, against which they should be ready with all maner of carriages, to store themselues with victuals, that he would prouide. Neither did he promise more than he performed. For he caused great quantity of graine, that had been laid vp in Cities round about, to be brought into his campe, three miles from Beneuentum. Thither as the time appointed came no more than fortie Carts or Wagons, with a few packe-horse, as if this had been enough to victuall Capua. Such was the retchlesnesse of the Campans. Hanno was exceeding angry hereat: and told them they were worse than very beasts, since hunger could not teach them to haue greater care. Wherefore he gaue them a longer day, against which he made prouision to store them throughly. Of all these doings word was sent to the Roman Consuls, from the Citizens of Beneuentum. Therefore Q. Fuluius the Consul, taking with him such strength as he thought needfull for the seruice, came into Beneuentum by night, where with diligence he made inquirie into the behauiour of the Enemie. He learned, that Hanno with part of his Armie was gone abroad to make prouisions, that some two thousand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their campe, so that little good order was kept: all thought being set vpon a great harueſt. Herepon the Consul bade his men prepare themselues to assaile the Enemies campe: and leauing all his impediments within Beneuentum, he marched thitherward so early in the morning, that he was there with the first breake of day. By comming so vnexpected, he had well-neere forced the Campe on the sudden. But it was very strong and very well defended: so that the longer the fight continued, the lesse desire had Fuluius to lose more of his men in the attempt, seeing many of them cast away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore he said, that it were better to goe more leisurely and substantially to worke, to send for his fellow-Consul with the rest of their Armie, and to lye betweene Hanno and home, that neither the Campans should depart thence, nor the Carthaginians be able to relieue them. Being thus discoursing, and about to sound the retrait, hee saw, that some of his men had gotten ouer the Enemies Rampart. There was great booty, or (which was all one to the souldier) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that Campe. Wherefore some Ensigne-bearers threw their Ensignes ouer the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, vnlesse they would indure the shame and dishonour following such a losse. Feare of such ignominy, than which nothing could be greater, made the Souldiers aduenture so desperately, that Fuluius, perceiuing the heat of his men, changed his purpose, and incouraged those that were somewhat backward, to follow the example of them, that had already gotten ouer the Trenches. Thus the Campe was wonne: in which were slaine aboue sixe thousand, and taken, aboue seuen thousand, besides all the store of victualls, and carriages, with abundance of booty, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This misaduenture, and the neerer approach of both the Consuls, made them of Capua send a pittifull Embassage to Hannibal: putting him in minde of all the loue, that he was wont to profess vnto their Citie, and how he had made shew, to affect it no lesse than Carthage. But now, they said, it would be lost, as Arpi was lately, if he gaue not strong and speedy succour. Hannibal answered with comfortable words: and sent away two thousand horse, to keep their grounds from spoile, whilest he himselfe was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the Citadell, partly by the disposition, which he saw in many townes adioyning, to yeeld vnto him. Among the hostages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being ouer-taken, suffered death for their attempt, were some of the Metapontines, and other cities of the Greeks, inhabiting that Easterne part of Italy, which was called of old Magna Græcia. These people took to hart the death of their hostages, and thought the punishment greater than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as soon as the Roman garrison was taken from them, to defend the citadel of Tarentum, made no more adoe, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurines would haue done the like, vpon the like reason, had not some companies lyen in their

Towne, which they feared that they should not be able to master. Neuertheless they helped themselues by running: inuiting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were neer at hand; against whom whilest they proffered their seruice to Atinius, the Roman Captaine, they drew him forth to fight, and recoyling from him, closed vp their gates. A little formality they vsed in pretending feare, lest the Enemy should breake in together with the Romans, in sauing Atinius himselfe, and sending him away by Sea; as also in consulting a small while (because perhaps many of their chiefe men were vnacquainted with the practise) whether they should yeeld to the Carthaginian, or no. But this disputation lasted not long: for they that had remoued the chiefe impediment, easily preuailed in the rest, and deliuered vp the towne to Hanno and Mago. This good successe, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in those quarters, whilest the Consuls fortifying Beneuentum to secure their backes, addressed themselues vnto the siege of Capua.

Many disasters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterprise. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of warre, that had of late been twice Consul, was slaine, either by treachery of some Lucans, that drew him into ambush, or by some Carthaginian stragglers, among whom he fell vnawares. His body, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himself, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans, to whom Hannibal sent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneuentum, there to secure the backe of the Army that should besiege Capua. But his death happened in an ill time, for the great hinderance of that busines. The Volones or Slaues lately manumised, forsook their Ensignes, and went euery one whither he thought good, as if they had been discharged by the decease of their Leader, so that it asked some labour to seeke them out, and bring them backe into their camp. Neuertheless, the Consuls went forward with their work, and drawing neer to Capua, did all acts of hostility which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the citizens of Capua, gaue them an hard welcome, wherin aboue fifteene hundred Romans were lost. Neither was it long ere Hannibal came thither, who fought with the Consuls, and had the better, insomuch that he caused them to dislodge. They remoued by night, and went seuerall waies: Fuluius towards Cannæ, Claudius into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudium, who hauing led him a great walke, fetcht a compasse about, and returned to Capua. It so fell out, that one Marcus Centenius Penula, stout man, and one that with good commendations had discharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Army not far from thence, where Hannibal rested, when he was weary of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vaunts to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would worke, if he might be trusted with the leading of fiue thousand men. The Fathers were vnwilling in such a time, to reiect the vertue of any good Souldier, how meane soeuer his condition were. Wherefore they gaue him the charge of eight thousand: and he himselfe being a proper man, and talking bravely, gathered vp so many voluntaries, as almost doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gaue proofe of the difference, between a stout Centurion, and one able to command in chiefe. He and his fellowes were all (in a manner) slaine, scarce a thousand of them escaping. Soone after this, Hannibal had word, that Cneus Fuluius, a Roman Prætor with eighteen thousand men, was in Apulia, very carelesse, and a man insufficient for the charge which he held. Thither therfore he hasted to visit him: hoping to deale the better with the maine strength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he should haue cut off those forces, that lay in the Prouinces about, vnder men of small ability. Coming vpon Fuluius, he found him and his men so iolly, that needs they would haue fought the first night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So he bestowed Mago with three thousand of his lightest armed, in places thereabout most fit for ambush. Then offring battell to Fuluius, he soone had him in the trap: whence he made him glad to escape aliue, leauing all, saue two thousand of his followers, dead behind him.

These two great blowes, receiued the one presently after the other, much astonished the Romans. Neuertheless, all care was taken, to gather vp the small reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Consuls should goe substantially forwards with the siege of Capua; which was of great consequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other respects. The two Consuls sate down before the towne, and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Prætors, came with his Army from Suessula to their assistance. They made Proclamation, That whosoeuer would issue out of Capua before a certain day prefixed, should haue his pardon, and be suffered to inioy all that vnto him belonged: which day being past, there should be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliously reiected, the Capuans relying on their owne strength, and the succours attended from Hannibal. Before the City was closed vp, they sent Messengers to the Carthaginian, which found him at Brundusium. He had made a long iourny, in hope of gaining the Tarentine Citadell: of which expectation failing, he turned to Brundusium, vpon aduertisement that he should be let in. There the Capuans met him, told him of their danger with earnest words; and were with words as bravely re-comforted. He bade them consider, how a few dayes since he had chased the Consuls out of their fields, and told them, that he would presently come thither again, and send the Romans going, as fast as before. With this good answer the Messengers returned, and hardly could get backe into the City, which the Romans had almost intrenched round. As for Hannibal himselfe, he was of opinion, that Capua, being very wel manned, and heartily deuoted vnto his friendship, would hold out a long time, and therby giue him leisure, to doe what he thought requisite among the Tarentines, and in those Easterne parts of Italy, whilst the Roman Army spent itselfe in a tedious siege. Thus he lingred, and therby gaue the Consuls time, both to fortifie themselues at Capua, & to dispatch the election of new Magistrates in Rome; whileſt he himselfe pursued hopes, that neuer found successe.

Claudius and Fulvius, when their terme of office was expired, were appointed to continue the siege at Capua, retaining the same Armies as Proconsuls. The townel-men often sallied out, rather in a bravery, than likelihood to worke any matter of effect, the Enemy lying close within his Trenches, as intending, without other violence, to subdue them by famine. Yet against the Campan horse (for their foot was easily beaten) the Romans vsed to thrust out some troupes, that should hold them skirmish. In these exercises the Campans vsually had the better, to the great griefe of their proud Enemy, who scorned to take foile at the hands of such Rebels. It was therefore deuised, that some actiue and couragious yong men, should learne to ride behind the Roman men at armes, leaping vp, and againe dismounting lightly, as occasion serued. These were furnished like the Velites, hauing each of them three or foure small darts: which, alighting in time of conflict, they discharged thicke vpon the Enemies horse, whom vanquishing in this kinde of seruice, they much disheartened in the maine. The time thus passing, and famine daily increasing within the City, Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell vpon their Campe. At the same time the Capuans issued with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could deuise: setting all their multitude of vnseruiceable people on the wals, which with a loud noyse of Pans and Basons, troubled those that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius opposing himselfe to the Campans, easily defended his Trenches against them, & so wel represſed them, that he draue them at length backe into their City. Neuertheles, in pursuing them to their gates, He receiued a wound, that accompanied him in short space after to his graue. Q. Fulvius was held harder to his taske, by Hannibal and the Carthaginian army. The Roman camp was euen at point to haue bin lost, and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought three & thirty, were either gotten within the rampart, or elſe (for the report varies) being some of them slaine vpon it, fell into the ditch, & filled it vp in such sort, that their bodies serued as a bridge vnto the Assailants. It is said, that Hannibal in this tumult caused some fugitiues, that could speake Latine wel, to proclaim aloud, as it were in the Consuls name, That euery one of the Souldiers should shift for himselfe, and flie betimes vnto the next hils, forasmuch as the Camp was already lost. But all would not serue. The fraud was detected: and the Army, hauing sitten there so long, had at good leisure strongly intrenched it selfe, so as little hope there was to raise the siege by force.

This did extreamly perplex the Carthaginian. The purchase of Capua had (as was thought) with-held him from taking Rome it selfe: & now his desire of winning the Tarentine citadell, had wel-neer lost Capua, in respect of which, neither the Citadell, nor the City of Tarentum, were to haue bin much regarded. Falling therefore into a desperate anger with himselfe and his hard fortune, that of so many great victories he had made no greater vse: on the sudden he entertained an haughty resolution, euen to set vpon Rome, and carry to the walls of that proud City, the danger of warre that threatned Capua. This he thought would be a meane, to draw the Roman Generals, or one of them at least, vnto the defence of their owne home. If they rose from the siege with their whole Army, then had he his desire: If they diuided their forces, then was it likely, that either he, or the Campans, should well enough deale with them apart. Neither did he despaire, that the terror of his coming might so astonish the multitude within Rome, as he might enter some part or other of the City. His onely feare was, lest the Campans, being ignorant of his purpose, should thinke he had forsaken them; and thereupon forthwith yeeld themselues to the Enemy. To preuent this danger, he sent letters to Capua by a subtile Numidian: who running as a fugitiue into the Roman Camp, conueighed himselfe thence ouer the innermost Trenches into the Citie. The iourney to Rome, was to be performed with great celerity: no small hope of good successe, resting in the suddennesse of his arriuall there. Wherefore he caused his men, to haue in a readinesse ten dayes victualls; and prepared as many boates, as might in one night transport his Armie ouer the Riuer of Vulturnus. This could not be done so closely, but that the Roman Generals by some fugitiues had notice of his purpose. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate; which was therewith affected, according to the diuersitie of mens opinions, in a case of such importance. Some gaue counsell to let alone Capua, yea and all places else, rather than to put the towne of Rome into perill of being taken by the enemy. Others were so farre from allowing of this, as they wondred how any man could thinke, that Hannibal, being vnable to relieue Capua, should iudge himselfe strong enough to winne Rome; and therefore stoutly said, That those Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the City, would serue the turne well enough, to keepe him out, and send him thence, if he were so vnwise, as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that Letters should be sent to Fuluius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the present were in Rome: who, since they knew best, what the strength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were best able to iudge, what was needfull to oppose him. So it was referred vnto the discretion of these Generals at Capua, to do as they thought behoueful: & if it might conueniently be, neither to raise their siege, nor yet to put the city of Rome into much aduenture. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fuluius took fifteen thousand foot, and a thousand horse, the choise of his whole Army: with which he hasted toward Rome; leaning App. Claudius, who could not trauell by reason of his wound, to continue the siege at Capua.

Hannibal, hauing passed ouer Vulturnus, burnt vp all his boats; and left nothing that might transport the Enemy, in case he should offer to pursue or coast him. Then hasted he away toward Rome, staying no longer in any one place, than he needs must. Yet found he the Bridges ouer Liris broken down, by the people of Fregellæ: which as it stopped him a little on his way; so it made him the more grieuously to spoyle their lands, while the Bridges were in mending. The neerer that he drew to Rome, the greater waste he made: his Numidians running before him; driuing the Countrey, and killing or taking multitudes of all sorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The messengers of these newes came apace, one after another into the Citie; some few bringing true aduertisements; but the most of them reporting the conceits of their own feare. All the streets, and Temples in Rome, were pestered with women, crying, and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their haire, because they could doe none other good. The Senators were all in the great market, or place of Assembly; ready to giue their aduice, if it were asked, or to take directions giuen by the Magistrates. All places of most importance were stuffed with souldiers: it being vncertaine, vpon which part Hannibal would fall. In the midst of this trepidation, there came news that Quintus Fulius, with part of the Army from Capua, was hasting to the defence of the city. The Office of a Proconsul did expire, at his returne home, and entry into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fuluius might lose nothing by comming into the city in time of such need, an Act was passed, That he should haue equall power with the Consuls during his abode there. He and Hannibal arriued at Rome, one soone after another: Fulius hauing been long held occupied in passing ouer Vulturnus; and Hannibal receiuing impediment in his iourney, as much as the Country was able to giue. The Consuls, and Fulius, incamped without the Gates of Rome, attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew neerer and greater; so took they more carefull and especiall order against all occurrences. Hannibal came to the Riuer Anio or Anien, three miles from the Towne; whence he aduanced with two thousand horse, and rode along a great vvay vnder the vvalls, viewing the ſite therof, and conſidering how he might beſt approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Story ſaith) vvas driuen away, without doing or receiuing any hurt. Many tumults roſe in this while among the people; but were ſuppreſſed by care and diligence of the Senators. Aboue the reſt one accident was both troubleſome, and not vvithout perill. Of Numidians that had ſhifted ſide, and fallen (vpon ſome diſpleaſures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were ſome twelue hundred then in Rome: which vvere appoynted by the Conſuls, to paſſe through the Towne, from the Mount Auentine to the Gate Collina, where it was thought that their ſeruice might be vſefull, among broken wayes, and Garden walls lying in the ſuburbs. The faces of theſe men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal; bred ſuch miſtaking, as cauſed a great vproare, among the people: all crying out, that Auentine was taken, and the enemy gotten within the vvalls. The noyſe was ſuch, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the ſtreets were ſo full of cattell, and husbandmen, which were fled thither out of the Villages adioyning, that the paſſage was ſtopt vp: and the poore Numidians pittifully beaten from the houſe toppes, with ſtones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the deſperate multitude, that would haue run out at the gates, had it not been certaine who lay vnder the walls. To remedy the like inconueniences, it was ordained, That all which had beene Dictators, Conſuls, or Cenſors, ſhould haue authority as Magiſtrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following Hannibal paſſed ouer Anien, and preſented battell to the Romans, who did not wiſely if they vndertook it. It is ſaid, that a terrible ſhowre of raine, cauſed both Romans and Carthaginians to returne into their ſeuerall Camps: and that this happened two dayes together, the weather breaking vp & clearing as ſoone as they were departed aſunder: certain it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten dayes prouiſion, could not indure to ſtay there, vntill his victuals were all ſpent. In which regard the Romans, if they ſuffered him to waſt his time and prouiſions, knowing that he could not abide there long, did as became vvell aduiſed men: if they offred to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (as is ſaid) by ſome accident of weather, the commendations muſt be giuen to their fortune. The terror of Hannibals coming to the City, how great ſoeuer it was at the firſt, yet after ſome leiſure, and better notice taken of their forces, vvhich appeared leſſe than the firſt apprehenſion had formed them, was much and ſoone abated. Hereunto it helped wel, that at the ſame time, the ſupply appointed for Spain, after the death of the two Scipio's, was ſent out of the town, & went forth at the gate, whilſt one Carthaginian lay before another. In all Punick terrors, as they are called, whereof there is either no cauſe knowne, or no cauſe anſwerable to the greatnes of the ſudden conſternation; it is a good remedy to doe ſomwhat quite contrary to that which the danger would require, were it ſuch as men haue faſhioned it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cauſe his ſouldiers to diſarme themſelues, vvhen they were all on a ſudden in a great feare of they wiſt not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a fooliſh vproare in his Army, by proclaiming a reward vnto him, that could tell who had ſent the Aſſe into the camp. But in this preſent example of the Romans, appears withall a great magnanimity: wherby they ſuſtained their reputation, & augmented it no leſſe, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might ſeeme to haue bin diminiſhed. Neither could they more finely haue checked the glorious conceits of their enemies, and taken away the diſgrace of that feare, vvhich clouded their valour at his firſt coming; than by making ſuch demonſtrations, when once they had recouered ſpirit, how little they eſteemed him. To this purpoſe therfore that very piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay incamped, vvas ſolde in Rome: and ſold it was nothing vnder the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had bin in time of peace. This indignity comming to his eare, incenſed Hannibal ſo much, that he made port-ſale of the Siluer-ſmiths ſhoppes, vvhich were neer about the Market or Common place in Rome, as if his owne title to the houſes vvithin the Town vvere no whit worſe, than any Roman Citizens could be vnto that piece of ground, vvhereon he raiſed his Tent. But this counter-practiſe was nothing vvorth. The Romans did ſeek to manifeſt that aſſurance, which they iuſtly had conceiued, Hannibal, to make ſhew of continuing in an hope, which was already paſt. His victuals were almoſt ſpent: and of thoſe ends, that he had propoſed vnto himſelf, this iourny had brought forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore he brake vp his Campe: and doing what

ſpoile he could in the Roman Territorie, without ſparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, he paſſed like a tempeſt ouer the Country, and ran toward the Eaſterne Sea ſo faſt, that he had almoſt taken the Citie of Rhegium before his arriual was feared or ſuſpected. As for Capua, he gaue it for loſt: and is likely to haue curſed the whole faction of Hanno, which thus diſabled him to relieue that faire Citie, ſince he had no other way to vent his griefe.

Q. Fuluius returning backe to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that whoſo would yeeld, before a certaine day, might ſafely doe it. This, and the very returne of Fuluius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gaue the Capuans to vnderſtand, that they were abandoned, and their caſe deſperate. To truſt the Roman pardon proclaimed, euery mans conſcience of his owne euill deſerts, told him, that it was a vanity: and ſome faint hope was giuen, by Hanno and Boſtar, Captaines of the Carthaginian Garriſon within the Towne, that Hannibal ſhould come againe, if meanes could onely be found, how to conuey ſuch Letters vnto him, as they would write. The carriage of the Letters was vndertaken, by ſome Numidians: who running, as fugitiues, out of the Towne into the Roman camp, waited fit opportunity to make an eſcape thence with their packets. But it hapned ere they could conueigh themſelues away, that one of them was detected by an harlot following him out of the Towne; and the Letters of Boſtar and Hanno were taken and opened, containing a vehement intreatie vnto Hannibal, that he would not thus forſake the Capuans and them. For (ſaid they) we came not hither to make warre againſt Rhegium & Tarentum, but againſt the Romans: whoſe Legions whereſoeuer they lye, there alſo ſhould the Carthaginian Armie be ready to attend them; and by taking of ſuch courſe, haue we gotten thoſe victories at Trebia, Thraſymene, and Cannæ. In briefe, they beſought him, that he would not diſhonour himſelfe, and betray them to their enemies, by turning another way; as if it were his onely care, that the Citie ſhould not be taken in his ful view: promiſing to make a deſperate ſally, if he would once more aduenture to ſet vpon the Roman Campe. Such were the hopes of Boſtar and his fellow.

But Hannibal had already done his beſt: and now beganne to faint vnder the burden of that warre, wherein (as afterward he proteſted) he was vanquiſhed by Hanno and his Partiſans in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like caſes, that ſome of thoſe which were beſieged in Capua, had bin ſent ouer by the Hannonians, to obſerue the doings of Hannibal, and to checke his proceedings. If this were ſo, iuſtly might they curſe their owne malice, which had caſt them into this remedileſſe neceſſitie. Howſoeuer it were, the Letters directed vnto Hannibal, fell (as is ſhewed) into the Roman Proconſuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all ſuch counterfeit fugitiues, as carried ſuch meſſages, whipt them backe into the Town. This miſerable ſpectacle brake the hearts of the Campans, ſo that the multitude crying out vpon the Senate, with menacing termes, cauſed them to aſſemble, and conſult, about the yeelding vp of Capua vnto the Romans. The braueſt of the Senators, and ſuch as a few yeers ſince had been moſt forward in ioyning with Hannibal, vnderſtood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them inuited the reſt home to ſupper: telling them, that when they had made good cheare, he would drinke to them ſuch an health, as ſhould ſet them free from that cruell reuenge, which the Enemies ſought vpon their bodies. About ſeuen and twenty of the Senators there were, that liking well of this motion, ended their liues together, by drinking poyſon. All the reſt hoping for more mercy than they had deſerued, yeelded ſimply to diſcretion. So one of the Town-gates was ſet open, whereat a Roman Legion with ſome other companies, entring, diſarmed the Citizens, apprehended the Carthaginian garriſon, & commanded all the Senators of Capua to goe forth into the Roman campe: at their coming thither, the Proconſuls laid yrons vpon them all, and commanding them to tell what ſtore of gold and ſiluer they had at home, ſent them into ſafe cuſtodie, ſome to Cales, others to Theanum. Touching the general multitude, they were reſerued vnto the diſcretion of the Senate: yet ſo hardly vſed by Fuluius in the meane while, that they had little cauſe of hope or comfort in this aduerſity. Ap. Claudius was brought euen to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately receiued; yet was he not inexorable to the Campans, as hauing loued them wel in former times, & hauing giuen his daughter in mariage to that Pacuuius, of whom we ſpake before. But this facility of his Colleague, made Fuluius the more haſtie in taking vengeance: for feare, leſt vpon the like reſpects, the Roman Senate might prone more gentle, than he thought behouefull to the common ſafety, and honour of their State. Wherefore he tooke the paines, to ride by night vnto Theanum, & from thence to Cales: where he cauſed all the Campan priſoners to ſuffer death; binding them to ſtakes, and ſcourging them firſt a good while with rods, after which he ſtrucke off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all townes of Italy the leſſe apt to follow the vaine hope of the Campans: & bred a generall inclination, to return vpon good conditions to the Roman ſide. The Atellans, Calatines, & Sabatines, people of the Campans, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made alſo now the like ſubmiſſion, for very feare, & want of ability to reſiſt. They were therfore vſed with the like rigour, by Fuluius: who deale ſo extremely with them all, that he brought them into deſperation. Wherfore ſome of their young gentlemen, burning with fire of reuenge, got into Rome: where they found meanes by night-time, to ſet on fire ſo many houſes, that a great part of the city was like to haue bin conſumed. The beginning of the fire in diuers places at once, argued that it was no caſualtie. Wherfore liberty was proclaimed vnto any ſlaue, and other ſufficient reward to any free man, that ſhould diſcouer who thoſe Incendiaries were. Thus all came out; and the Campans being detected by a ſlaue of their own (to whom, aboue his liberty promiſed, was giuen about the ſum of an hundred markes) had the puniſhment anſwerable to their deſerts. Fuluius hereby being more & more incenſed againſt this wretched people, held them in a maner as priſoners within their wals: and this extreme ſeuerity cauſed them at length to become Suppliants vnto the Roman Senate; that ſome period might be ſet vnto their miſeries. That whereupon the Senators reſolued in the end, was worſe than all that which they had ſuffered before. Onely two poor women in Capua (of which once had been an harlot) were found not guilty of the late rebellion. The reſt were, ſome of them, with their wiues and children ſold for ſlaues, and their goods confiſcated; others laid in priſon, and reſerued to further deliberation: but the generality of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certaine day, and confined vnto ſeuerall places, as beſt liked the angry victors. As for the town of Capua, it was ſuffered to ſtand, in regard of the beauty and commodious ſite: but no corporation or forme of politie, was allowed to be therein; onely a Roman Prouoſt was euery yeer ſent to gouerne ouer thoſe that ſhould inhabit it, and to doe iuſtice. This was the greateſt act, and moſt important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great loſſes in the preſent warre. After this, the glory of Hannibal began to ſhine with a more dimme light, than before: his oile being farre ſpent; and that which ſhould haue reuiued his flame, being vnfortunately ſhed; as ſhall be told in place conuenient.

§. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a partie in Sardinia and Sicil, held warre againſt the Romans in thoſe Iſlands, and were ouercome.

WHilſt things paſſed thus in Italy, the commotions raiſed in Sardinia & Sicil by the Carthaginians & their friends, were brought to a quiet & happy end by the induſtrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great & ſudden: aboue thirty thouſand being vp in armes, ere the Roman forces could arriue there to ſuppreſſe it. One Harſicoras with his ſon Hyoſtus, mighty men in that Iland, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promiſed the aſſiſtance of his country. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterpriſe ſo careleſſe, as in the reſt of their maine vndertakings, about the ſame time. Yet it had been better, if their care had bin directed vnto the proſecution of that maine buſineſſe in Italy, whereon this and all other hopes depended. For it would haue ſufficed, if they could haue hindred the Romans from ſending an Army into Sardinia. Harſicoras with his followers might well enough haue ſerued to driue out Quintus Mutius the Prætor: who lay ſicke in the Prouince; and not more weake in his owne body, than in his traine. But whileſt they ſought reuenge of that particular iniurie, whereof the ſenſe was moſt grieuous; they neglected the opportunity of requiting thoſe that had done them wrong, and of the ſecuring themſelues from all iniuries in the future. Their fortune alſo in this enterprise was such, as may seeme to haue encouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For whereas they sent ouer Asdrubal, surnamed, the Bald, with a competent fleet and armie, assisted in this expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, and by Marga a Gentleman of the Barchine house, and neere kinsman to Hannibal: it so fell out, that the whole fleet by extremity of foule weather, was cast vpon the Baleares: so beaten and in such euill plight, that the Sardinians had euen spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquished, ere these their friends could arriue to succour them.

Titus Manlius was sent from Rome with two and twenty thousand foot, and twelue hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Iland, which he had taken in, and annexed vnto the Roman dominion, long before this, in his Consulship. It was a laudable custome of the Romans, to preserue and vp-hold in their seuerall Prouinces, the greatnesse and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Prouince had beene first subdued vnto their Empire. If any iniurie were done vnto the Prouincialls; if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate; or whatsoeuer accident required the assistance of a Patron: the first Conquerour, and his race after him, were the most readie and best approued meanes, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very sure intelligence, in euery Prouince, and had alwayes in readinesse fit men to reclaime their Subiects, if they fell into any such disorder, as would otherwise haue required a greater charge and trouble. The comming of Manlius, retayned in obedience all that were not already broken too farre out. Yet was Harsicoras so strong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arme his Mariners: without whom he could not haue made vp that number of two and twenty thousand, whereof we haue spoken before: he landed at Calaris or Carallis, where mooring his ships, he passed vp into the Countrey, and sought out the Enemie. Hyostus, the sonne of Harsicoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Army left vnto him by his father, who was gone abroad into the Countrey, to draw in more friends to their side. This young Gentleman would needs aduenture to get honour, by giuing battell to the Romans at his owne discretion. So he rashly aduentured to fight with an old Souldier: by whom hee receiued a terrible ouerthrow; and lost in one day aboue thirtie thousand of his followers. Hyostus himselfe, with the rest of his broken troupes, got into Cornus, the chiefe Towne of the Island: whither Manlius pursued them. Very soone after this defeature came Asdrubal with his Carthaginians: too late to winne all Sardinia in such haste as he might haue done, if the tempest had not hindered his voyage; yet soone enough, and strong enough to saue the Towne of Cornus, and to put a new spirit into the Rebells. Manlius hereupon withdrew himselfe backe to Calaris: where he had not stayed long, ere the Sardinians (such of them as adhered to the Roman party) craued his assistance; their Countrey being wasted by the Carthaginians, and the Rebells, with whom they had refused to ioyne. This drew Manlius forth of Calaris: where if hee had stayed a little longer, Asdrubal would haue sought him out with some blemish to his reputation, But the fame of Asdrubal and his company, appeares to haue bin greater than was their strength. For after some triall made of them in a few skirmishes, Manlius aduentured all to the hazzard of a battaile; wherein he slew twelue thousand of the enemies; and tooke of the Sardinians and Carthaginians, three thousand. Foure houres the battell lasted; and victory at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Islanders, whose courages had beene broken in their vnprosperous fight, not many dayes before. The death of yong Hyostus, and of his father Harsicoras, that slew himselfe for griefe, together with the captiuity of Asdrubal himselfe, with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians, made the victory the more famous. The vanquished Armie fled into Cornus; whither Manlius followed them, and in short space wonne the Towne. All other Cities of the Isle that had rebelled, followed the example of Cornus, and yeelded vnto the Roman; who imposing vpon them such increase of tribute, or other punishment, as best sorted with the nature of their seuerall offences, or their ability to pay, returned back to Calaris with a great bootie, and from thence to Rome, leauing Sardinia in quiet.

The warre in Sicill was of greater length, and euery way more burdensome to Rome: as also the victorie brought more honour and profit, for that the Romans became thereby, not onely sauers of their owne, as in Sardinia; but Lords of the whole Countrie, by annexing the City and dominion of Syracuse, to that which they enioyed before. Soone after

faſt friend vnto the Romans, and greatly relieued them in this preſent warre. He left his kingdome to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteene yeeres of age; Gelo his ſonne, that ſhould haue bin his heire, being dead before. To this young King his ſucceſſour, Hiero appointed fifteene tutors: of which the principall were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themiſtius, who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The reſt were ſuch, as he iudged moſt likely to preſerue the kingdome, by the ſame art, whereby himſelfe had gotten and ſo long kept it. But within a little while, Andronodorus waxing wearie of ſo many coadiutors, began to commend the ſufficiencie of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his yeeres; and ſaid, that he was able to rule the kingdome without help of any Protector. Thus by giuing ouer his owne charge, he cauſed others to do the like: hoping thereby to get the king wholly into his hands; which came to paſſe, in a ſort, as he deſired. For Hieronymus, laying aſide all care of gouernment, gaue himſelfe wholly ouer to his pleaſures: or if he had any regard of his Royall dignitie, it was onely in matter of exterior ſhew, as wearing a Diadem with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby hee offended the eyes of his people, that had neuer ſeene the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his ſonne. But much more hee offended them, when by his inſolent behauiour, ſutable to his outward pompe, hegaue proofe, that in courſe of life, he would reuiue the memory of Tyrants dead long ſince, from whom he tooke the patterne of his habit. He grew proud, luſtfull, cruell, and dangerous to all that were about him: ſo that ſuch of his late tutors as could eſcape him by flight, were glad to liue in baniſhment: the reſt, being moſt of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their owne hands, to auoide the danger of his diſpleaſure, that ſeemed worſe than death it ſelfe. Onely Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thraſo continued in grace with him, and were his Counſailers, but not of his Cabinet.
Theſe, howſoeuer they agreed in other points, were at ſome diſſenſion about the maine point of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them, were wholly for the Kings pleaſures, which was ſet on change: but Thraſo, hauing more regard of his honour and profit, was very earneſt to continue the amitie with Rome. Whilſt as yet it remained ſomewhat doubtfull, which way the King would incline: a conſpiracie againſt his perſon, was detected by a Groome of his; to whom one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the vnder-takers. Long it was ere he would ſpeake any thing: but yeelding (as it ſeemed) in the end, vnto the extremitie of the torture; he confeſſed, that he had beene ſet on by Thraſo; whom he appeached of the treaſon, together with many more, that were neere in loue or place vnto Hieronymus. All theſe therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeed the Conſpirators, walked boldly in the ſtreetes, and neuer ſhrunke for the matter: aſſuring themſelues, that the reſolution of Theodorus would yeeld to no extremitie. Thus they all eſcaped, and ſoone after found meanes to execute their purpoſe. The King himſelfe, when Thraſo was taken out of the way, quickly reſolued vpon fiding with the Carthaginians, whereto he was very inclinable before. Young men, when firſt they grow Maſters of themſelues, loue to ſeeme wiſer than their fathers, by taking different courſes.
And the liberality of Hiero to the Romans, in their great neceſſitie, had of late been ſuch, as might haue beene termed exceſſiue, were it not in regard of his prouidence; wherein he tooke order for his owne Eſtate, that depended vpon theirs. But the young Nephew, taking little heed of dangers farre off, regarded onely the things preſent; the weakneſſe of Rome; the preualent fortunes of Carthage; and the much money that his grand-father had layed out in vaine, to ſhoulder vp a falling houſe. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal: who readily entred into good correſpondence with him; that was maintained by Hippocrates and Epicides, Carthaginians borne, but grand-children of a baniſhed Syra-cuſan. Theſe grew into ſuch fauour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they liſted. So that when App. Claudius the Roman Pretor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacie, betweene the people of Rome, and the King of Syracuſe; his Meſſengers were diſmiſſed with an open ſcoffe. For Hyeronymus would needs haue them tell him the order of the fight at Cannæ, that he might thereby learne how to accõmodate himſelfe, ſaying, That he could hardly beleeue the Carthaginians;

ſo wonderfull was the victory as they reported it. Hauing thus diſmiſſed the Romans, he ſent Embaſſadors to Carthage, where he concluded a league: with condition, at firſt, that a great part of the Iſland ſhould be annexed to his Dominion; but afterward, that he ſhould reigne ouer all Sicil; and the Carthaginians reſt ſatisfied, with what they could get in Italy. At theſe doings Appius Claudius did not greatly ſtirre: partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoued not the Romans, to entertaine more quarrells, than were enforced vpon them by neceſſitie; and partly (as may ſeeme) for that the reputation, both of himſelfe, and of his Citie, had receiued ſuch blemiſh, by that which hapned vnto him in his iourny, as much diſcountenanced him when hee came into Sicil, and forbade him to looke bigge. The money that Hiero had beſtowed formerly vpon the Romans, wherewith to relieue them in their neceſſitie, this Appius was to carry backe vnto him: it being refuſed by the Roman Senate, with greater brauerie than their preſent fortune would allow. But in ſtead of returning the money with thankes, as he had bin directed, and as it had bin noiſed abroad that he ſhould doe: the warre againſt Philip King of Macedon (whereof we haue ſpoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aſide their vaine-glorie, and ſend word after him, that he ſhould conſigne that money ouer to Marcus Valerius; of whoſe voyage into Greece, the City had not otherwiſe wherewith to beare the charge. This was done accordingly, and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Familie, is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious oſtentation of the Roman magnanimitie, into ſuch a pittifull tune of thankſ-giuing, as muſt needs haue bred ſorrow and commiſeration, in ſo true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were deliuered after his death, matter of paſtime and ſcorn, in Hieronymus the new King.

But whileſt Hieronymus was more deſirous of warre, than well reſolued how to begin it: his owne death changed the forme of things, and bred a great innouation in the ſtate of Syracuſe; which thereby might haue proſpered more than euer, had it beene wiſely gouerned. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom wee ſpake before, were ſent about the Countrie with two thouſand men, to ſollicite the Townes, and perſwade them to ſhake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himſelfe with an Armie of fifteene thouſand horſe and foot, went to Leontium, a City of his owne Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Iſland fall to him in all haſte, and accept him for Soueraigne. There the Conſpirators took him on the ſudden as he was paſſing through a narrow ſtreet: and ruſhing betweene him and his guard, ſtrooke him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed: and the ſound of that word ſo ioyfully anſwered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronymus, had little courage to reuenge their Maſters death. Yet for feare of the worſt, a great largeſſe was promiſed vnto the Souldiers, with rewards vnto their Captaines; which wrought ſo effectually, that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned vp, the Army, as in deteſtation of his bad life, ſuffered his carkaſſe to lie vnburied. Theſe newes ranne quickly to Syracuſe: whither ſome of the Conſpirators, taking alſo of the Kings horſes, poſted away; to ſignifie all that had paſſed, to ſtirre vp the people to libertie, and to preuent Andronodorus, if he or his fellowes would make offer to vſurpe a tyranny. The Syracuſians hereupon preſently tooke Armes, and made themſelues maſters of their owne Citie. Andronodorus on the other ſide fortified the Palace, and the Iſland: being yet vncertaine what to doe; between deſire of making himſelfe a ſoueraigne Lord, and feare of ſuffering puiſhment, as a Tyrant, if his enterpriſe miſ-carried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cheriſhed him in his hopes: putting him in minde of that wel-knowne Prouerbe, which Dionyſius had vſed; That a Tyrant ſhould keepe his place, till hee were haled out of it by the heeles, and not ride away from it on horſe-backe. But feare, and better counſaile preuailed ſo farre, that Andronodorus, hauing ſlept vpon the matter, diſſembled his affections, and deferred his hope vnto better opportunity. The next day he came forth, and made a ſpeech vnto the people: telling them, that he was glad to ſee, how prudently they behaued themſelues in ſo great a change; that he had ſtood in feare, leſt they would not haue contained themſelues within the bounds of diſcretion; but rather haue ſought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that ſince he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to rauiſh their liberty perforce, but to wed it vnto them for euer; he was willingly come to them forth of his ſtrength, and ſurrendred vp the charge committed vnto him, by one that had bin an euill master both to him and them. Hereupon great ioy was made, and Pretors chosen (as in former times) to gouerne the Citie of which Andronodorus was one, and the chiefe. But such was his desire of Soueraignetie, and so vehement were the instigations of his wife, that shortly hee began to practise with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captaines of the Mercenaries; hoping to make himselfe strong by their help, that were least pleased with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides had beene with the Syracusian Pretors, and told them, that being sent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they, according to instructions of their Captaine, had done him, whileſt he liued, what seruice they could; and that now they were desirous to returne home. They requested therefore that they might be friendly dismissed; and with a conuoy, that might keepe them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and set them safe at Locri. This was easily granted; both for that the Syracusian Magistrates were well contented to earne thankes of Hannibal, with such a little courtesie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Towne quickly of this troublesome couple, which were good souldiers. and gracious with the Army, but otherwise lewd men. It was not the desire of these two Scicilians, to be gone so hastily as they made shew; they were more mindefull of the businesse, for which Hannibal had sent them. Wherefore they insinuated themselues into the bosomes of such as were most likely to fill the Army with tumult, especially of the Roman fugitiues, and those that had cause to mistrust what should become of themselues, when the Romanes and Syracusians were come to agreement. Such instruments as these, Andronodorus had great need of: as also of many other, to helpe him in his dangerous attempt. Hee found Themistius, that had married Harmonia the sister of Hieronymus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like passions of his owne, and of his wife. But in seeking to increase the number of his adherents, he reuealed the matter to one, that reuealed all to the rest of the Pretors. Hereupon it followed, that he, and Themistius, entring into the Senate, were slaine out of hand: and afterward accused to the People, of all the euill which they had done, whileſt Hieronymus liued, as by his authoritie; and now since attempted, in seeking to vsurp the tyranny themselues. It was also declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were accessary to this dangerous treason: and that the vnquiet spirits of these women would neuer cease to worke, vntill they had recouered those royall ornaments and Soueraigne power, whereof their family was now dispossessed. These daughters therfore of Hiero & Gelo were also condemned to die; and executioners presently sent by the enraged people, to take away their liues. Demarata and Harmonia had perhaps deserued this heauy sentence: but Heraclea, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Sosippus, being altogether innocent, was murdered, together with her two young daughters, in the hastie execution of this rash iudgement. Her husband Sosippus was a louer of the Common-wealth; and in that respect so hated by Hieronymus, that being sent Embassador to king Ptolomie, &c. he durst not returne home, but stayed in Egypt as a banished man. This consideration, when it was too late, together with some pitifull accidents accompanying the slaughter, so affected the multitude; that (pardoning themselues) all cryed out vpon the authors of so foule a butcherie. Being thus incensed against the Senate; and knowing not otherwise how to satisfie their anger, they called for an election of new Pretors, in the roome of Andronodorus and Themistius, that were lately slaine: meaning to substitute such in their places, as the Senators should haue little cause to like. At the election were present a great rowt, not onely of the poorer Citizens, but of souldiers that pressed into the throng. One of these, named Epicides Pretor; another named Hippocrates: and the lesse that the old Pretors and Senators approued this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a generall cry forced them to be accepted. These being made Pretors, did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, betweene the Syracusians and the Romans. But hauing striuen in vaine, and seeing that the People stood in feare of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus, that was lately come into Sicil; they gaue way vnto the time, and suffered the old league of Hiero to be re-confirmed, which afterward they purposed to dissolue by practise. The Leontines had some need of a garrison; and to them was sent Hippocrates the Pretor, attended by such fugitiues, & mercenary souldiers, as were most burdensome to Syracuse. Thither when he came, he began to doe many acts of hostility against the Romans: first in secret, afterward more openly & boldly. Marcellus, rightly vnderstanding the purpose of these two brethren, sent word vnto the Syracusians, that they had already broken the

the league, & that the peace would neuer be kept sincerely, vntill this turbulent paire of brethren were expelled the Island. Epicides fearing to sustaine the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more desirous to set forward the warre, than to excuse any breach of peace, went himselfe vnto the Leontines, whom he perswaded to rebell against the Syracusians. For he said, that since they had all of late serued one Master, there was little reason why the Leontines should not be enfranchised by his death, as well as the Syracusians, yea or much rather, all things considered, since in their streetes the Tyrant was slain, and liberty first proclaymed. Wherefore, since they of Syracuse were not contented to enioy the freedome purchased among the Leontines, but thought it good reason, that they should beare Dominion ouer those that had broken the Chaine, wherewith both the one and the other were bound: his aduice was, that such their arrogancie should be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by prescription. Hereunto occasion was giuen by one article of the League, made of late by the Romans & Syracusians. For it was agreed, That all which had beene subiect to Hiero and Hieronymus, should henceforth be Vassals vnto the State of Syracuse. Against this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their owne due; Epicides told them, that in this noueltie of change, they had fit opportunitie to recouer the freedome, which their fathers had lost not many ages before. Neither was it vnreasonable, which this crafty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had beene subdued by the same hand, which tooke liberty from the Syracusians. But seeing they had long since yeelded vnto Syracuse, and beene subiect vnto that Citie, by what forme soeuer it was gouerned; this claime of liberty was rather seasonable, than iust. Neuertheless, the motion of Epicides was highly approued: insomuch that when messengers came soone after from Syracuse, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done against the Romans, and to denounce vnto Hippocrates and Epicides, that they should get them gone, either to Locri, or whither else they listed; so that they stayed not in Sicil: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requested the Syracusians, to make any bargaines for them with the Romans, nor thought themselues bound to obserue the couenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptory answer was forth-with reported vnto Marcellus by the Syracusians; who offered him their assistance in doing iustice vpon the Leontines their Rebells, with condition, That when the Towne was taken, it might be theirs againe. Marcellus required no better satisfaction: but forth-with tooke the businesse in hand, which he dispatched in one day. At the first assault, Leontium was taken all saue the Castle, whereinto Hippocrates and Epicides fled; and stealing thence away by night, conueyed themselues into the towne of Herbesus. The first thing that Marcellus did, when hee had wonne the Towne, was the same, which other Roman Captains vsed after victory, to seek out the fugitiue Roman slaues and renegados, whom he caused all to die: the rest both of the Townsmen and Souldiers, he tooke to mercy, forbearing also to strip or spoyle them. But the fame of his doings was bruited after a contrarie sort. It was said, that he had slaine, Man, Woman, and Childe, and put the Towne to sacke. These newes met the Syracusian Army vpon the way, as it was going to ioyne with Marcellus, who had ended his businesse before. About eight thousand Mercenaries there were, that had beene sent forth of Syracuse, vnder Sosis and Dionysius, two of the Prætors, to serue against the Leontines and other rebels. These Captains were honest men, and well affected to their Country: but the Souldiers that followed them, had those diseases, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They tooke the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow-souldiers (as now they termed those against whom they went) had beene so cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutiny; though what to demand, or with whom to bee angry, they could not tell. The Prætors therefore thought it best, to turne their vnquiet thoughts another way, and set them a worke in some place else: for as much as at Leontium there was no need of their seruice. So towards Herbesus they marched; where lay Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this mischiefe, deuising what further harme they might doe; but now so weakely accompanyed, that they seemed vnable to escape the punishments belonging to their offences past. Hereof the two brethren were no lesse well aware: and therefore addressed vpon a remedy little lesse desperate than their present case. They issued forth of Herbesus vnarmed, with Oliue branches in their hands, in manner of Suppliants: and so presented themselues to the Army. Six hundred men of Creet were in the vanguard;

that had beene well vsed by Hieronymus, and some of them greatly bound vnto Hannibal, who had taken them prisoners in the Italian warre, and lovingly dismissed them. These Cretians therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good cheare, saying, That no man should doe them harme, as long as they could vse their weapons. Herewithall the Army was at a stand; and the rumour of this accident, ranne swiftly from man to man, with generall approbation. The Pretors thought to helpe the matter by severity, which would not serue. For when they commanded these two traitors to be layd in Irons; the exclamation was so violent against them, that faine they were to let all alone, and returne, uncertaine what course to take, vnto Megara, where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates deuised a tricke, whereby to helpe himselfe, and better the uncertaine case wherein he stood. He caused Letters of his owne penning, to be intercepted by some of his most trustie Cretans, directed (as they made shew) from the Syracusian Pretors, to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the sword among the Leontines: but that it farther behoued him, to make the like dispatch of all the mercenaries belonging to Syracuse; which were offensiue, all of them in generall, to the liberty of the City, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epistle was openly rehearsed, the vproare was such, that Sosis and his fellow Pretor, were glad to forsake the Campe, and flie for their liues. All the Syracusians remaining behinde, had beene cut in peeces by the enraged souldiers, if the two Artificers of the sedition had not saued their liues, rather to keepe them as pledges, and by them, to winne their friends within the Towne, than for any good will. They perswaded also a mischieuous knaue that had serued amongst the Leontines, to iustifie the bruit of Marcellus cruelty, and to carry home the newes to Syracuse, as an eye-witnes. This incensed not onely the multitude, but some of the Senate; and filled the whole towne with causelesse indignation. In good time (said some) was the auarice and cruelty of the Romans detected; who, had they in like sort gotten into Syracuse, would haue dealt much worse, where their greedy appetites might haue beene tempted with a farre greater bootie. Whilest they were thus discoursing, and deuising how to keepe out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Army came to the gates, exhorting the Citizens to let him in, vnlesse for want of helpe, they would be betrayed to their enemies. The Pretors with the best and wisest of the Senate, would faine haue kept him out: but the violence of the souldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-strong fury of those within the towne, that laboured to breake it open. So he entred, and immediately fell vpon the Pretors, whom (being forsaken by all men) he put to the sword, and made slaughter of them and their followers vntill night. The next day hee went openly to worke: and after the common example of Tyrants, gaue liberty vnto all slaues and prisoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worst and baseſt sort, made himselfe and his brother Pretors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuse.

When Marcellus was aduertised of this great alteration, hee thought it no time for him to sit still, and attend the further issue. He sent Embassadours to Syracuse, that were not admitted into the Hauen, but chased out as enemies. Then drew he neere with his Army: and lodging within a mile and a halfe of the towne, sent before him, some to require a parlee. These were entertained without the walls by the two new Pretors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpose to do hurt, but in fauour of the Syracusians, which were oppressed by Tyrants, and to punish those, that had murdered and banished so many of the principall Citizens. Wherefore they required, that those worthy men, Their Confederates, which were chased out of the Towne, might be suffered to returne and enioy their owne; as also that the Authors of the great slaughter lately committed, might bee deliuered vp. Hereto Epicides briefly answered, That if their errand had beene to him, hee could haue told what to say to them: but since it was directed vnto others, they should doe well to returne, when those to whom they were sent, had the gouernment in their hands. As for the warre which they threatned, he told them, they should finde by experience, That to besiege Syracuse, was another manner of worke, than to take Leontium. Thus hee sent them packing, and returned backe into the City. Immediately began the siege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected. The quicke and easie winning of Leontium did put Marcellus in hope, that so long a circuit of wall as compassed Syracuse, being manned with with no better kinde of Souldiers, than those with whom he had lately deale, would in some part or other, be taken at the first assault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terrour in the very beginning, but did his best both by Land and Sea. Neuertheless, all his labour was disappointed, and his hope of preuailing by open force, taken from him by the ill successe of two or three of the first assaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any strength of the Citie, that bred such despaire of hastie victorie. But there liued at that time in Syracuse, Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the request of Hiero the late King, that was his kinsman, had framed such engines of Warre, as being in this extremitie put in vse, did more mischiefe to the Romans than could haue beene wrought by the Canon, or any instruments of Gunne-powder, had they in that age beene knowne. This Archimedes discoursing once with Hiero, maintained that it were possible to remoouе the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were some other earth, or place of sure footing, whereon a man might stand. For proofe of this bold assertion, he performed some strange workes, which made the King entreat him to conuert his studie vnto things of vse: that might preserue the Citie from danger of enemies. To such Mechanicall workes, Archimedes, and the Philosophers of those times, had little affection. They held it an iniury done vnto the liberall sciences, to submit learned Propositions, vnto the workemanship, and gaine, of base handi-crafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an author: who greatly blamed some Geometricians, that seemed vnto him to prophane their science, by making it vulgar. Neither must we rashly taske a man so wise as Plato, with the imputation of supercilious austerity, or affected singularitie in his reprehension. For it hath beene the vnhappy fate of great inuentions, to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreames, before they were published: and being once made knowne, to be vnder-valued, as falling within compasse of the meanest wit, and things, that euery one could well haue performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his discouerie, with the much different sorts of neglect, which he vnder-went before and after it) in a familiar and most homely example, we may see most apparant proofe. He that lookes vpon our English Brewers, and their Seruants, that are daily exercised in the Trade, will thinke it ridiculous to heare one say, that the making of Malt, was an inuention, proceeding from some of an extraordinary knowledge in naturall Philosophie. Yet is not the skill of the inuentors any whit the lesse, for that the labor of workmanship growes to be the trade of ignorant men. The like may bee said of many handicrafts: and particularly in the Printing of Bookes, which being deuised, and bettered, by great Scholers and wisemen, grew afterward corrupted by those, to whom the practice fell, that is, by such, as could slubber things easily ouer, and feede their workemen at the cheapest rate. In this respect therefore, the Alchymists, and all others, that haue, or would seeme to haue any secret skill, whereof the publication might doe good vnto mankinde, are not without excuse of their close concealing. For it is a kinde of iniustice, that the long trauells of an vnderstanding braine, beside the losse of time, and other expence, should be cast away vpon men of no worth, yeeld lesse benefit vnto the Author of a great worke, than to meere strangers, and perhaps his enemies. And surely, if the passion of Enuie, haue in it any thing allowable and naturall, as hauing Anger, Feare, and other like Affections: it is in some such case as this, and much against those, which would vsurpe the knowledge, wherewith God hath denied to indue them. Neuertheless, if we haue regard vnto common charitie, and the great affection that euery one ought to beare vnto the generality of mankinde, after the example of him that suffereth his Sunne to shine vpon the iust, and vniust: it will appeare more commendable in wise men, to enlarge themselues, and to publish vnto the world, those good things that lye buried in their owne bosomes. This ought specially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it some dangerous cunning, that may bee peruerted by euill men to a mischieuous vse. For if the secret of any rare Antidote, contained in it the skill of giuing some deadly and irrecouerable poyson: much better it were, that such a Iewell remaine close in the hands of a wise and honest man, than being made common, binde all men to vse the remedie, by teaching the worst men how to doe mischiefe. But the works which Archimedes published, were such as tended vnto very commendable ends. They were Engines, seruing vnto the defence of Syracuse, not for the Syracusians to carry abroad, to the hurt & oppression of others. Neither did he altogether publish the knowledge, how to vse them, but referred so much to his owne direction; that after his death more of the same kinde were not made, nor those of his owne making were employed by the Romans. It sufficed vnto this worthy man, that he had approued vnto the vulgar, the dignitie of his Science, and done especiall benefit to his Countrey. For to enrich a Mechanicall trade, or teach the Art of murdering men, it was besides his purpose.

Marcellus had caused certaine of his Quinquereme Gallies to be fastned together, and Towers erected on them to beat the defendants from the wall. Against these Archimedes had sundrie deuices, of which any one sort might haue repelled the assaylants: but all of them together shewed the multiplicitie of his great wit. He shot heauy stones & long pieces of timber, like vnto the yeards of ships; which brake some of the Gallies by their force and weight. These afflicted such as lay farre off. They that were come neerer the walls, lay open to a continuall volly of shot, which they could not endure. Some with an yron grapple were taken by the prow and hoysted vp, shaking out all the men, and afterward falling downe into the water. Some by strange Engines were lifted vp into the ayre; where turning round a while, they were broken against the walls or cast vpon the rockes: and all of them were so beaten that they durst neuer come to any second assault. In the like sort was the Land armie handled. Stones and timber, falling vpon it like haile, did not onely ouer-whelme the men, but brake downe the Roman engins of battery; and forced Marcellus to giue ouer the assault. For remedie hereof it was conceiued, that if the Romans could early before day get neere vnto the walls: they should be (as it were) vnder the point blancke, and receiue no hurt by these terrible Instruments; which were woond vp hard to shoot a great compasse. But this vaine hope cost many of the assaylants liues: For the shot came downe right vpon them: and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great slaughter of them, all the way as they fled, (for they were vnable to tarry by it) euen till they were gotten very farre off. This did so terrifie the Romans, that if they perceiued any peece of timber, or a ropes end, vpon the walls, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes his engines were readie to discharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to ouercome these difficulties, or to take away from his men, that feare, against the cause whereof he knew no remedie. If the engines had stood vpon the wals, subiect to firing, or any such annoyance from without; hee might haue holpen it by some deuice, to make them vnseruiceable. But all, or the most of them were out of sight, being erected in the streetes behinde the walls; where Archimedes gaue directions how to vse them. Wherefore the Roman had no other way left, than to cut off from the Towne all prouision of victualls, both by Land and by Sea.

This was a very desperate peece of worke. For the enemies hauing so goodly an Hauen; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them: were not likelie so soone to bee consumed with famine, as the besiegers to bee wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a City, hauing no probabilitie to carrie it. Yet, for want of better counsell to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable course.

In the meane while, Himilco, Admirall of a Carthaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicil, being by Hippocrates aduertised of these passages, went home to Carthage, and there so deale with the Senate, that fiue and twentie thousand Foote, three thousand Horse, and twelue Elephants, were committed vnto his charge, wherewith to make warre vpon the Romans in Sicil by Land. Hee tooke many Townes; and many that had anciently belonged vnto the Carthaginians, did yeeld vnto him. To remedie this mischiefe, and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, beganne to turne vnto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Armie, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. He tooke Pelorus and Herbesus, which yeelded vnto him. He tooke also Megara by force and sackt it: either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracusians, or else because Rome was at this time poore, and his Armie must haue somewhat to keepe it in heart. His especiall desire was to haue saued Agrigentum: whither he came too late; for Himilco had gotten it before. Therefore he returned backe toward Syracuse; carefully, and in as good order as he could, for feare of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumspection, that he vsed, in regard of Himilco, stood him in good stead, against a danger that he had not mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leauing the charge of Syracuse vnto his brother, had lately issued out of the Citie, with ten thousand foote, and fiue hundred horse, horse, intending to ioyne his forces with Himilco. Marcellus fell vpon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an easie victorie, against the dispersed and halfe vnarmed Syracusians. The reputation hereof helped a little to keepe the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, ioyning with Hippocrates, ranne ouer all the Island at his pleasure, and presented battaile to Marcellus, euen at his Trenches; but the Roman wisely refused it. Bomilcar also a Carthaginian, entred with a great fleet into the Hauen of Syracuse, and victualled the Citie. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed so againe, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himilco, and safely arriued at Marcellus his Campe: yet many places reuolted vnto the Carthaginians, and slew or betraied the Roman Garrisons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath a while: and Marcellus, leauing some of his Armie before Syracuse, that hee might not seeme to haue giuen ouer the siege, went vnto Leontium, where he lay intentiue to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious work of besieging Syracuse, or to turne all his forces to Agrigentum, against Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly haue impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse, as vnable to preuaile: & he himself was of an eager disposition, euer vnwilling to giue ground, or to quit, as not feisible, an enterprise that he had once taken in hand. He came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before, and no likelihood to take the Citie by force or famine; yet was hee not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfill his desire. Especially he assaied to preuaile by treason, against which no place can hold out. And to this end he dealt with the Syracusian Gentlemen that were in his Campe, exhorting them to practise with their friends that remained in the Citie. This was not easie for them to doe, because the Town would hearken to no parlee. At length a slaue vnto one of these banished men, making shew to runne away from his Master, got into Syracuse, where hee talked in priuate with some few, as hee had beene instructed. This began Marcellus to haue intelligence within the Citie: whence the Conspirators vsed to send him aduertisements of their proceedings, by a fisher-boat that passed forth in the night: but when they were growne to the number of fourescore, and thought themselues able to effect somewhat of importance, all was discouered, and they, like Traitors, put to death. In the meane while, one Damasippus a Lacedemonian, that had beene sent out of the Towne as an Embassador to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very desirous to ransome him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose, not farre from the walls. There, one of the Romans looking vpon the wall, and wanting the more compendious Art of Geometrie, fell to numbring the stones: and, making an estimate of the height, iudged it lesse than it had beene formerly deemed. Herewith he acquainted Marcellus: who causing better notice to be taken of the place, and finding, that ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it, made all things ready, and waited a conuenient time. It was the weakest part of the Town, and therefore the most strongly guarded: neither was there hope to preuaile by force against Archimedes, if they failed to take it by surprise. But a fugitiue out of the Towne brought word, that a great feast was to be held vnto Diana, which was to last three daies: and that, because other good cheare was not so plentifull within the Citie, as in former times, Epicides, to gratifie the People, had made the more large distribution of Wine. A better opportunitie could not be wished. Wherefore Marcellus, in the dead of the Festiuall night, came vnto the walls, which he took by scalado. Syracuse was diuided into foure parts (or fiue, if Epipolæ were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as distinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten some peece, he had the commoditie of a better and safe lodging, with good store of bootie; and better opportunitie than before, to deale with the rest. For there were now a great many, as well of those in Acradina & the Island, inner parts of the Towne, as of those that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that began to hearken vnto composition, as being much terrified by the losse of those parts, which the Romans had taken and sacke. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harme, or none they did, vnto those that were sheltred vnder strong houses: although it may seeme, that the inner wals were not altogether vnfurnished of his helpe, since they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitiues and Renegado's, were more carefull than euer to defend the reſt of the Citie: being ſure to be rewarded with cruell death, if Marcellus could preuaile. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected; and Bomilcar was ſent away to Carthage, to bring helpe from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilco came: who fell vpon the olde Camp of the Romans, whileſt Epicides ſallied out of Acradinia vpon Marcellus. But the Romans made ſuch defence in each part; that the Aſſailants were repelled. Neuertheleſſe, they continued to beſet Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as ſtreightly beſieged, as hee himſelfe did beſiege the Towne. But the peſtilence at length conſumed, together with the two Captaines, a great part of the Armie, and cauſed the reſt to diſlodge. The Romans were (though ſomwhat leſſe) afflicted with the ſame peſtilence, in ſo much that Bomilcar did put the Citie of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were ſent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no deſire to doe his Countrie ſeruice: but his courage was not anſwerable to his good will. He arriued at Pachynus with a ſtrong fleet: where he ſtaid; being loth to double the Cape, for that the windes did better ſerue the enemie than him. Thither ſailed Epicides out of Syracuſe: to acquaint him with the neceſſities of the Citie; and to draw him on. With much intreatie, at length he came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was readie for him, hee ſtood off into the deepe; and ſailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicil farewell. Then durſt not Epicides returne into Syracuſe, but went to Agrigentum: where he expected the iſſue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good newes.

The Sicilian ſouldiers that remained aliue of Hippocrates his Army, lay as neere as they could ſafely, vnto Marcellus, and ſome of them, in a ſtrong Towne three miles off. Theſe had done what good they could to Syracuſe, by doing what hurt they could vnto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the ſtate of Sicil was giuen as deſperate by the Carthaginians: they ſent Embaſſadors to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themſelues, and for the Towne. Heereunto Marcellus willingly gaue eare: for hee had ſtaied there long enough; and had cauſe to feare, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither ſtrong againe. He therefore agreed, both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; That they ſhould be Maſters of their owne, enioying their libertie and proper lawes; yet ſuffering the Romans to poſſeſſe whatſoeuer had belonged vnto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death; new Pretors choſen; and the gates euen ready to bee opened vnto Marcellus: when ſuddenly the Roman fugitiues diſturbed all. Theſe perceiuing their owne condition to be deſperate, perſwaded the other Mercenarie ſouldiers, That the Citizens had bargained onely for themſelues, and betraied the Armie to the Romans. Wherefore they preſently tooke Armes, and fell vpon the new choſen Pretors; whom they ſlue, and made election of ſixe Captaines that ſhould command ouer all. But ſhortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the Souldiers; excepting only the fugitiues. The Treatie was therefore againe ſet on foot, and wanted little of concluſion: which yet was delaied; either by ſome feare of the Citizens, that had ſeene (as they thought) proofe of the Roman auarice in the ſack of Epipole, Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts already taken; or by ſome deſire of Marcellus to get the Towne by force, that he might vſe the libertie of a Conqueror, and make it wholly ſubiect to Rome. Mericus a Spaniard was one of the ſixe Captaines, that had been choſen in the laſt commotion: a man of ſuch faith, as vſually is found in Mercenaries; holding his owne particular benefit aboue all other reſpects. With this Captaine, Marcellus dealt ſecretly: hauing a fit inſtrument, of the ſame Nation, one Belligenes, that went in company with the Romane Embaſſadors, daily paſſing to and fro. This craftie Agent perſwaded Mericus, That the Romans had alreadie gotten all Spaine: and that if euer he purpoſed to make his owne fortune good, either at home in Spaine, or any where elſe; it was now the onely time to do it; by conforming himſelfe to the will of the Roman Generall. By ſuch hopes the Spaniſh Captaine was eaſily wonne, and ſent forth his owne brother among the Syracuſian Embaſſadours to ratifie the couenant with Marcellus.

This vnder-hand dealing of Marcellus againſt the Syracuſians, cannot well be commended as honeſt: neither was it afterwards throughly approued at his comming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had beene ſuch, as deſerued not to be requited with the ruine of his Countrie: much leſſe, that the miſeries of his people, oppreſſed (though partly through their owne follie) by an Army of Mercenaries, ſhould miniſter

vnto the people of Rome, aduantage against them. The poore Citizens could not make good their parts against the hired souldiers; and therefore were faine to yeeld vnto the time, and obey those Ministers of Hannibal, that ruled the Armie. But as long as they were free after the death of Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicides: it had beene their chiefe care to maintaine amitie with the people of Rome. They had lately slaine many the principall of Epicides his followers; and many of themselues had also beene slaine, both lately and in former times, because of this their desire vnto the peace. What though it were true, that the Rascalitie, and some ill aduised persons, ioyned with the souldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occasion of the slaugter which they heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in those parts of their owne Citie which was taken? Ought therefore the Romane Generall, in a treatie of peace held with the Syracusians, to make a bargaine vnder-hand against them, with a Captaine of the Mercenaries? These things were obiected against Marcellus, at his returne home. But the Senators thought it a great deale better, to comfort the Syracusians with gentle words, & promise of good vsage in time to come; than to restore the bootie, and giue ouer the Dominion of a Citie, so great, wealthy strong, and many wayes important. Neuertheless if we consider the many inconueniences and great mischiefes whereunto Syracuse was obnoxious; both by euill neighbours; and by that very forme of policie, after which it was gouerned: wee may truely affirme, That it receiued no small benefit, by becomming subiect vnto Rome. For thereby it was not onely assured against all forraine enemies, domesticall conspiracies, and such Tyrants as of olde had reigned therein: but freed from the necessitie of banishing, or murdering, the most worthie Citizens, as also from all factions, intestine seditions, and a thousand the like miseries, that were wont to grow out of the iealousie, wherein they held their libertie in vaine. Neither enioyed that City, from her first foundation, any such long time of happinesse, as that wherein it flourished, when it rested secure vnder the protection of Rome; and was no more molested, by the disease of ambition; whereof by Marcellus his victorie it was throughly cured. But such benefit, arising from wrongs done, serues not to make iniustice the more excusable: vnlesse we should approue the answer of that Thiefe, who being found to haue stollen a siluer cup from a sicke man, said, He neuer leaues drinking.

By the treason of Mericus, the Roman Armie was let into possession of all Syracuse; wherein, the booty that it found, was said to haue bin no lesse, than could be hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it selfe, that maintained warre by Land and Sea against them. All the goodly workes and Imageries, wherewith Syracuse was marueilously adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left vntouched; saue only the houses of those banished men, that had escaped from Hippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman Campe. Among other pittifull accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, euen by Marcellus himselfe. He was so busie about his Geometrie, in drawing figures, that hee hearkened not to the noyse, and vprore in the Citie; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus tooke heauily the death of him; and caused his body to be honourably buried. Vpon his Tombe (as he had ordained in his lifetime) was placed a Cylinder & a Sphere, with an inscription of the proportion between them, which hee first found out. An Inuention of so little vse, as this may seeme, pleased that great Artist better, than the deuising of all those engins, that made him so famous. Such difference is in the iudgement of learned men, and of the vulgar sort. For many an one would thinke the monie lost, that had bin spent vpon a sonne, whose studies in the Vniuersitie had brought forth such fruit, as the proportion between a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuse, all the Townes in Sicil yeelded vnto the Romans, except Agrigentum and a few places thereabout. At Agrigentum lay Epicides with one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately sent from Hannibal. This Mutines by many good peeces of seruice, had added some credit to the beaten Carthaginian side; and withall made his owne name great. By his perswasions, Hanno and Epicides aduentured to meet Marcellus without the Towne, and not behaue themselues as men expecting to bee besieged. Neither was hee more vallant in counsell, than in execution. Once and againe he set vpon the Romanes, where they lay encamped, and droue them fearfully into their Trenches. This bred enuie in Epicides and Hanno: especially in Hanno, that hauing beene lately ſent from Carthage, with commiſſion and authoritie from the State, thought himſelfe wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that hee had ſent vnto him this Mutines, to be his Companion, & to take vpon him, like as good a man as himſelfe. The indignitie ſeemed the greater, when Mutines being to ſtep aſide vnto Heraclea, for the pacifying of ſome troubles there among the Numidians; aduiſed (as directing Hanno and Epicides) not to meddle with the enemie, vntill his returne. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight: and offered battell vnto Marcellus, before he ſought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Army was left behind in Syracuſe, as need required: which made the Carthaginians the better able to deale with thoſe that came againſt them. But whatſoeuer diſproportion was betweene the two Armies; farre greater were the oddes betweene the Captaines. For howſoeuer the people of Carthage would giue authoritie by fauour; yet could they not giue worth and abilitie, in matter of warre. The Numidians, hauing before conceiued ſome diſpleaſure againſt their Captains; and being therefore ſome of them gone away to Heraclea; were much more offended, when they ſaw that the vaine-glorious enuy of Hanno carried him vnto the fight, vpon a fooliſh deſire to get victorie, without the helpe of Mutines their Countriman. Wherefore they ſent vnto the Roman Generall, and bade him be confident; for that it was not their purpoſe to ſhew themſelues his enemies that day, but onely looke on, and ſee the proud Carthaginians well beaten, by whom they had beene miſuſed. They made good their promiſe, and had their deſire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their meſſage, did ſo luſtily ſet vpon the enemies, that hee brake them at the firſt charge; and with the ſlaughter of many thouſands, droue them backe into Agrigentum.

If Hanno could haue beene contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of Warre than himſelfe, and not haue hazarded a battell without need; the Romans would ſhortly haue beene reduced into termes of great difficultie in their Sicilian warre. For Marcellus was ſhortly after to leaue the Prouince; and ſoone vpon his departure, there landed in the Iland a ſupply of eight thouſand foote, and three thouſand Numidian horſe, that were ſent from Carthage. The fame of this new Armie drew manie of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Armie conſiſting (for the moſt part) of the Legions of Canna, tooke it very hainouſly, that no good ſeruice done, could bring them into the fauour of the Senate; but that, as baniſhed men, they were ſent farre from home, & not ſuffered to return back to Rome with their generall. Mutines had pacified his Countrimen the Numidians; & like an honeſt man, did what hee could for thoſe whom he ſerued, without contending againſt the fooliſh pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might haue beene, if the Armie lately ouerthrowne had beene entire. M. Cornelius the Roman Pretor, vſed all diligence, both to pacifie his own men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. Hee recouered thoſe In-land Townes that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mutines from ouer-running all the Country; yet hee hindred the Country from reuolting vnto Mutines. Aboue threeſcore Townes, great and ſmall, the Carthaginians held in Sicil: of which Agrigentum was the principall, and farre bigger than any of the reſt. Thence iſſued Mutines as often as hee pleaſed, in deſpight of the Romanes: not onely to the ſuccour of his owne adherents, but to the great waſte of thoſe that followed the contrarie part. But Hanno, in ſtead of being pleaſed with all theſe good ſeruices, was filled more and more with enuie, againſt the man that performed them. Hee had (belike) receiued inſtruction from old Hanno at Carthage, not to ſuffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to haue ſhare in the honour of theſe Sicilian Warres: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently ſupplied; whileſt Italie was neglected, that ſhould haue beene regarded more than all the reſt. Wherefore to ſhew his authoritie, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint vnto him an Aſſiſtant, or Director: Hee tooke away from Mutines his charge, and gaue it to his owne ſonne; thinking thereby to diſcountenance the man, and make him little eſteemed, as one out of Office, among the Numidians. But it fell out quite contrarie: and this ſpightfull dealing, occaſioned the loſſe of whatſoeuer the Carthaginians held in Sicil. For the Numidians were ſo incenſed by the indignitie offered vnto their Countriman, being ſuch a braue Commander, that they offered him their ſeruice to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth abſolutely at his owne diſpoſition. M. Valerius Leuinus, the Romane Conſull, was newly come into the Prouince, when this fell out: and, with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brooke

these indignities; but being, neither a Carthaginian, nor fauored by those that bore all the sway in Carthage: He thought it the wiseſt way, to play the beſt of his owne game, and forsake that Citie, which was likely to periſh by the euill counsell that gouerned it. He did not therefore; as his Countrimen had lately done, content himselfe to see his Aduersaries reape the bitter fruits of their owne malicious ouer-weening: and to suffer that harme, in doing whereof he would not beare a part; but conspired against them to deliuer vp Agrigentum, and to helpe to expell them vtterly out of Sicil. The Consull was glad of his friendship; and carefully followed his aduertisements. Neither was there much cunning needefull; to the performance of that which Mutines had vndertaken: For he with his Numidians did forcibly seize vpon a gate; whereat they let in some Roman Companies, that lay neere in a readineſse for the purpoſe. Hanno, when first he heard the noyse, thought it had beene no worse matter, than some such tumult of the Numidians, as he had beene well acquainted with of late. But when, making haste to pacifie the trouble, he saw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among those discontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betooke himselfe to flight: and sauing himselfe, with Epicides, in a smal Barke, set saile for Africke; leauing all his Armie and Adherents in Sicil, to the mercie of the Romans, that henceforward continued masters of the whole Iland.

Laninus the Consul hauing taken Agrigentum, did sharpe execution of iuſtice vpon all the Citizens. The principall of them he scourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the reſt of them he sold for slaues, and confiscated their goods; sending home to Rome the monie that was raiſed of the bootie. This was indeede a time; wherein Rome stood in no leſſe neceſſity of gold, than of steele: which may haue beene the reason, why Laninus dealt so cruelly with the Agrigentines. Neuertheleſſe the fame of such seueritie bred a terrour among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians; so that in great haste they sought to make their peace. About fortie Townes yeelded themselues quickly vnto the Romans; twenty were deliuered vp by Treason; and sixe onely stayed to be wonne by force. These things done, Laninus returned home to Rome; carrying with him about foure thousand men from Agatirna; that were a companie of out-lawes, bankrouts, and banished men, accustomed to liue by spoyle of others, in these troubleſome times. He beſtowed them about Rhegium in Italie, where they might exercise their owne occupation against the Brutians; a theeuish kinde of people, that were enemies vnto those of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he liued in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipio's in their iournie against Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is said) very especiall seruice. So by this enterprise of Sicil, the Carthaginians wasted much of their forces, that with greater profit might haue beene employed in Italie: leauing yet vnto the Romans, in the end of this warre, the entire poſſeſſion of this Iland; which they wanted when it began.

§. XVI.

How the warre passed betweene the Romans and Hannibal in Italie, from the taking of Capua to the great victorie at Metaurus.

SHortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where for his good seruices done in the Iland of Sicil; he had granted vnto him the honour of the leſſer Triumph, which was called Ouation. The greater Triumph was denied him: because he had not finiſhed the warre, but was faine to leaue his Armie behinde him in the Prouince. He staied not long in Rome, before he was againe chosen Consull together with M. Valerius Laninus, who succeeded him in the gouernment of Sicil, and was, at the time of his election, making warre against King Philip in Greece. Great complaint was made against the Consul Marcellus, by the Syracusians, for that which he had done vnto them: they alledging their great friendship to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their Citie did neuer willingly breake the alliance, excepting when it was oppreſſed by such Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome than to all good men that liued in Syracuse. The Consul, on the other side, reckoned the labours and dangers whereunto they had put him: willing them to bemoane themselues to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their neceſſitie; and not vnto

the Romans whom they had kept out. Thus each part hauing ſome good matter to alledge, the Senate made ſuch an end of the controuerſie, as beſt agreed with the benefit of their owne Common-wealth: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not reſtoring the bootie that he had taken, nor making the Syracuſians free from their ſubiection, but comforting them with gentle words, and hopefull promiſes, as hath beene ſhewed before. The two new Conſuls Marcellus and Læuinus, were appointed to make warre, as their lots ſhould fall out; the one in Italie, the other in Sicil. The Iſle of Sicil fell vnto Marcellus; which Prouince he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syracuſians (whoſe cauſe had not as yet beene heard in the Senate) might not ſeeme hindred by feare, from vttering their grieuances freely. Afterwards, when his buſineſſe with them was diſpatcht, he gently vndertooke the patronage of them: which remained long in his Familie, to the great benefit of their Countrie in times following. So Valerius, the other Conſul, was ſent into Sicil, whoſe doings there haue beene already rehearſed: but Marcellus was employed againſt Hannibal.

Before the Conſuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with preſſing of Souldiers to the warre, and moſt of all, with getting Marriners for their Nauie. They were all of the poorer ſort, that vſed to be employed in Sea-ſeruices; eſpecially in rowing. Theſe could not liue without preſent wages: neither was there monie enough in the Treaſurie to giue them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they ſhould be ſet out at the expence of priuate men; who in this neceſſitie of the State, were driuen to ſuſtaine all publike charges. Hereat the people murmured, and were ready to fall into ſedition; had not the Conſuls deferred the matter vnto further conſideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or doe, in a caſe of ſuch extremitie. For manifeſt it was, that the multitude had already endured ſo much, as well it could vndergoe; and ſomewhat more, than could with honeſty haue beene impoſed vpon it. Neuertheleſſe it was impoſſible to maintaine the warre againſt the Carthaginians, or to keepe the Macedonian out of Italie, without a ſtrong fleet. Wherefore, ſome were of opinion; That, ſince the common Treaſure was ſo emptie, the people muſt be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden vpon them. At laſt the Conſuls began to ſay, That no perſwaſions would be ſo effectuall with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Conſuls, like it was, that the people alſo would follow the Senate. Whereforethey propounded, and it was immediately concluded, That euery one of them ſhould bring forth, and put into the Treaſurie, all the mony that he had; and that no Senator ſhould keepe any veſſell of gold, or plate whatſoeuer; excepting one Salt-ſeller, and a Bowle wherewith to make their offerings vnto the gods; as alſo a Ring for himſelfe, with ſuch other tokens of ingenuitie for his wife and children, as euery one did vſe, and thoſe of as ſmall value as might be. This aduice of the Conſuls was not more thankefully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded, and haſtly followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonaltie refuſe to doe that, which their betters had openly done before them. For ſince the publike neceſſitie could no otherwiſe be holpen; euery one was contented, that his priuate eſtate ſhould run the ſame fortune with the Common-wealth, which if it ſuffered wracke, in vaine could any particular man hope to enioy the benefit of his proper ſubſtance. This magnanimitie deſerued well that greatneſſe of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Conuenient order being thus taken for an Armie and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the Citie againſt Hannibal; and Læuinus toward Sicil. The armie of Hannibal was greatly diminiſhed, by long and hard ſeruice: neither did his Carthaginians ſeeme to remember him, and thinke vpon ſending the promiſed ſupply, or any ſuch proportion as he needed. His credit alſo among his Italian friends, was much weakned, by the loſſe of Capua: which gaue them cauſe, to looke vnto themſelues, as if in his helpe there were little truſt to be reposed, when they ſhould ſtand in neede. This he well perceiued; yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he muſt thruſt Garriſons into all Townes that he ſuſpected, and thereby ſo diminiſh his armie, that he ſhould not be able to keepe the field: or elſe he muſt leaue them to their owne fidelity, which now began to wauer. At length his iealouſie grew ſo outragious, that he ſacked, and waſted, thoſe places that he was vnable to defend, thinking that the beſt way to enrich himſelfe, and make vnprofitable, to his enemies, the purchaſe from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him, and ſome of thoſe, whom before hee had leaſt cauſe to doubt. The towne of Salapia yeelded vnto Marcellus; and betrayed vnto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horse, the best of all that serued vnder Hannibal; which was a greater losse, than the Towne it selfe. Blasius the author of this rebellion, could not bring his desire to effect; without getting the consent of one Dasius, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Dasius in priuate; and was by him accused vnto Hannibal. But when he was conuented and charged of Treason, hee so stoutly denied it, and by way of recrimination, so vehemently pressed his accuser with the same fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter deuised out of meere malice, knowing well what enemies they were; and seeing, that neither of them could bring any proofe of what he affirmed. This notwithstanding, Blasius did not cease to presse his aduersarie anew, and vrge him from time to time, with such liuely reasons; that he who could not be beleeued by Hannibal, was contented at length to win the fauour of Marcellus. Presently after this, the Consul tooke by force, Maronea and Meles, Townes of the Samnites; wherein he slew about three thousand of Hannibal his men.

Hannibal could not looke to all at once: but was faine to catch aduantages, where hee might get them; the Romans now being growne stronger in the field than he. The best was, that his Carthaginians, hauing wearied themselues with ill speede in many pettie enterprises, and laid aside all this while the care of Italie, to follow businesse of far lesse importance; had now at length resolued, to send presently the great supply, that had beene so long promised & expected. This if they had done in better season; Rome it selfe might haue beene strucken downe, the next yeere after that great blow receiued at Cannæ. But since that w^ch is past cannot be amended; Hannibal must force himselfe to make a good countenance; and tell his followers, that this mightie succour would come time enough. For Masanissa was at Carthage with fiue thousand Numidians, ready to set saile for Spaine: whither when he came, it was appointed, that Asdrubal should forthwith take his iournie into Italie, of which there had beene so long talke. These newes did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their best; the Romans to preuent the threatning mischiefe, and winne as much as they could vpon Hannibal, before the comming of his brother; Hannibal, on the contrarie, to hold his owne, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fuluius, a Roman Pretor, lay neere vnto Herdonea to get the Towne by practice. It was not long, since, neere vnto the same place, another Cn. Fuluius had lost his Armie. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; & came to Herdonea ere Fuluius heard newes of his approach. As soone as he came, he offered battaile to the Roman Pretor; who accepted it with more haste than good speede. The Roman Legions made good resistance a while, till they were compassed round with the Carthaginian horse. Then fell they to rout; and great slaughter was made of them. Fuluius himselfe, with twelue Tribunes or Counsels, were lost: of the common Souldiers; that were slaine, the number is vncertaine; some reporting seuen, others thirteene thousand. The Towne of Herdonea; because it was at point to haue yeelded vnto Fuluius, Hannibal did set on fire: and putting those to death that had practised with the Enemie, carried away the multitude; whom he bestowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Consul Marcellus hearing of this; wrote vnto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of a good cheere; for that hee would shortly abate the enemies pride. Hee followed the Carthaginian apace; and ouertaking him at Numistro in the Countrie of the Lucans, fought with him a battell: which beginning at nine of the clocke in the morning, lasted vntill night; and ended, by reason of the darkenesse, with vncertaine victorie. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venusia they met, and had many skirmishes; but none of importance. Hannibal remoued often; and sought to bring the enemie within danger of some ambush. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battaile, would yet aduenture nothing, but by open day-light, and vpon faire ground.

Thus passed the time away, vntill Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fuluius, hee that lately had taken Capua, were chosen Consuls. Fabius, considering how much the Romane affaires were bettered by the taking of Capua, purposed that yeere to besiege Tarentum: which if he could winne, like it was, that scarce one good Citie would afterwards remaine true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus, (to whom was continued the command of those Legions that serued vnder him the yeere before) to presse the Carthaginian so hard, as he might haue no leisure to helpe

Tarentum.

Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himselfe, to deale with Hannibal in open field. He followed him therefore to Canusium, and thence from place to place: desiring euer to come to battaile, but vpon equall tearmes. The Carthaginian had not minde to hazzard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertaine his enemie with skirmish; as being desirous to keepe his Armie strong vntill the comming of Asdrubal. Yet could he not auoide the importunity of Marcellus, nor brooke the indignity of being daily braued. He therefore bade his men to be lustie, and to beat soundly this hot-spirited Roman Captaine, that would neuer suffer them to be at quiet; vntill they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him bloud. Hereupon followed a battaile; wherein Hannibal had the victory; tooke sixe Ensignes; and slew of the Romans almost three thousand, among which were some of marke. Marcellus was so impatient of this dishonour, that he rated his men, as Pesants, and base cowards: telling them, that they were the first of the Roman Legions, which had beene beaten by Hannibal, by plaine force and manhood; without being circumuented by any stratageme. With these, and many other the like words, which they were ashamed to heare, he did so vexe them; that thinking themselues better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than such displeasure of their Generall, they besought him to pardon them, and leade them forth once againe to fight. He did so: and placing those Companies formost, that had lost their Ensignes the day before, bade them be carefull to winne a victory; whereof the newes might be at Rome, before the report of their shamefull ouerthrow. Hannibal was angry, to see that nothing could make this Enemy quiet: and therefore was ready to fight againe; since all other motiues continued the same, and his men had beene hartned by the late victory. But the Romans were stirred vp with desire of reuenge, and of repairing their honor lost, which affections gaue a sharpe edge vnto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were growne dull, and wearie by seeing themselues disappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithstanding their late victory, as ready to molest them as before. In this second battaile Martellus got the victory: which he purchased at so deare a rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cause to vaunt, the second night. For if eight thousand of the Carthaginians were slaine, and three thousand of the Roman side, in this next battaile, the difference was no greater, than euen to recompence the late receiued ouerthrow: especially since the number of the Romans that were wounded, was so great, as disabled Martellus from pursuing Hannibal, who dislodged by night. Neuertheless it sufficed, that Fabius the Consul hereby got leisure, to follow his businesse at Tarentum without any disturbance. Q. Fuluius the other Consul, about the same time, tooke in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Vulscentes, that willingly yeelded themselues, and betrayed the Garrisons of Hannibal that lay in their Townes: whom Fuluius entertained in louing sort; gently rebuking them for their errours past, without punishing those that had beene authours, or busie doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian theeues, which Lanius had lately brought from Leuterna, was then also set on worke to besiege Caulonia, a Towne of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might serue to diuert Hannibal, from the succour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Consul, hauing taken Manduria a Towne of the Salentines, sate downe before Tarentum: making all preparation that seemed needfull to carry it, either by assault or long siege. Of the Garrisons in the Towne, a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, vnder a Captaine of their owne Nation. This Captaine fell in loue with a Tarentine wench; whose brother serued vnder Fabius. Hereof, she gaue notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman side; by telling him how rich, and of what great accompt her louer was. But her brother made the Consul acquainted with these newes: and said, that if the Brutian were farre in loue, he might perhaps be woone, by intreaty of his Mistris, to doe what she would haue him. The Consul hearing this, and finding likelihood in the matter; willed his souldier to conney himselfe into the Towne as a fugitiue, and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his desire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captaine: and partly by his owne perswasions, partly by the flattering entreatie of his sister, wanne him to betray the Towne to the Romans. When they had agreed vpon the businesse, and resolued how to order it; the same Souldier got out of the Towne by night, and acquainted the Consul with his proceedings: telling him in which part that that Brutian kept watch; and what might conueniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gaue an alarme to the Citie; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captaines in the Towne, prepared to make resistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himselfe with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captaine, helped the Romans to get vp, and breake open the next gate, whereat the Armie was let in. The Tarentines and Carthaginian souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market place: but (as happeth in like cases, where the maine confidence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nico, Democrates, and Philomenes, with those that before had let in Hannibal, vsed now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Towne, offered himselfe prisoner: hoping to be well vsed, because of hospitalitie that had passed betweene his Father and the Consul. But he was slaine by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword, in such sort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This slaughter of the Brutians, was thought to haue beene made by appointment of the Consul, to the end that he might seeme to haue wonne the Towne by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preserued his reputation of faithfull dealing, and keeping his word. The bootie found in Tarentum was very great: whereof the Roman Treasurie, whither it was carried, had great neede. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities, that were in the Citie, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being told of some Idols that seemed worthy to be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in such habit and posture as if they were fighting: he said, Let vs leaue vnto the Tarentines their angrie gods.

Hannibal being gotten cleare from Marcellus, fell vpon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his comming: but he was so neere, that they were faine to betake them to a Hill, which serued to no other purpose, than to beare off the first brunt. There they defended themselues a little while, and then they yeelded. When this businesse was done, he hasted away to relieue Tarentum. But when he came within fiue miles of the Citie, he had newes that it was lost. This grieued him: yet he said no more than this, The Romans haue also their Hannibal; we haue lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seeme to turne backe amazed, or in any feare of the victorious Consul; he incamped a few dayes together, so neere as he was vnto Tarentum: and thence departing to Metapontum, bethought himselfe how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chiefe of the Metapontines to write vnto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgiue them all offences past. These letters were sent by two yong men of the same Citie; who did their errand so well, that the Consul wrote backe by them vnto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure made ready his ambushes for the warie Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the plot were giuen; or whether indeede (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Roman; the iourny to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were employed againe: but being apprehended, and threatned with torture, they discouered all.

This yeere was happy to the Romans, in all their warres: for they got euery where; saue onely at Caulonia; where they lost a company of such lewd fellowes, that it may seeme good fortune, to haue so beene rid of them. But their common pouerity, & disability to maintaine their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirty Roman Colonies were then in Italie: of which, twelue refused to contribute any longer to the warres. For it was considered, that the Legions of Canne, and those vnhappy Companies that had beene beaten vnder the one and the other Cn. Fuluius, were transported into Sicil; were they liued, in a sort, as banished men. This grieued their friends at home, and made them reckon vp the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten yeeres together they had beene exhausted with leuies of men, and impositions of mony: in euery of which yeeres they had receiued some notable ouerthrow. In this case the least that they could feare; or rather the best that they could hope; was to fall into the hands of the enemy to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to passe within a while, that they should be all consumed: since new Souldiers were daily prested forth of their Townes; and the old ones neuer returned. Such talke was frequent among those of the Colonies: especially where they that were transported into Sicil, had most compassionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Townes, to the number of twelue, That they should boldy deny vnto the Romans their farther helpe. This was thought the likeliest way to obtaine peace: whereof otherwise they saw little hope, as long as Hannibal liued. When the Consuls heard the Embassadors of these Townes make such declaration, and protest their disabilitie of giuing any farther helpe, they were much amazed. They willed the Embassadours to returne home, and bring a better answer, forasmuch as this was none other than treason: they bade them to consider, that the people were not Campans or Tarentines, but the off-spring of the Romans, and no lesse partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-Citie. But all would not serue: the Embassadours continuing to protest, that they had already done what they could, and that they had remaining, neither men, nor money. It was well for the Romans, that the other eighteene Colonies did not imitate these twelue, but shewed themselues willing to vndergoe whatsoeuer should be layed vpon them, without shrinking vnder the burden. This their offer was so highly pleasing to the Consuls, that the Embassadors of those faithfull Colonies, were brought vnto the Senate, and produced into the Assembly of the people: where, with commemoration of all their former good seruices, this their present loue vnto the State was magnified, and thankes accordingly bestowed vpon them, with promise, that it should not be forgotten. As for the Embassadors of those twelue Colonies, that refused to contribute, it was thought best neither to retaine them in the Citie, nor yet to dismisse them, nor take any notice of them at all, but leaue them to their owne consideration of their ill deseruing.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of these twelue people would haue wrought in those that were so willing to helpe the State, if Asdrubel had been then comming into Italie. For then must the Romanes haue betaken themselues wholly to their owne defence, whereas now, to the great comfort of their subiects, they employed their forces in the conquest of Italie, with hopefull and fortunate successe. Neuertheless, they were faine to open their most priuie treasurie, and thence take out the gold that had beene layed vp to serue them in cases of greatest extremitie. Of the money thus extracted, one quarter was deliuered to Fabius the Consull, to set him well out against the Tarentines; all the rest was sent into Spaine to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Armie, and to prouide, that Asdrubal might not passe from thence into Italie. It is likely that Fabius did not spend all his money, finding such easie successe at Tarentum, as was shewed before. But to stop the iourney of Asdrubal, neither the money sent into Spaine, nor any victories won by Scipio could suffice. Neuertheless it fell out happily for the people of Rome, that this yeere, & the next were spent, before his comming, and they better prepared, than at lesse warning they could haue beene, to entertaine him. Here it were not amisse to note, That since the Romans, being in so great necessitie of money, were driuen to furnish the Armie in Spaine, with the greatest part of all their stocke that was left: it must needs be, that either the bootie taken in new Carthage, was far lesse than fame had reported it, or else that Scipio had not as yet wonne it: howsoeuer Liuie rather inclines to those, who say that he got it soone after his arriuall.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintius Crispinus, were chosen Consuls after Fabius and Fulvius. In their yeere it was, that Asdrubal tooke his iourney out of Spaine, though he came not into Italie vntill the yeere following. After the great battaile at Canne, Hannibal had lost much time about Capue and Naples, in seeking to make himselfe Maister of a good hauen, for the landing of those succours that were promised from Carthage. The hope that he reposed in Philip, caused him to turne his principall care to the Easterne parts of Italie, where he made ready a faire entrance for the Macedonian, if he had beene ready to come. But since his hope was vanished, and the long promised succour of Asdrubal was (though farre later than had beene expedient) ready to arriue: he began to deale with the people of Hetruria, through whose Countries his brother was to passe, that therein he might make a partie against the Romans. The losse of Capue, Tarentum, and many other Townes, might haue terrified all other of the Italian Townes from hatching

to any solicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the pouerty of the Romans, & the wearines of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Army comming, than that which Hannibal brought into Italy; did imbolden many of the Hetrurians, especially the Arretines, to take such counsell as they thought most expedient for themselues, without regard of their fidelitie to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of their conspiracy, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria: whose comming did so terrifie them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the yeere following they were deuising how to breake out: as contrariwise the Roman Propretors; partly by terrour of seuere iudgements & inquisitions, and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wils; and took many Hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest desire, to make strong warre vpon Hannibal without more temporising: perswading themselues, that in battaile they should be too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular desire, to make his Consulship notable by the winning of some good Towne: as Fuluius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the siege of Locri, one of the best cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italie: and brought thither all sorts of engines, sending for a fleet out of Sicil to helpe him. But Hannibal was not slow to relieue the city: the fame of whose approach, made Crispinus desist from his enterprise, & retire vnto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal, to whom the Consuls daily offered battaile. This great man of warre had no need to stand vpon his reputation: which was already so confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed vnto feare, but rather deemed as part of his wisedome. He entertained the Consuls with many light skirmishes, & fought to take them at some aduantage; reseruing his owne numbers as full as he could, vnto a time of greater imployment. In this lingring manner of War, Marcellus took no pleasure: but sought to compell the Enemy to battaile, whether he would or no. The Admiral of the Roman fleet about Sicil, L. Cincius, was commanded again to assaile the Towne of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he began to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to go by Land to the assistance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behinde him. He laid an ambush in the way, between Tarentum and Locri, wherinto the Romans fell: and hauing lost aboue three thousand of their company, were well glad the rest of them, to quit their enterprise, and saue their owne liues within Tarentum. As for the Consuls, it was the desire of Hannibal, to waste their Armie by little and little: which to doe, he neglected no aduantage. There lay betweene him and them an Hillocke, ouer-growne with wood, that seemed fit to couer a number of men: who lying there vndiscerned, might fall vpon such, as should straggle from the Roman campe; and cut them off. Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom hee willed to keepe themselues close, and attend their best aduantage. To this piece of ground, the Consuls thought it fit to remoue their campe: Marcellus thinking that he neuer lay neere enough vnto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the son of Marcellus, a few Colonels, and other principall men: and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinel gaue warning of their approach to his fellows; who discouered not themselues, vntill they had surrounded the Consuls & their train. The Consuls, as necessity compelled them, defended themselues: hoping to be quickly relieued from their campe that was neere at hand. But the Hetrurians ran away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weake assistance of no more than forty horse-men, that were of the Colonie of Fregellæ. These Fregellans abode by the Consuls; and did what they could to haue brought them safe off. But when Marcellus was stricken thorow with a Lance, and fell downe dead; then began euery one to shift for himselfe, and escape as they might. Crispinus the other Consul, had his deaths wound, being stricken with two Darts; and young Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recouered their campe: The rest of the Colonels and Officers; together with the Lictors that carried the bundles of Rods and Axes before the Consuls, were all slaine or taken. To the dead body of the Consull Marcellus, Hannibal gaue honourable Funerall, according to the custome of those times: and bestowing his ashes in a siluer pot, couered it with a crown of gold; and so sent them to yong Marcellus to be by him interred, where he thought good,

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himselfe, how that the signet Ring of Marcellus was falne into the custody of Hannibal; who might vse it, to his owne purposes, ere that which had hapned were well knowne abroad. Wherefore he sent word vnto all the Towns about, that his Colleague was slaine, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wishing them in that regard, to giue no credit vnto any letters therewithall signed. This prouidence of Crispinus was not more than requisite. For his Messenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Messenger arriued there sent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and sealed with the captiue Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpose to come the same night vnto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garrison should be in a readinesse, for such imployment as he should thinke needfull. The deuice was plaine: and no lesse plaine was the reuengefull minde, which he bare against that Citie; because of his braue Numidian companies, that had therein beene betraied. The Salapians hereupon bethought themselues, how to take their Enemy in his owne snare. They sent back the Messenger, which was a Roman fugitiue; without letting him perceiue any signe of distrust in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readines, for the entertainment of such a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troupe of Roman fugitiues armed Roman-like, leading the way. These all talking Latine together, called vnto the Watch, and bade open the gate; for the Consul was there. The gate was opened faire and leisurely, and the Port-cullis drawne vp no higher than needs it must be, to let them enter. But when sixe hundred of them were gotten in, downe fell the Port-cullis againe: and they that thought to haue taken others, were taken themselues; being laide at on all hands by the Salapians, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus ouer-reached with this stratageme, hasted away to Locri; whereunto Cincius the Admirall of the Roman fleet about Sicil, did lay hard siege. The first appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantcurrors, made the Romans in all confused haste, run to their ships: leauing all their engines, and whatsoeuer was in their campe, to the enemies disposition.

The Roman Senate hearing of these accidents, sent vnto Crispinus the suruiuing Consul, & requested him to name a Dictator, that might take charge of the Cõmon-wealth, and dispatch the election of new Magistrates, with other businesse; whereunto himselfe was disabled by his hurts. He did so: and soone after died. Then was it thought needfull, that new Consuls should be chosen out of hand: forasmuch as two Roman Armies lay so neere vnto the enemy, without any Generall. Especially it was desired, that Election should be made of such men, as were not onely valiant, but well aduised: since the best, and most fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by losing himselfe so strangely, had giuen them a faire warning, not to commit their Armie vnto rash heads. Among those that stood for the Consulship, C. Claudius Nero, was the most eminent. He was of great Nobilitie, a good Souldier, and one, whose many seruices in this present warre, did forcibly commend vnto the place. Yet he seemed a little too violent; and one, whose temper needed the allay of a more staied wit. The fathers therefore endeauoured to ioyne vnto him in the Consulship M. Liuius: one that had borne the same Office, long before. This M. Liuius had beene Consul with L. Æmilius Paulus, in the yeere foregoing the beginning of this warre. After their Consulship, wherein they did good seruice, they had both of them beene called into iudgement by the People: and this Liuius condemned; Æmilius hardly escaping. Though it hath beene once already noted, yet I cannot forbeare to remember it againe: how it pleased God, to vpbraid the vnthankfull Romans, with the malicious iudgement, giuen by their multitude vpon honorable men. For in the battaile of Cannæ, it was apparant, what lamentable effects, the memorie of their iniustice wrought: when L. Æmilius rather chose to yeeld to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greatest ouerthrow that euer fell vpon the State of Rome, than by resisting the pernicious courses of Terentius Varro, to cast himselfe anew vpon the danger of the popular furie. As for M. Liuius, hee is euen now ready, and will so continue, to tell the People of their faults in a diuers manner. Eight yeeres together after his condemnation had he beene absent out of the Citie, and liued in his Countrie Grange; still vexing himselfe with the indignitie of his condemnation. Marcellus and Lauinus, being Consuls two or three yeeres agoe, had brought him into Rome: where he liued priuate in discontented sort, as might appeare, both both by his careleſneſſe in apparell, and by the wearing of his long haire & beard, which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Cenſors, to poll his haire, and come into the Senate: where he vſed to ſit ſilent, and ſignifie his aſſent or diſlike to what was propoſed, either in ſhort formall words, or in paſſing from ſide to ſide, when the houſe was diuided. At length it hapned, that in ſome buſineſſe weighrily concerning one that was his kinſman; he ſtood vp, & made a ſet ſpeech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had beene. The Senate was much altered ſince he had left it; many braue men were loſt; new ones were choſen; ſuch as rather ſerued to fill vp the number, than to anſwer to the dignitie of the place: and they that were left of ancient ſtanding, had euen ſpent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore, all began to ſay, that it was great pittie, ſo worthy and able a man, as this Liuius, had beene all this while forgotten; one, of whom the Common-wealth ſtood in great need, yet had not vſed in this dangerous warre. Now ſeeing that the Conſuls ought, one of them, to be choſen a Patrician, the other, of neceſſitie a Plebeian: and ſince, neither Fabius, nor Valerius Leuinus, being both of them Patricians, could be ioyned with Claudius Nero: euery one was of opinion, that there could not be choſen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Liuius. But Liuie would not endure to heare of this. He ſaid it was vnreaſonable, that one condemned as a diſhoneſt man, ſhould afterwards be choſen Ruler of the Citie. If they had done ill to truſt him with one Conſulſhip, what meant they then to offer him another? With theſe, and the like phraſes he reſiſted their deſires: till by perſwaſions, and examples rehearſed, of ſuch as had patiently digeſted iniuries done by the People, and repaied good for euill; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Emblem, with which Themiſtocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: reſembling himſelfe to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughs whereof men breake in faire weater; but run vnder it for ſhelter in a ſtorme. Such vnthankfulneſſe, to well-deſeruing men, is not rarely found in the outragious multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much vnlike, of Philip the ſecond King of Spaine his dealing with the Duke of Alua. For although he had committed the Duke to priſon, vpon ſome ſmall offence conceiued, without all regard of his former deſerts: yet when his intended conqueſt of Portugal, required the ſeruice of a man, more than ordinarily ſufficient; he ſtood no longer vpon the ſcanning of late diſpleaſures; but employed the ſame Duke, whom he had newly diſgraced. Thus is wiſedome often taught by neceſſitie.

It was a dangerous yeere toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Liuius were choſen Conſuls. Aſdrubal was already come into France, and waited onely, to haue the wayes of the Alpes thawed by warme weather, for his paſſage into Italy. The Romans vſed at this time the ſeruice of three and twenty Legions: and wanted not employment, for many more, if they had knowne how to leuie and maintaine them. Of theſe which they had, foure ſerued in Spaine, two in Sicil, and two in Sardinia: the reſt were ſo diſpoſed, in ſeuerall parts of Italy, where need ſeemed to require, that onely two Legions were left to eith of the Conſuls. But the Conſuls were men of execution: and would not be tied to the punctuall obſeruance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Liuius would not ſtirre out of Rome; againſt ſo mighty a power as followed Aſdrubal, vntill he had firſt obtained, that he might carry with him as many as could wel be ſpared from other imployments; and thoſe, or the moſt of them, choſen Companies. It was true, that two Legions, appointed to ſerue vnder Lucius Porcius a Pretor of that yeer, among the Ciſalpine Gaules, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Liuius; to whom the warre againſt Aſdrubal was allotted. So might alſo two other Legions, that were among the Salentines, neere vnto Tarentum, vnder another of the Pretors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Armie, that was ſent againſt Hannibal. Neuertheleſſe the Conſuls, by the eſpeciall inſtance of Liuie, did obtaine, that all might be left to their owne diſcretion. For newes came, that Aſdrubal was already paſſing the Alpes; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Countrey about Genua, with their Neighbour people, were in readineſſe to ioyne with him; and L. Porcius ſent word, that he would aduenture no further, than hee ſafely might. When all was ordered, as themſelues thought beſt, the two Conſuls went forth of the Citie, each his ſeuerall way. The People of Rome were now quite otherwiſe affected, than they had beene, when L. Æmilius Paulus and C. Terentius Varro, were sent against Hannibal. They did no longer take vpon them, to direct their Generals, or bid them dispatch, and winne the victorie betimes: but rather they stood in feare, least all diligence, wisedome and valour should proue too little. For since few yeeres had passed, wherein some one of their Generals had not beene slaine; and since it was manifest, that if either of these present Consuls were defeated, or put to the worst; the two Carthaginians would forthwith ioyne, and make short worke with the other: it seemed a greater happinesse than could be expected, that each of them should returne home Victor; and come off with honour, from such mightie opposition, as he was like to finde. With extream difficultie had Rome held vp her head, euer since the battaile of Cannæ: though it were so, that Hannibal alone, with little helpe from Carthage, had continued the warre in Italy. But there was now arriued another sonne of Amilcar; and one, that in his present Expedition, had seemed, a man of more sufficiencie than Hannibal himselfe. For, whereas in that long and dangerous march, through barbarous Nations, ouer great Riuers and Mountaines, that were thought vnpassable, Hannibal had lost a great part of his Armie: this Asdrubal, in the same places, had multiplyed his numbers; and, gathering the people that he found in the way, descended from the Alpes like a rowling Snow-bal, farre greater than he came ouer the Pyrenees at his first setting out of Spaine. These considerations and the like, of which feare presented many vnto them; caused the people of Rome, to wait vpon their Consulls out of the Towne; like a pensiue traine of Mourners: thinking vpon Marcellus and Crispinus, vpon whom in the like sort they had giuen attendance the last yeere; but saw neither of them returne aliue, from a lesse dangerous warre. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gaue his accustomed aduice to M. Liuius, that hee should abstaine from giuing, or taking battaile, vntill he well vnderstood the Enemies condition. But the Consul made him a froward answer, and said, That he would fight the very first day: for that he thought it long, till he should either recouer his honour by victory; or by seeing the ouerthrow of his owne vniust Citizens, satisfie himselfe with the ioy of a great, though not an honest, reuenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the ouerthrow that Asdrubal receiued in Spaine by Scipio, a little before he tooke his iourney into Italy; such mention hath already beene made, as agreed with the report of that noble Historian Liuie. Yet I thinke it not amisse to adde in this place, what may be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his historie concerning that accident. Asdrubal had wrestled with many difficulties in Spaine; by reason of those Captaines that were sent from the city of Carthage, to ioyne with him in the administration of that Prouince: they being, as it may seeme, of the Hannonian faction; which is to say, thus farre forth Traitors, that they preferred the aduantage of their own side, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthy sonne of Amilcar, and how they hindered his courses vndertaken, it cannot be knowne: since of those bookes, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled these matters, there are to vs remaining onely a few broken pieces. But by the spightfull dealing of Hanno in Sicil with Mutines, a better man of warre than himselfe, whom Hannibal had sent into the Iland: we may conceiue, that against the brother of Hannibal it was thought needefull, by these mischieuous Partizans of Hanno, to vse the violent opposition of more earnest malice. Neuertheless Asdrubal was a good Patriot: and therefore endured patiently such indignities, as Mutines could not long digest. His iourney into Italy being resolued vpon: hee lay with part of the Armie at Betula, not farre from the Mines of siluer; whence he was to furnish his expedition. Thither came Scipio: and draue him out of his Campe, though hee were strongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captaines could, or would, come to his assistance. The ouerthrow seemes not to haue beene so great, as it must haue beene supposed, if no way lay open to those that fled. Rather it appeares, that Asdrubal dealt like a prouident man, and seeing that his Campe was likely to be forced, sent away all his mony, with his Elephants before him: but staid behinde himselfe to sustaine the Romans awhile, vntill his carriages might be out of danger. Herein he had his desire. Afterwards, he gathered his broken troups together: and retyred in such sort, that Scipio thought it not good to pursue him, and so passed ouer Tagus. Then taking vnto him the forces assigned for his expedition, he marched away toward the Pirenees: leauing the care of Spaine vnto his brother Mago, and to Asdrubal the

the sonne of Gesco; that thought himselfe the fittest man for the administration thereof. Faine would Scipio haue stopped him on his iourney, by sending to defend against him the ordinary way of the Mountains. But whether Asdrubal tooke another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had set to keep the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard passages commonly sorts to no good effect) he was not letted in his voyage by any such impediment. Comming into Gaule, and following the steps of his brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, so well affected, either to him or to his mony, that no passages were defended against him, nor any sort of resistance made; but he, and his Armie, well entertained, and their number much increased, by accesse of such as were desirous to take his pay. Of these he had the better choyce: for that hee was driuen to Winter in their Countrie; whilest that the passages of the Alpes were closed vp with Ice and Snow. The Mountainers likewise, that had so greatly molested Hannibal in his iournie ouer the Alps; were easily won to take part with Asdrubal, when he trauailed through their Countrie. For these poore men, at the first comming of Hannibal, were verily perswaded, that it was his purpose to rob them of their cattaile; and to make spoyle of that little wealth, which they had painfully scraped together out of the desolate rocks. But now in processe of time, they were better informed. Therefore vnderstanding, that there were two mighty Cities, farre dis-ioyned asunder, which made warre vpon each other, by Land and Sea; and that the Alpes did onely lye in the way: they gladly condescended, to take their part in the fortune of the Inuaders. The like affection, vpon greater cause, was afterward found in the Cisalpine Gaules. The Ligurians also ioyned with Asdrubal: and so would the Hetrurians haue done; if he had arriued in their Countrie. There was no other Roman Armie neere, than L. Portius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great feare. Therefore did Asdrubal set vpon Placentia a Roman Colonie: in hope to make his comming the more terrible, by the destruction of that Towne. But there he lost a great deale of time, and finally was driuen to quit the enterprise: by vndertaking which, he gaue the Roman Consuls leisure to make ready for him; and caused his brother Hannibal (who vpon the first bruit of Asdrubal his so timely, and easily passing the Alpes, was about to leaue his wintring campes, and goe forth to meet with him) to sit still awhile, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haste.

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Consul, made what speed he could, to meet with Hannibal, and stop him from ioyning with his brother. He had about forty thousand foot, and fiue hundred horse: with which he daily offered battaile to the Carthaginians; & had of him the better in many skirmishes. Hannibal was once driuen to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Abulians, into the countrie of the Brutians, there to encrease his forces; which were otherwise too weak for the iourney intended. Afterward comming to Grumentum, a Towne of the Lucans; he there fought vnprosperously with Nero the Consul. Neuertheless he got off, and marched away to Venusia. But Nero followed him; and had there againe the better of him. Wherefore he was driuen to returne to Metapontum: where ioyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Army, he assaied againe to make way by force to his brother. So he passed onward, and came againe to Venusia, hauing Nero still at his heeles. Thence went he ouer the Riuer Aufidus to Canusium, where he sate downe, not farre from the place, in which he had obtained his most memorable victory. There also did Nero sit downe by him: and both of them rested, without making offer to fight. It seemed perhaps vnto Hannibal, who knew the Countrie very well; that his brother might, with little impediment, ouer-come the way to Canusium: where if he could once again deale with both the Consuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reason to hope for such another victory, as once he had gotten in the same open Countrie. If this had so falne out; Rome would haue beene vndone for euer. But the Carthaginians should not haue needed to wish any second victory, in the naked Campans about Cannæ; if such an Armie, as this which Asdrubal now brings, had come to second Hannibal, when he was in his full strength; and the Romans not able to keepe the field. Wherfore this worthy Generall had good reason afterward to say, that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the supply, did beate him out of Italy; which else no power of the Romans could haue done.

Whilest Nero waited vpon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Armie that was comming to their succour: he was aduertised of Asdrubal his approach; by Letters and Messengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. These gaue notice, that Asdrubal had left the siege of Placentia, and drew onwards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his brother; notwithstanding all opposition that could be made by Liuie the Consull. Of these newes Claudius Nero was nothing ioyfull. For if Hannibal could once be ioyned as head, vnto that great body of an Armie, which Asdrubal brought with him: it was most apparant, that howsoeuer the fortune of Rome should auoid, for the present, any great calamitie, yet the very continuance of so strong a warre at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithfull Associates, to faint vnder the burden; as twelue of the thirtie Roman Colonels had already done. Wherefore he resolued, that it were better to make any desperate aduenture, than to suffer the coniunction of two such malenolent Planets: whose pestilent influence, if not on the sudden, yet within few yeeres, was like to worke most lamentable effects. It seemed apparant, that his Colleague was vnable to stay the progresse of Asdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readinesse, that could doe seruice in such a needfull case; excepting those, that were already employed vnder the two Consuls. Hereupon he concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tye himselfe to his owne charge, which was the warre against Hannibal: but rather that it behoued him, to helpe where more necessity required; and to carry part of his forces vnto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet since the meeting of the two Carthaginian brethren, was farre more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth; it seemed the best way to put Fortune in trust, with that which was of the lesse importance. Sixe thousand foot, and a thousand horse he therefore tooke, that were the very choyce of his Armie: and making shew, as if he would onely step aside, to doe some small piece of seruice neere at hand; away he posted as fast as he could, to assist his fellow Consull. His Messengers ranne before him, to giue warning to all Townes by which hee was to passe, that they should bee ready to meet him, with victuals, and all other necessaries for his Armie. Liuius the other Consull, at that time, lay incamped, neere vnto Sena Gallica; and Asdrubal within halfe a mile of him. In sixe dayes Nero had finished his iourney thither; and when he drew neere, sent Messengers before him, to giue notice of his comming. Liuie thought it fittest that he should stay in some place of couert vntill darke night, and then enter secretly into the campe: lest the Enemie, perceiuing this accesse of strength, should accordingly frame his counsailes. This was done: and a token giuen, that the Colonels, Captaines, and all Souldiers, aswel horse as foot, that Nero had brought with him; should be lodged and entertained by men of their owne sort. Their Companie was somewhat increased by Voluntaries that ioyned with them on the way. Neuertheless, it was not needfull, that the Quarter which receiued them, should bee enlarged; since they had brought with them nothing but their armes. The next day they held a Counsaile of warre: wherein some were of opinion, that it was best for these new-arriued Companies, to refresh themselues a few dayes after their weary iournie, before they should be drawne forth to battaile. But against this, Nero was very earnest: and besought his Colleague, to make vse of him out of hand; that he might betimes returne to his owne Campe, ere Hanni... ...ould haue notice of his absence. The Souldiers also of Nero, were full of spirit; perceiuing that the honour of the victory was like to be theirs: forasmuch as the battaile would not haue beene vndertaken, without this their comming to helpe. Finally, it was agreed when the Counsaile brake vp, that the signe of battaile should be hung out; which was commonly a purple coate ouer the Generals pauilion.

Asdrubal was no lesse willing than the Romans to come to battaile, hauing long desired it, and hitherto not found occasion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Armie, to behold the Enemies countenance: it seemed to him, that they were more than they had beene; and some of their armes and horses looked as though they had wanted dressing, after a long iourney. Hereupon he began to with-draw his Armie backe into the Campe: and gaue order, that if no prisoners could be taken, by whom hee might be certified of the truth; yet should there good obseruation be made, whether the enemies campe were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might shew their forces to be increased. The camp, as hath beene said, was not extended: but the trumpet, that sounded onely once in the quarter of L. Porcius the Pretor, did now, contrary to former custome, sound twice in the

the quarter of Livius the Consul. Hereat Asdrubal greatly mused: and being well acquainted with the Roman orders, held this for a sure token, that the other Consul was there arriued. How this might be, if Hannibal were aliue, and in good case, he was not able to coniecture: but thought it the best way, to goe leisurely to worke, till he might be better informed. Vpon confidence in his owne forces, he had not cared hitherto, how neere he lay to the Romans; nor troubled himselfe perhaps with ouer-strongly fortifying his owne Campe. Yet when he now perceiued, that somewhat was fallen out beside his expectation, he changed his resolution, and held it no dishonour to remoue a little further off. So he dislodged secretly by night, intending to get ouer the Riuer Metaurus, whereby to keepe himselfe as long as he could, from necessity of battaile. But whether it were so, that his guides did steale away from him in the dark, so that he could not finde the way to the Foords; or whether his carriages were too heauy, and hindred his speed: farre he had not gone, ere the Consul Nero was at his heeles with all the Roman horse, and staied him from passing any further. Soone after came L. Porcius with the light armature: whom the other Consul followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and ready for battaile. Asdrubal, seeing himselfe ouertaken with necessity to fight; omitted no care and circumspection. His Gaules, in whom he reposed least confidence, he placed in his left wing vpon a Hill, which the Enemie should not, without much difficultie, be able to climbe: in the right wing he stood himselfe with his Africans & Spaniards; his Ligurians he placed in the midst; and his Elephants, he bestowed in the front of his battailes. On the Roman side, Nero had the leading of the right wing; Livius of the left, and Porcius of the battaile. Both Romans and Carthaginians well vnderstood, how much depended vpon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of safety there was vnto the vanquished. Onely the Romans herein seemed to haue had the better in conceit, and opinion; That they were to fight with men desirous to haue fled from them. And, according to this presumption, came Livius the Consul with a proud brauery, to giue charge on the Africans, by whom he was so sharply entertained, that the victory seemed very doubtfull. The Africans and Spaniards were stout Souldiers, and well acquainted with the maner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians also were a hardy Nation, and not accustomed to giue ground; which they needed the lesse, or were able now to doe, being placed in the midst. Livius therefore, and Porcius, found strong opposition: and with great slaughter on both sides, preuailed little or nothing. Besides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants, that brake their first ranks, and put them in such disorder, as the Roman Ensignes were driuen to fall backe. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vaine against a steepe Hill, was vnable to come to blowes with the Gaules, that stood opposite vnto him, but out of danger. This made Asdrubal the more confident; who seeing his owne left wing safe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impression on the other side, vpon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero perceiuing that the place wherein he stood, was such as would compell him to remaine idle till the fight were ended; took a part of his forces, and led them round behind the forces of Porcius and Livius: which hauing compassed, he fell vpon Asdrubal, and charged him in the flanke. Here began the victory to bee manifest on the Roman side. For Nero, finding none to resist him in front, ran all along the depth of Asdrubal his battaile: and falling vpon the skirts thereof, disordered the Enemies, and put all to rout. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on euery side, the greatest part was slaine. The Ligurians and Gaules escaped as they could, and saued themselues by timely flight. Of the Elephants, foure were taken aliue: the rest were slaine; some by the Enemies weapons, others by their owne guides that rode them. For when any of them, being sore wounded, began to waxe vnruly, and rush back vpon their own battailes following them: the guide had in readinesse a Mallet, and a Chizzell, wherewith he gaue them a stroke between the eares, in the ioynt of the neck, next vnto the head; wherewith he killed the beast vpon the sudden. This speedy way of preuenting such harme as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to doe to the squadrons following them, is said to haue been the deuice of Asdrubal himselfe, who dyed in this battaile.

Great commendations are giuen to Asdrubal, both by Polybius, and by Livie. He is said at all times to haue shewed himselfe worthy of Amilcar his father, and Hannibal his brother: to haue striuen with great patience, against many difficulties; whereinto hee fell by the meanes of those Captains that were sent from Carthage into Spain; to haue performed in this last battaile all duties of a worthy Generall; and finally when he saw the losse irreparable, to haue ridden manfully into the thickest of his Enemies; where, fighting brauely, he was slaine. Of the number that died with him in this battaile, the report of Liuie, and of Polybius, doe very much disagree. For Liuie saith, that the Carthaginians had no lesse an ouerthrow, than was that, which they gaue to the Romans at Cannæ; that fiftie sixe thousand of them were slaine, fiue thousand and foure hundred taken prisoners; and aboue foure thousand Roman Citizens, whom they had captiues with them, deliuered, and set at libertie. He saith also, that of the Romans and their Associates there were slaine eight thousand: and of the bootie, that it was exceeding great; not onely in other kindes, but in gold and siluer. Concerning the bootie; Polybius hath no mention of it. Likely it is to haue been as rich as Liuie reporteth it; for Asdrubal came well-stored with money. But Polybius (who had no desire to make this battaile of Metaurus, a parallel vnto that of Cannæ) reports no more than about ten thousand of the Carthaginian side, and two thousand of the Roman, to haue bin slaine. The number of the prisoners he doth not mention: but only saith, That some of the Carthaginian Princes were taken aliue; and that all the rest died in the battaile. Wherby it may seeme that they were all Barchines: forasmuch as they preferred the honour of themselues, and of their country, aboue their liues.

The ioy of this victory was no lesse in Rome, than had been the feare of the euent. For euer since it was knowne in what sort Nero had left his Army; the whole City was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his comming thither. Men thought it strange, that the Consull should make such a great aduenture, as thus to put the one half of all the Roman forces, vnto hazard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal should chance to haue notice of this his departure; and either pursue him, or set vpon the Army that staied behinde, much weakened, and without a Generall? Thus did they talke; yet reseruing their censure vnto the successe; with liberty to approue or condemne, according to the issue. In the meane time the people filled the Market-place; the Women ranne to the Temples, with Vowes and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in counsaile, waiting stil ready at hand vpon the Magistrates, as if some great matter were likely to fal out, that would aske euery ones helpe. In briefe, they were all so full of melancholy, that when first newes of the victorie came, there were not many that would beleeue it. Afterwards when Messengers arriued from the Consuls, with Letters containing all that had passed: there was not onely great and ioyfull concourse of all sorts of men vnto the Temples, but the very face of the City was altered; and men from thenceforth began to follow their priuate businesse; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborn to doe) and attending their owne affaires in such wise, as if Hannibal were already driuen out of Italy.

Nero returning to his campe, threw forth openly the head of Asdrubal before the Carthaginians: and producing his African prisoners bound; sent two of them looseto giue Hannibal notice of what had hapned. These two prisoners might haue serued well enough to certifie Hannibal of the misaduenture, without doing wrong to the dead body of Asdrubal: especially since Hannibal, in honourable, and farre different manner, had giuen buriall to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea to all the Roman Generals, whose carkasses fell into his hands. But it may seeme, that howsoeuer the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous disposition, which was found among the Romans, in their loue vnto the Common-weale: yet in dealing with enemies, they were far more ciuill, and lesse prone to the insolency of reuenge. The best excuse of this outrage done by Nero, is, that he hoped much more by the sudden terrour of such a spectacle, than by the simple relation of that which had passed, to make a deep impression of feare into the Carthaginians. It may also be said, That he forgot himselfe, being ouer-ioyed with the greatnesse of his prosperity. For it was the battaile of Metaurus that weighed downe the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the loweſt Ebbe, ceased not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks; Hannibal hauing lost in this vnhappy fight (besides that worthy Gentleman his Brother) all the hope that so long sustained him in Italy, with-drew himselfe into the Countrie of the Brutians: and thither he caused all the Lucans that were of his partie to remoue; as likewise all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted men to defend ſo many places as he held at the preſent, becauſe they lay too farre aſunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a leſſer compaſſe in the vtmoſt corner of Italy; it being a country of much faſtneſſe, and the people exceedingly deuoted to his ſeruice. In this buſineſſe Nero gaue him no memorable impediment: either becauſe Hannibal was too ſtrong for him, hauing all his forces vnited; or becauſe it is likely that this remoue of the Lucans & Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their harueſt was gathered in: at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Liuius the other Conſul taried among the Ciſalpine Gaules vntill the end of Summer; there to ſet things in ſuch order as he thought requiſite: which done, he wrote vnto the Senate, that there was no more need of him and his Army in that Prouince, but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well diſcharge the place. For this cauſe, he deſired leaue to returne home; and that he might bring his Army vvith him. The Senate well vnderſtood his meaning: which was, to haue the honour of triumph, as he well deſerued. But foraſmuch as it was well knowne, what intereſt Nero had in the late victory: order was giuen, that not onely Liuie with his Armie ſhould come home; but likewiſe Nero, though leauing his Armie behind him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pompe whereof Liuie made the greater ſhew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers; becauſe in his Prouince, and vpon his day of command, the victory was gotten: his Armie alſo being preſent at the triumph. But Nero that rode on horſe-backe, and without ſuch attendance, was the more extolled by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victory vvas in a manner wholly aſcribed vnto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Cæcilius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generals, the due acknowledgment of their good ſeruice. For they were commended vnto the People, as men worthy to be choſen Conſuls: and Conſuls they were choſen for the yeer following. But nothing was done by them, worthy of memory in their Conſulſhip. Neither indeed from this yeer, which vvas the thirteenth of the preſent warre, vntill the eighteenth yeere wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italy; ſaue only the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by ſurpriſe. For Hannibal wanted ſtrength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little minde to prouoke him; but thought it well that he was quiet. Such opinion had they conceiued of him, that though all about him went to ruine; yet in him alone they thought there was force enough to hold himſelfe vpright. And ſurely very notable are the commendations giuen vnto him by Polybius, vvhom Liuie therein followes: That making warre vpon a People, of all other the moſt warlike, he obtained ſo many victories by his owne good conduct: and that leading an Army, compounded of ſo many ſundry Nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gaules, Carthaginians, Italians, and Greeks; which were, neither in Language, Lawes, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; he held them all in ſuch good order, that they neuer fell to ſedition among themſelues, or againſt their Generall. But that which Liuie addes hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he ſuſtained his Army, without help from other places, from this time forward, vpon the hungry ſoile of the Brutians: which, when it was beſt manured in time of peace, could hardly ſuffice to nouriſh the Inhabitants. It is therefore apparant, that by his proper worth and vertue, he kept his Armie in ſuch order and obedience, rather than by any greatneſſe of reward and bootie: ſince, after the death of Aſdrubal, he made no inuaſion vpon the wealthier parts of Italy; but held himſelfe ſtill among the poore Brutians. Where we muſt leaue him, vntill he be drawne into Africk by Scipio; whoſe doings will henceforth entertaine, and leade vs, vnto the end of this Warre.

§. I.

How the Carthaginians were driuen by Scipio from the Continent into the Iſle of Gades.

Mago and Aſdrubal the ſonne of Geſco took vpon them the charge of Spain, when Aſdrubal the ſonne of Amilcar departed thence into Italy. Theſe agreed together, that Mago ſhould make a voyage to the Baleares; there to leuie a ſupply of men;

men: and Asdrubal with-draw himself into Lusitania (which is now Portugal) vvhither the Romans had ill meanes to follow; being altogether vnacquainted in those parts. Mago had soon ended his businesse, and returned into Spaine: vvhere he met with one Hanno (the same perhaps that had lately bin imployed in Sicil) who brought new forces out of Africk, & came to succeed in place of Asdrubal the Barchine. It is not vnlikely that Spaine was now the better, and more readily furnished with men, and all things needfull from Carthage; when that sonne of Amilcar, vvhose authority had been greatest, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approue it selfe, against that noble race of Warriours; when it should appeare, that things did prosper much the better by being left vnto the handling of other men. Whether it were vpon desire to make good some such opinion raised of him at home, or whether vpon confidence in the forces that he brought ouer: Hanno took the field, and led Mago with him; as purposing afresh to set vpon the Romans. So he entred into the country of the Celtiberians, not very far from new Carthage: where, by mony, and other perswasions, he leuied aboue nine thousand men.

P. Scipio in the meane while contained himselfe in the Easterne parts of Spaine: attentiue, as it may seeme, to the proceedings of Asdrubal the sonne of Amilcar; against whom, he is reported by some Writers to haue sent part of his forces into Italy, to the assistance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Liuius the Consuls. But hearing of the leuie made by Hanno and Mago, among the Celtiberians: he sent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten thousand foot and fiue hundred horse. Syllanus got intelligence by some fugitiue Celtiberians, who became his guides, that their Countrimen incamped apart from the Carthaginians in great disorder: as men fearing no danger, because they were at home. Wherefore as closely as he was able, he drew neer to these Celtiberians: & falling vpon them on the sudden, gaue them such an ouerthrow, that Hanno and Mago comming to their succour, in stead of heartening & re-inforcing them, became partakers of the losse. Mago saued himselfe with all the horse, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thousand: and in ten daies iourny brought them safe to Asdrubal. The rest of the Africans were either slaine or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill lucke to be taken prisoner; though he kept himselfe out of the fight vntill all was lost. As for the Celtiberians, they knew better how to make shift; and saued most of themselues by running into the vvoods.

It could no otherwise be, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherin Italy stood, by the comming thither of Asdrubal. Ten thousand foot and eighteen hundred horse he did therefore send out of Spain (as it is reported by some Authors) to the defence of his owne Countrie: or was perhaps about to send them; and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intentiue to the necessity and successe of his Countrimen at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Metaurus, which fell out long before the end of the Summer, then might he well aduenture, to take in hand the intire conquest of Spain; which must needs be much alienated from the Carthaginians, by the report of such an ouerthrow. The Spanish Souldiers that serued vnder Hannibal, and those that had bin sent ouer into Africke; were as pledges heretofore, by whom their country was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noysed abroad, That all which had followed Asdrubal into Italy, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his Army was closed vp in a streight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly behoue the Spaniards to conforme themselues vnto the will of the Victors. That it was the successe of things in Italy, which gaue such confidence vnto Scipio; it is the more probable, because he took not this great enterprise in hand, vntill the Summer was almost spent. Asdrubal therefore vsed the benefit of the season; and by disposing his Armie into many Garrisons; hindred the Enemy from doing any great exploit before Winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the yeere, caused Scipio to returne backe: without any other matter performed, than that his Brother L. Scipio took by assault the Towne of Oringis.

Against the next yeers danger, Asdrubal prepared a great Army: and spared not cost, nor trauaile, in strengthening himselfe, for the triall of his last fortune in Spaine. With seuenty thousand foot, foure thousand horse, and two and thirty Elephants, he took the field: which number I beleeue, that he could hardly haue raised, without boldly denying the truth of those reports that came from Italy. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weake to incounter with ſuch a multitude. Wherefore he iudged it needfull to vſe the helpe of his Spaniſh friends. But the death of his Father and Vncle, that were caſt away by the treaſon of ſuch falſe Auxiliaries, made him on the other ſide very doubtfull of relying vpon thoſe, that might perhaps betray him in his greateſt need. Yet ſince one Colchas, that was Lord of eight and twenty towns, had promiſed him the laſt Winter, to raiſe three thouſand foot, and fiue hundred horſe for his ſeruice: he reſolued to make vſe of thoſe, and ſome few others, that might helpe to make a ſhew; and yet not be able to doe any great harme, if they would reuolt. So with fiue and forty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, he ſought out the Enemy; neer vnto whom he incamped. At his firſt comming, Mago and Maſaniſſa fell vpon him; vvith hope to take him vnprepared, whileſt he was making his lodgings. But he layde certain troups of horſe in couert: which breaking vpon them vnexpected, cauſed them to fall off. They made at firſt an orderly retreat: but being more hardly preſſed, they ſhortly betooke themſelues to plaine flight. After this incounter, which added ſome courage to the Romans, and abated the preſumption of the Carthaginians, there were daily skirmiſhes between the horſe and light armature, on both ſides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Aſdrubal drew forth his Armie, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to ſhew that he durſt fight, yet not proceeding any farther. Thus they continued many daies: Aſdrubal being ſtill the firſt that iſſued forth in the morning; and the firſt that, in the euening, withdrew himſelfe into his Trenches. The Spaniſh Auxiliaries were placed on both ſides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midſt, with their Elephants before them; and oppoſite to theſe on the other ſide were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at farre diſtance, many daies together: it grew to be the common opinion, that they ſhould ſhortly meet in the ſame forme; and be matched on each part, with the Enemies long before deſigned. But Scipio when he purpoſed indeed to fight, altered the forme of his Armie; and withall, came forth earlier than he had beeu wont. He cauſed his men and horſes, to be well fedde betimes in the morning before day: and then ſent forth his horſe and light armature, to traine out the Carthaginians with their bellies empty: vſing herein the ſame tricke, whereby he might remember that Hannibal had beaten his father in the battaile of Trebia. His Roman Legions he beſtowed in the wings; his Spaniards, in the battaile. Aſdrubal ſent forth his horſe in all haſte, to entertaine the Romans; whileſt he himſelfe arranged his men, in their wonted order, at the Hill foot, vpon which hee encamped. In the skirmiſhes of the horſe it could not bee diſcerned which part had the better: ſince being ouer-preſſed on either ſide, they had a ſafe retrait vnto their foote; and one troupe ſeconding another by courſe, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: becauſe his men, hauing well fed themſelues, were like to hold out better than the Enemie. But about noone he cauſed his wings to aduance a good pace; leauing their battaile of Spaniards far behinde them, that came on leiſurely, according to direction. The Spaniſh Mercenaries that ſtood in Aſdrubal his wings, were no way comparable, ſaue only in number, to the Latine and Roman Souldiers, that came againſt them; for they were freſh Souldiers, leuied in haſte; and fighting onely in reſpect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flanke, at the ſame time, by the Roman Velites, and by ſome cohorts, that were appointed to wheele about for the ſame purpoſe, they were ſorely preſſed; and with much difficultie made reſiſtance. The Carthaginians would faine haue ſuccoured them; but that they durſt not ſtir out of their places, becauſe of the Spaniſh battell which was comming againſt them; though it were as yet farre off. Thus the beſt part of Aſdrubal his Armie ſtood idle, vntill the wings were broken. For, had he aduentured to meet with the Spaniards, hee muſt haue caſt himſelfe into the open ſpace that lay before him betweene the Roman wings: to the depth whereof when hee had arriued, he ſhould haue found himſelfe incloſed in ſuch ſort, as was the Conſull Paulus at the battaile of Cannæ. Wherefore he did onely imploy his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harm to his Enemies, than to his Friends. When they were chaſed with wounds, they could no longer be ruled by their guides: but ran, as chance led them, and troubled both parts; or thoſe perhaps the more, that were the more vnwilling to kill them. In proceſſe of the fight, the Romans, who had well refreſhed their bodies in the morning, endured luſtie; when the others began to faint with trauell and heate of the day,

Where-

Wherefore perceiuing their aduantage, they followed it the more hotly: and gaue not ouer, till they had forc't the enemy to change his pace, and run from him. Asdrubal did his best to haue made an orderly retrait; and afterward againe, to haue caused his men turne head, at the Hill foot, But the Romans would not suffer the victory to be so extorted from them: neither was it easie to put fresh courage into the vanquished, led de by the obstinate passion of feare, which hearkens to no perswasion. The Campe of Asdrubal had that day beene taken; if a storme of raine, which fell violently on the sodden, and bred some superstition in the Romans, had not caused them to giue ouer.

The same night Asdrubal gaue no rest to his men: but caused them, hungry, and ouer-laboured as they were, to take paines in fortifying the Campe; wherin he feared to be assaulted. But little assurance could he haue in the strength of his Trenches, when he had lost the hearts of his Spanish Souldiers. One Attanes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his subiects: many followed this example; and soone after, two strong Townes were yeelded vp to Scipio, and the Garrisons betraied. It seemes that the peruerse fortune of this late battaile, whereupon Asdrubal had set his rest, bred in the Spaniards a disposition, to beleeue the more easily those reports which they heard from Italy. For henceforward, they neuer did good office to the Carthaginians. Asdrubal, perceiuing this, withdrew himselfe, and marched away faster than an ordinary pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning, & ouertaking the Carthaginians with his horse, caused them so often to make stand, that they were at length attached by the Roman Legions. Here began a cruell slaughter: for there was no resistance made, but all fell to rout, saue onely seuen thousand that with Asdrubal himselfe recouered a very strong piece of ground, which they fortified in hast. The place he made shift a while to defend: but wanting there necessaries to sustain himself long, he was forsaken by some of those few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherfore he resolued to make shift for one; and stealing from his Company by night away to the Sea-side, that was not farre thence; he tooke shipping, and set saile for Gades. When Scipio vnderstood that Asdrubal was thus gone, he left Syllanus with ten thousand foot, & a thousand horse, to besiege their Campe (which was not taken in haste, for Mago and Masanissa staied in it) whileſt he with the rest of the Armie did what was needfull in the Countrie abroad. It was not long, ere Mago and Masanissa followed Asdrubal to Gades: and their Army dispersed it selfe; some flying ouer to the Romans; others taking what way they liked. So vpon all the Continent of Spaine, there were onely three Towns left, Illiturgi, Castulo, and Astapa, that made continuance of warre against the Romans: of which onely Castulo had a Carthaginian garrison; consisting of such as had saued themselues by flight in the late ouerthrows. Hereby it seems, that the report of those Historians was ill grounded, who said, that Castulo yeelded long since vnto the Romans; though Hannibal took a wife in that citie. For this was one of the last three towns that held out on the Carthaginian side. Illiturgi had sometimes been inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their deuotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipio's, following too earnestly the Carthaginian fortune; it not onely rebelled, but with great cruelty betraied and slue, the poor men that escaped thither from the ouerthrows. Astapa was a town that still adhered to the Carthaginians; and, which was worse, had thriuen by the spoyle of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not vntill the next yeer) Scipio went against these, and took himselfe Illiturgi and Castulo: Illiturgi by assault, and with a generall slaughter of the Inhabitants; Castulo, by treason of one Cerdubellus. Astapa was taken by Lucius Marcius; or rather destroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raised in the Market-place: wherinto was throwne all the gold, and siluer, with whatsoeuer else was precious; the women and children standing by it vnder a sure guard, that should kill and burne them if the Romans got into the Towne. This prouision being made, all the Inhabitants that could beare Armes, rushed forth desperately, and fell vpon the Roman camp; where striuing beyond their power, they were euery one slaine. Then was the Towne forth-with set on fire, by those that had taken charge to doe it: & many of the Romans consumed with the flame; whileſt they rushed ouer-hastily to catch the gold and siluer, which they saw lying on the pile ready to melt.

Asdrubal, being beaten into the Iland of Gades, found no cause of long stay there: but returned home to Carthage, with seuen Gallies; leauing Mago behind him, to wait vpon occasion, occaſion, if any ſhould be offered. He viſited in his way home, Syphax, king of the Maſæſili, a people of the Numidians; hoping to win him to the friendſhip of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his euill Angel, in the kings Port: who landing at the ſame time, caried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio, hauing driuen the Carthaginians out of Spain, did forthwith bethinke himſelfe, how to finiſh the war, by putting them to the like diſtreſſe in Africke. Hereunto it ſeemed that the help of Syphax would be much auaileable: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and ſuſtained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might eaſily be moued to ſeeke reuenge. He had alſo bin beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that ſent him ouer a Captaine into Africk; vvho inſtructed him ſo well in marſhalling his forces, as hethereby often became victorious. Vpon theſe reaſons the Numidian King ſent Embaſſadors to Rome, and made league with the citie in time of great extremitie. So that hereby P. Scipio conceiued hope of laying a good foundation to the vvar, which he intended in Africk; vpon the friendſhip of this ill Neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cauſe he ſent ouer C. Lelius his Embaſſador, to deale with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italy, and had nothing now at all to doe in Spaine, eaſily perſwaded the king to take part with thoſe that had the better, and vvere without queſtion his better friends. Onely Syphax requeſted that the Roman Generall ſhould viſite him in perſon, to conclude the League; by which he was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treatie. Hereto Scipio condeſcended; thinking the friendſhip of ſo great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not farre diſtant from Spaine, well worthy of the aduenture. So with two Quinquereme Gallies he tooke Sea: and arriued in the kings Port, at the ſame time, with Aſdrubal. This would haue been very dangerous to him, had he been deſcried by his enemies further at Sea: but in the Hauen they forbare to make offer one vpon the other. Syphax might well be proud; ſeeing at one time, two ſuch Captaines of two moſt powerfull cities, came to deſire his friendſhip. He would haue brought them to treat of peace: but the Roman excuſed himſelfe, by vvant of ſuch Commiſſion from the Senate. He feaſted them together: and ſhortly diſmiſſed Scipio, with whom he readily entred into Couenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

Scipio returning into Spaine, and reſting that winter, tooke vengeance the next yeere, vpon thoſe of Illiturgi, Caſtulo, and Aſtapa, as hath been ſaid before. The Conqueſt of the Country being then in a manner at an end; he performed at new Carthage, with great ſolomnity, ſome Vowes that he had made; and honoured the memory of his Father and Vncle, with funerall games, eſpecially of thoſe that fought at ſharp, according to the maner of the times. Neither was it needfull, that he ſhould trouble himſelfe with preparing ſlaues for that ſpectacle, to hazard their liues, as was vſed in the citie of Rome: for there were enow, that either offred themſelues as voluntaries, or were ſent from their Princes; to giue proofe in ſingle combat, of the valour that was in their ſeuerall Countries. Some alſo there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwiſe end, agreed to refer the deciſion of their Controuerſies, to triall of the ſword, in ſingle fight. Among theſe, the moſt eminent, were Corbis and Orſua, Coſen-germans: that contended for the principalitie of a Town called Ibes. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers ſonne: wherfore he claimed the Lordſhip, as eldeſt of the houſe, after the maner of our Iriſh Taniſtry. But the father of Orſua ſtood lately ſeized of the Principality: which though himſelf receiued by the death of his elder brother; yet this his ſonne would not let it goe backe, but claimed to hold it as heire vnto his father, & old enough to rule. Faine would Scipio haue compounded the matter. But they anſwered peremptorily, That all their friends, and kindred, had already laboured in vaine, to take vp that quarrell; and that neither God, nor Man, but onely Mars, their God of battaile, ſhould be Vmpire between them. So they had their wills: and the elder, who was alſo the ſtronger, and more skilfull at his weapon, eaſily vanquiſhed the foole-hardineſſe of the yonger.

Such combats haue beene very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kinde of fight. We reade of many performed before the Warre of Troy; by Theseus, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as also of two more at the Warre of Troy, the one betweene Paris and Menelaus, the other, between Hector and Aiax. Neither want there examples of them among the Hebrewes: whereof that between Dauid and Goliah; and others performed by some of Dauids Worthies, against those that challenged them, are greatly celebrated. Vnto the same kinde appertaines the fight, betweene twelue of the Tribe of Iuda, and as many of the Beniamites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principal, in which they ventured their Dominion vpon the heads of three brethren the Horatii, against the three brethren Curatii that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after, of Valerius Corninus with two Champions of the Gauls, which challenged any Roman; were of lesse importance, as hauing only reference to brauery. In England there was a great Combat fought between Edmond Ironside, and Canutus the Dane, for no lesse matter than the Kingdome. The vse of them was very frequent in the Saxon-times; almost vpon euery occasion, great or small. In the reigne of Edward the third, who sustained the party of Mountfort against the Earle of Bloys contending for the Duchie of Britain; there was a fight, for honor of the Nations, between thirty of the Britons, & thirty English: two of which English, were Caluerlie a braue Captaine; and that Sir Robert Knolles, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French wars, and did highly honour his bloud, wherof the Lord Knolles is descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English, French, and Italian Histories. Most of them haue been combats of brauery, and of gayeté de cœur, as the French terme it; for honour of seuerall Nations; for loue of Mistresses; or whatsoeuer else gaue occasion vnto men, desirous to set out themselues. But besides those of this sort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either vpon accusation for life, or vpon triall of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. And of this latter kinde, was that, of which we spake euen now, betweene Corbis and Orsua. Vnto these (me thinks) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat vpon Wager; such as were that between Dauid and Goliah, or that between the Horatii and Curatii: in which, without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one ouer the other, is aduentured vpon the head of Champions. Vpon an accusation for life, there was a combat appointed between the Lord Henrie of Boulinbrook Duke of Hereford, & Moubray Duke of Norfolke. There was a combat performed by Sir Iohn Anstey and one Cattrington: whom Anstey charged with treason: and proued it vpon him by being victorious. The like was fought between Robert of Mountfort, and Henrie of Essex. The like also, between a Nauarrois, & one Welch of Grimsby, whom the Nauarrois accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that he had belied him, and was therefore drawne and hanged. Whether our triall by battell doe determine, that the false accuser, if hee bee vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had beene due to the offender, if the accusation had beene proued; I cannot affirme. But wee euery where finde, That if he which is accused of treason, or, according to the customs of Normandy, of Murder, Rape, or burning of places (offences punished by death) be ouercome, Hee shall suffer the paines appointed for those crimes. In combats for triall of right, it is not so: neither is the Apellant or Defendant bound to fight in person, but he may try it by his Champion, as did Paramour and Low, or offred to doe, in the reigne of Queen Elizabeth. And in this case, hee that is beaten, or yeeldeth, loseth onely his cause, not his life. Neither are the combats, vpon accusation, or triall of right, fought in open field, as are those of brauerie; but in Campe close, that is, within tailes. Now this triall by combat was so ordinary in France, before the time of S. Lewis and Philip the faire his grand-child, as euery Lord of Fee, Ecclesiasticall or Temporall, had power to grant it within his owne Iurisdiction. And it seemeth, that the French kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the * Memorialls of the Chamber of Accounts, is found an Article to this effect: That if a Combat were once accepted, and after, by consent of the Lord, were taken vp, each of the parties should pay two shillings sixe pence; but if it were performed, then should the party vanquished forfeit an hundred and twelue shillings. And vpon this custome grew the French Prouerbe, which they vse when as any man hath had an hard and vniust iudgement; saying, That he was tryed by the Law of Loray, or Berne; qu'le batu paye l'amende, where he that is beaten giues the recompence. Of these frequent trials trials by battaile, that great learned man Ivo, Bishop of Chartres, did often complain, & specially against the French Church-men: as appeares by his letters to the Bishop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Archbishop of Sens, and to others; wherein he rebukes the indgement of their Churches, that had ratified such challenges of combat. But this liberty and kinde of triall, was retrenched by S. Lewes, and Philip the saint, so that no man could decree, or grant it, saue the king himselfe. It hath since been granted, though more sparingly, by the French kings, as to the Lord of Carouges against Ingues le Gris; and to Iulian Romero the Spaniard, against Mero, his countriman: wherein Sir Henry Knevet, Father of the Lord Knevet now liuing, was Patron to Romero that had the victory; and lastly to the Lord of Chalu. Now in those challenges, vpon accusation of Treason, Murder, or other offence deserving death (and in those onely) the rule held, That le defendeur estoit tenu de proposer ses deffenses per vne dementir; The defendant was bound to plead not guilty, by giuing the accuser the Lie: otherwise it vvas concluded, that the Defendant did taisiblement confesser le crime; silently confesse the crime. But after such time as Francis the French king, vpon some dispute about breach of Faith, had sent the Lie vnto the Emperour Charles the fift, thereby to draw him to a personall combat; euery petty Companion in France, in imitation of their Master, made giuing of the Lie mortalitie it selfe; holding it a matter of no small glory, to haue it said, That the meanest Gentleman in France, would not put vp, what the great Emperor Charles the fift had patiently indured.

From this beginning is deriued a challenge of combat, grounded vpon none of those occasions that were knowne to the Ancient. For, the Honour of Nations, the Triall of Right, the Wager vpon Champions, or the Obiection and Refutation of capitall offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of halfe so many Duels, as are founded vpon meere priuate Anger, yea or vpon matter seeming worthy of anger in the opinion of the Duellists. So that in these daies, wherein euery man takes vnto himselfe a Kingly liberty, to offer, accept, and appoint personall combats, the giuing of the Lie, which ought to bee the Negation onely in accusations for life, is become the most fruitfull root of deadly quarrels. This is held a word so terrible, and a wrong so vnpardonable, as will admit no other recompence, than the bloud of him that giues it. Thus the fashion, taken vp in haste by the French Gentlemen, after the pattern of their king, is growne to be a custome: whence we haue deriued a kind of Art and Philosophie of quarrell; with certaine grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are deduced. Yea there are (among many no lesse ridiculous) some so mysticall curiosities herein, as that it is held a farre greater dishonour, to receiue from an enemy a slight touch with a Cane, than a sound blow with a Sword: the one, hauing relation to a slaue, the other, to a Souldier. I confesse that the difference is pretty: though for my owne part, if I had had any such Italianated enemy in former times, I should willingly haue made with him such an exchange; and haue giuen him the point of honour to boot.

But let vs examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lie; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the most tender in receiuing it. I say, that the most of these, who present death on the points of their swords to all that giue it them; vse nothing so much in their conuersation and course of life, as to speake and sweare falsly. Yea it is thereby, that they shift and shuffle in the World, and abuse it. For how few are there among them, which, hauing assumed & sworne to pay the monies & other things they borrow, doe not breake their word and promise, as often as they ingage it? Nay, how few are there among them that are not Lyers by Record, by being sued in some Court or other of Iustice, vpon breach of word, or bond? For he which hath promised that he will pay money by a day, or promised any thing else, wherein he faileth; hath directly lyed to him, to whom the promise hath been made. Nay, what is the profession of loue that men make now-a-daies? What is the vowing of their seruice, and of all they haue, vsed in their ordinary complements, and (in effect) to euery man whom they bid but good morrow, or salute, other than a courteous and court-like kinde of lying? It is (saith a wise French-man, deriding therein the Apish custome of his Country) vne marchè & complot soit ensemble se mocquer, mentir, & piper les vns les autre; A kinde of merchandise, and complot made among them, to mocke, belye, and deride each other: and so farre now-a-daies in fashion, and in vse; as he that vseth it not, is accounted either dull, or Cynicall. True it is notwithstanding (omitting the old distinction) that there is great difference betweene these mannerly and complement-all lies, with those which are sometime perswaded by necessity vpon breach of promise; and those which men vse out of cowardise & feare: the latter confessing themselues to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other stiled the most villanous. But now for the Lie it selfe, as it is made the subiect of all our deadly quarrels in effect: to it I say, That whosoeuer giueth another man the Lie, when it is manifest that he hath lied, doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more hainously taken, than to tell him, hee hath broken any promise which he hath otherwise made. For he that promiseth any thing, tels him, to whom he hath promised, that he will performe it; and, in not performing it, hee hath made himselfe a Lier. On the other side, He that giues any man the Lie, when he himselfe knowes that he, to whom it is giuen, hath not lied; doth therein giue the Lie directly to himselfe. And what cause haue I, if I say that the Sunne shines when it doth shine; and that another fellow tells me I lie, for it's midnight; to prosecute such an one to death, for making himselfe a foolish Ruffian, and a Lier in his owne knowledge? For he that giues the Lie in any other dispute, than in defence of his Loyaltie, or Life, giues it impertinently, and Ruffian-like. I will not deny but it is an extreame rudenesse to taxe any man in publike with an vntruth: (if it be not pernicious, and to his preiudice against whom the vntruth is vttered:) but all that is rude, ought not to bee ciuillized with death. That were, more to admire and imitate a French custome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the counsaile of God. But you will say, that these discourses sauour of cowardize. It is true, if you call it cowardize to feare God or hell: whereas he that is truely wise, and truely valiant, knowes that there is nothing else to be feared. For against an Enemies sword, we shall finde ten thousand seuen-penie-men (waged at that price in the wars) that feare it as little, or perchance lesse, than any profest Sword-man in the world. Diligentissima in tutela sui Fortitudo; Fortitude is a diligent preseruer of it selfe. It is (saith Aristotle) a mediocritie betweene doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyrem pœna: sic nec fortem pugna; sed causa; As it is not the punishment that makes the Martyr: so it is not fighting that declares a valiant man; but fighting in a good cause. In which, whosoeuer shall resoluedly end his life, resoluedly in respect of the cause, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countrie: as hee may iustly bee numbred among the Martyrs of God; so may those that die with malicious hearts, in priuate combats, be called the Martyrs of the Deuill. Neither doe wee indeed take our owne reuenge, or punish the iniuries offered vs, by the death of the iniurious. For the true conquest of reuenge is, to giue him, of whom we would be reuenged, cause to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death vpon our owne consciences; Animasq; in vulnere ponere; And to drowne our soules in the wounds and bloud of our enemies. Hereupon you will againe aske me, if I condemne, in generous and noble spirits, the defence of their honors, being prest with iniuries? I say that I doe not, if the iniuries be violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the eternall Law: and the Lawes of all Christian Kings and States; doe fauour him that is assailed, in the slaughter of the assailant. You will secondly aske me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentleman, being challenged by Cartel by one of like quality, be not bound in point of honor to satisfie the challenger in priuate combat? I answer, that he is not: because (omitting the greatest, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrary and opposite to that, which they call the point of honour; the Law which hath dominion ouer it, which can iudge it, which can destroy it; except you will stile those Acts honourable, where the Hang-man giues the Garland. For, seeing the Lawes of this Land haue appointed the Hang-man to second the Conqueror, and the Lawes of God appointed the Deuill to second the conquered dying in malice: I say that he is both base, & a foole, that accepts of any Cartel so accompanied. To this perchance it will be answered, That the kings of England & other Christian kings, haue seldome taken any such aduantage ouer men of quality, who vpon euen termes haue slaine their priuate enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combustion they haue not often done it; so did our Noble-men & Gentlemen in former ages, in all important iniuries, sue vnto the king, to approue themselues by battaile and publique combat. For as they dared not to braue the Law; so did they disdaine to submit themselues vnto the shamefull reuenge thereof; the same reuenge (because it detesteth murder) that it hath declared against a common Cut-purse or other Theeues:

Nay let it be granted that a pardon be procured for such offenders: Yet is not the Man-slaier freed by his pardon. For these two remedies hath the partie grieued notwithstanding; that is, to require iustice by Grand Assize, or by battaile, vpon his appeale, which (saith Sir Thomas Smith) is not denyed; and he further saith (for I vse his owne words) That if the Defendant (to wit, the Man-slaier) be conuinced either by great Assize or by Battaile, vpon that appeale; the Man-slaier shall die, notwithstanding the Princes pardon. So fauourable (saith the same learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the law of our Realme, to iustice, and to the punishment of bloud violently shed. It may further be demanded, how our Noble-men and Gentle-men shall be repaired in honour, where an enemy taking the start either in words or blowes, shall lay on them an infamy vnsufferable? I say that a Marshalls Court will easily giue satisfaction in both. And if wee hold it no disgrace to submit our selues for the recouery of our Debts, Goods, & Lands, and for all things else, by which the liues of our selues, our wiues, & children, are sustained, to the Iudges of the Law; because it may be fellony, to take by violence euen that which is our owne: why should we not submit our selues vnto the Iudges of honour in cases of honour; because to recouer our reputation by strong hand, may bee murder? But yet againe it may be obiected, That the losse of honour ought to bee much more fearefull vnto vs, than either the losse of our goods, of our lands, or of our liues; and I say so too. But what is this honour, I meane honour indeed, and that which ought to be so deare vnto vs, other than a kinde of history, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficultie or danger, and vnder-taken for the publike goode In these he that is imployed and trusted, if hee faile in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other base affection; it is true that he loseth his honour. But the acting of a priuate combate, for a priuate respect, and most commonly a friuolous one, is not an action of vertue, because it is contrary to the law of God, and of all Christian kings: neither is it difficult, because euen & equall in persons and armes: Neither for a publike good, but tending to the contrary; because the losse or mutilation of an able man, is also a losse to the Common-weale.

Now that a Marshall of England hath power to saue euery mans fame & reputation, as farre as reputation may sustaine iniury by words, I thinke no man doubteth. For to repent vs of any euill words that wee haue giuen, and to confesse that we haue done him wrong vnto whom we haue giuen them, is a sufficient satisfaction; and as it may fall out, more than sufficient. For he that giues ill words in choler, and suddenly denies them, or repents himselfe of them vpon aduisement, hath the disaduantage in point of reputation. Concerning blowes, which are indeed not to be giuen but to those that are seruile, whether sufficient recompence will be made for them, it shall appeare by a notable example of a most worthy Gentleman Monsier de Plessis, that was stricken in France not long since by a Baron of the same Nation. The satisfaction which was giuen him by a iudgement of the Constable and Marshalls of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Constable gaue iudgement, M. de Plessis was set in a chaire vnder the degrees where the Constable and Marshalls sate: the Baron, who had giuen him the blow, did kneele before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a sword with the point towards himselfe, and in his left hand the like cudgel or bastinado, wherewith he had stricken M. de Plessis; both which weapons he deliuered into Plessis hands, submitting himselfe to such reuenge, as it should please him to take with either of those weapons; the Constable and Marshalls hauing formerly left it to the will of Plessis, to vse his owne discretion in the reuenge of his own wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reason to please himselfe, as one beforehand in point of honor, (who struck M. de Plessis like a Ruffian comming behind him, and hauing the aduantage of company and his horses ready, shifted himselfe away on the sudden, but being afterwards taken, was taught to repent himselfe in this shamefull manner:) or whether Monsier de Plessis (of whose valour no man doubted) had not farre iuster cause to rest satisfied, since he might at his pleasure haue beaten or wounded his enemy, but forgaue him: let any wise man iudge. To this if it bee said, That the Baron was constrained to make his submission, that his repentance was enforced, and not voluntary; and therefore no disgrace vnto him: I answer, that one may say as well, that it is no disgrace to a Theefe, when hee is brought to the Gallowes, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, because his repentance also is constrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no disgrace in respect of a force, but in respect of the fact: which (but for our sinnes to God) makes all repentance shamefull; because all forced repentance is inflicted vpon vs for somewhat vnworthy of a Gentleman and of an honest man. Nay, voluntary repentance it selfe, as it hath relation to men, ariseth either out of the feare of the ill that may befall vs, or out of the acknowledgement of our owne weakenesse. Certainely, as wise men, and valiant men, doe rather deride petty iniuries or sudden iniuries, that are not offered from malice fore-thought, than reuenge them: so men, apt to quarrell, doe commonly suspect their own valor; and rather desire, that thereby the world should beleeue them to be of great daring, than know any such resolution in themselues. For he that knowes himselfe indeed to be an honest man, scornes to hunt after opinion.

Now the same power which the Constable and Marshalls of France haue, hath also a Marshall of England, or his Deputies; by whose iudgement, in all disputes of honour, euery mans reputation may be preserued; we may therefore as well submit our selues to the Iudge of honour in all disputes of honour, as we doe submit our selues in all controuersies of liuelihood and life, to the Iudges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the institution of this Court of Cheualrie in England, in France, and elsewhere; was no lesse charitable than politike. For the bloud of man, violently spilt, doth not bring forth bonie-bees, as that of Bulls doth, which sting but the fingers or the face: but it produceth that monstrous beast, Reuenge, which hath stung to death, and eaten vp of seuerall Nations, so many noble personages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatning the wrath of God vpon supreme Gouernours, than the permission.

His Maiesty therefore (which Henrie the fourth of France also endeuored) hath done a most Kingly and Christian-like deed in Scotland, which the most renowned of all his Predecessors could neuer doe: in beating down, and extinguishing, that hereditary prosecution of malice, called the deadly feud; a conquest, which shall giue him the honour of Prudence and kingly power, for euermore, And wee haue cause to hope, that his royall care shall bee no lesse happy in preuenting the like mischiefe, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and braue, yet outragious vanity of Duellists.

Vnto this that I haue spoken of lying, and of man-slaughter, it must bee added, That each of these are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproofe & vengeance proportionably, more or lesse, in their seuerall degrees. There is much difference betweene Lies of necessitie vpon breach of promise, or complementall lyes; and such pernicious lyes, as proceed from feare and cowardize, or are vttered by false witnesses: the former sort, being excuseable by weakenesse or leuitie; the latter, being altogether detestable. No lesse, if not more, difference there is, betweene killing of a man in open field, with euen weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures cal killing by guile, dolo or per insidias; though our Lawes doe not much distinguish them in punishment. For in the latter, God, forsaking his owne priuiledge, commandeth, that the guilefull murderer be drawn by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither is euery guilefull murder performed by the sword, nor by ouert violence: but there is a guilefull murder also, by poysoning; and by the pen, or by practice. For such distinction is found, betweene comming presumptuously vpon a man, to slay him with guile; and lying in wait for bloud, priuily, for the innocent, without a cause, vpon hope of spoile, after such manner as the net is spred before the eyes of the birds. Francis the first, Queene Marie of England, and the kings Maiesty now reigning, haue giuen notable testimony of their iustice, vpon three Noble men, who committed guilefull murder. Of the first kinde, King Francis vpon the Lord of Talard: who being (saith the French Historian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & supporté de plusieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient linage, and supported by diuers great alliances, of which the Cardinall of Bellay (in especiall fauor with the King) was one, was notwithstanding deliuered ouer into the hands of the Hangman. Queen Marie, vpon a noble man of her own Religion, and in many other respects very deare vnto her. His Maiesty, vpon a Baron of Scotland; whose house was no lesse ancient and faithfull, than himselfe valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilefully by poyson, and of punishment following such wicked Artisans, euery age hath had too many examples. Of killing guilefully by the pen (that I may not speake of any English Iudge) the Author of the French Recherches giues vnto vs two notable instances: the one of des Esbars, who (saith Pasquire) fit mourir Montaigu grand Maistre de France, pour contenter l'opinion de celuy dont il estoit lors idolastre; & Dieu permit que depuis il fut il fut pendu & eſtranglé; who cauſed Montaigu great Maſter of France to die, to content his minde (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Eſtars worſhipped as his Idol: but God permitted, that he himſelfe was ſoone after hanged and ſtrangled. The other was of the Great Francis the firſt, vpon his Chancellor Poyet: who, to ſatisfie the Kings paſſion, practiſed the deſtruction of the Admirall Chabot, a man moſt nobly deſcended, and of great ſeruice. For as in other men, ſo in Kings, the paſſion of loue growes old, and weares out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admirall, hee charged him with ſome offences which he had formerly committed. The Admirall, preſuming vpon the great good ſeruice which he had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Marſeilles againſt the Emperour; gaue the King other language than became him, and deſired nothing ſo much, as a publike trial. Hereupon the King (it being eaſie to prouoke an ill diſpoſition) gaue commiſſion to the Chancellor, as Preſident, and other Iudges, vpon an information of the Kings Aduocate, to queſtion the Admirals life. The Chancellor, an ambitious man, & of a large conſcience, (which is not rare in men towards the Law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with ſome of the Iudges with ſo great cunning; with others, with ſo ſharpe threats; and with the reſt, with ſo faire promiſes; as albeit nothing could be proued againſt the Admiral, worthy of the kings diſpleaſure; yet the Chancellor ſubſcribed, and got others to ſubſcribe, to the forfeiture of his Eſtate, Offices, and Liberty; though not able to preuaile againſt his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating falſhood in ſo great a Magiſtrate) other than his owne degradation, arraignement, and condemnation? Belle leçon certes (ſaith Paſquier) à tout Iuge pour demourer touſiours en ſoy, & ne laiſſer fluctuer ſa conſcience dedans les vagues d'vne imaginarie faueur, qui pour fin de ieu le ſubmerge; A faire leſſon to all Iudges, to dwell alwaies in themſelues, and not to ſuffer their conſciences to float vpon the waues of imaginarie fauour, which in the end ouerwhelmes them. And as for the Admirall: though it might haue beene anſwered vnto his friends, if any bewailed his calamitie as vndeſerued, That he was tryed, according to his owne deſire, by the Lawes of his Countrey, and by the Iudges of Parliament; yet the Kings iuſtice, ſurmounting all other his paſſions, gaue backe vnto him his Honour, his Offices, his Libertie, and his Eſtate.

†. III.

The laſt Acts of Scipio in Spaine. His returne to Rome where he is choſen Conſul.

THe laſt buſineſſe that troubled Scipio in Spain, grew by the rebellion of the People, and mutinie of his Souldiers. He fell dangerouſly ſicke, in ſuch ſort, that the rumor of his death ran currant throughout Spaine. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, pettie kings, that had forſaken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio a while before, to take arms againſt the Romans. They were vainely perſwaded, that after the Carthaginians were driuen out, they themſelues ſhould become the mightieſt in all Spaine. But ſeeing now, that things were no way anſwerable to the greatneſſe of their hopes; they thought it beſt, to take the preſent aduantage, and hammer out their owne fortunes. So they raſhly fell vpon the Sueſſetani and Sedetani, Confederates of the Romans; and waſted their Countrie. Part of the Roman Army lying at Sucro, in ſtead of making head againſt theſe Rebels, grew to be affected with the like diſtemper. They had not reaped ſuch profit of their Roman conqueſts, as might ſatisfie their deſires; or as they thought eaſie to be gotten, if they might be their owne Caruers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought, that the time ſerued very well, to enrich themſelues with the ſpoile of the Countrie. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greateſt of all, driuing away their Colonels, that ſhould haue bridled their furie; they choſe out of their owne number two baſe fellowes, Albius Calenus, and Atrius Umber, to their Commanders. Theſe tooke vpon them all the Enſignes of Proconſuls, or Propretors; as if this their election had beene like to that, wherein Lucius Martius was choſen by the Souldiers, after the death of the two Scipio's. But whileſt they were deuiſing, what exploits they might doe, for the enriching of themſelues, in a time of ſuch combuſtion as was expected; there arriued more certaine newes, that Scipio was both aliue, and in good health. There came alſo new Colonels, ſent vnto them from their Generall: who mildely rebuking their want of conſideration, and ſeeming to be glad that they had no further

ouer-shoot themselues; led them to Carthagena, there to receiue their pay. Before their comming, Scipio had resolued to doe exemplarie iustice on the principall offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in feare, of what they had deserued. Therefore hee caused Syllanus to make ready the Companies which lay before in the Towne, as it were to make an Expedition against Mandonius, and Indibilis; Hee caused Albius and Atrius with some thirty other of their Complices, to be secretly apprehended in their lodgings; He called the Mutiners to assembly; and hauing them vnarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his Companies, prepared for the purpose; he bitterly inueighed against them all, as Traitors. This done; Albius, and Atrius, with the other prisoners, were haled to the stake; where they were whipt, and beheaded, as was the Roman custome toward such offenders. The rest of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thousand, were called to take their oath of obedience anew; and receiued euery man his pay when hee was sworne.

Mandonius and Indibilis continued in armes; notwithstanding that they had certaine word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could haue beene contented to bee quiet: but by the seueritie vsed to the Roman Souldiers, they stood in feare, as being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder measure. Scipio went against them; and found them in a Valley, that was scarce large enough to hold all their Armie. In the entrance thereof he fought with them: and sending Lelius with all his horse to fetch a compasse about the Hils, & charge them in reare; he ouerthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this no hope remaining to preserue themselues and their estates, otherwise than by making submission. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio: and humbly crauing pardon, both for himselfe, and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his request; yet so, that they were taught to acknowledge themselues lesse free Princes than formerly they had beene.

Afterward Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Masanissa; who secretly promised to doe him all seruice, if the people of Rome would send him to make war in Africk. Vnto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage; that letting all care of Spaine alone, he should thence depart with his fleet into Italy; and there wage an Army of Gaules, and Ligurians, to ioyne with Hannibal. For this purpose, was money sent vnto him from Carthage; & he himselfe laid hold vpon all that he could finde in the Town of Gades; without sparing either priuate men, the common treasury, or the Temples. In his voyage thence, he landed at Carthagena; hoping to haue taken it by surprise. But he failed in the attempt; and was so beaten to his ships, that he returned backe to repose himselfe awhile at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and spoyle that hee had made at his taking leaue of them, would not suffer him againe to enter into their City. By this hee foresaw, that it would not bee long ere they became Roman. Wherefore sending Messengers into the Towne, to complaine of this vncourteous dealing, he allured their Magistrates forth vnto him; whom, notwithstanding all the excuse that they could make, he whipt, and crucified. This done, hee followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spaine farewell for euer.

The Isle and City of Gades, was yeelded to the Romans, presently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliuer vp the Prouince, to those that were sent from Rome to succeed him therein: and himselfe with ten ships returned home. At his comming to Rome, he made suite for the honour of a triumph. But it was denyed him: for that it had as yet bin granted vnto no Proconsul, excepting to such, as receiued that dignitie after a Consulship, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulse: the election of new Consuls being then in hand, by generall voyce of the Citie P. Cornelius Scipio was chosen Consul; and P. Licinius Crassus, ioyned with him. This Crassus, being high Priest, or Bishop of the Romans; might not, by the custome of those times, goe farre from the Citie; as being to intend the matters of their superstition: though Cæsar, and others, who in ages following held the same Office; were stayed by no such religious impediment, from being farre, and long absent. Hereby it came to passe, that Scipio desiring to haue the warre transferred into Africk, was in no danger to lose that honourable charge, by any mischance of lot, in the diuision of Prouinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of employment so farre off.

§. XVIII.

Scipio obtaines leaue to make warre in Africk. His preparations. Of Maſaniſſa who was ioyned with Scipio. The victories againſt Aſdrubal and Syphax.

P. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Craſſus, entring into their Conſulſhip, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: wherein it was decreed, that Scipio ſhould bee allowed, to beſtow part of the money which hee had brought out of Spaine into the treaſurie, vpon the ſetting forth of ſolemne plaies, that he had vowed to make, whilſt hee was buſied in his Spaniſh warres. This helped well to reuiue the memory of his victories already gotten, and to giue hope vnto the People of greater victories in the warre, which he intended to make in Africk. To the ſame purpoſe, did the Spaniſh Embaſſages anaile much in the Senate, eſpecially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions highly and deſeruedly, ſaying, That they were the moſt happy of all their countriemen, ſince they being preſent, had ſeene him choſen Conſul, and ſhould carry home ſuch ioyfull newes. The Saguntine Embaſſadours were louingly entertained by the Senate, as their faith to Rome (though coſtly it were both to them, and to the Romans) had well deſerued. Neuertheleſſe, when Scipio propoſed, that Africk might be decreed vnto him for his Prouince: there wanted not many, euen of the principal men, that vehemently gain-ſaid him. Of theſe was Q. Fabius Maximus the chiefe: who ſeemes to haue beene troubled with that diſeaſe, which too often cauſeth men renowned for long approued vertue, to looke aſquint vpon the actions of thoſe, that follow them in the ſame kinde. Hee alleaged many reaſons againſt the purpoſe of the Conſul: whereof the chiefe were, That the treaſurie was vnable to ſuſtaine the charges of a warre in Africk; and that it was extremely perillous to hazard ſo great forces, where they could not at pleaſure be recalled vnto the defence of Rome it ſelfe, if need required. Hereunto he added many words concerning the danger wherein Italy ſtood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as alſo concerning the honour of the Conſul, which would (he ſaid) be greater in ſetting Italy free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harme to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to eleuate the Spaniſh warres, as of leſſe moment than the intended voyage againſt Carthage; nor withall to lay great blame vpon Scipio, for hauing ſuffered Aſdrubal to paſſe into Italy: ſhewing, that it was greatly to be feared, leſt the like might happen againe; and that a new Armie, notwithſtanding the good ſucceſſe of Scipio (if it hapned to be good) might be ſent from Carthage, to the vtter endangering of Rome, whilſt the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the maine point which he vrged, was, That neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that yeer a Prouince: which the Conſul neuertheleſſe propounded in ſuch wiſe, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other ſide, inſiſted vpon this one point; That it was better to make an offenſiue, than a defenſiue warre: eſpecially againſt ſuch as the Carthaginians, who being ill prouided of able men at home, did furniſh themſelues by helpe of money, with leuies made abroad. As for the care of Italy, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague would be as well able to diſcharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promiſing to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his own home: and taxing as ciuilly as he could, the enuy of Fabius, which withſtood ſuch a gallant enterpriſe; he propoſed the matter againe vnto the Senate. Much altercation there was about the manner of his proceeding: foraſmuch as it was noyſed abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his minde, he would carry it by the People. This offended many of the Ancients: who reſented in this honourable man a little ſpice of that arrogancie, which in following ages, grew to be much hotter in thoſe that had commanded long abroad. But in concluſion, Scipio referred himſelfe wholly vnto the Senates good will and pleaſure; wherby he obtained thus much, That the Iſle of Sicil might be appointed vnto him for his Prouince; with leaue to paſſe ouer into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of money, and no great liking to his voyage, made the Roman Senate haue little care to furniſh out Scipio to the warre, by him intended vpon Africk. Herewithall it fell out, that Mago, comming on the ſuddaine from the Baleares to Genua, and winning the Town, bred a feare of no leſſe terrible inuaſion vpon Italy, than that which Aſdrubal had lately made. Hee could not indeed raiſe any great Armie of the Ligurians; for that he found them diſtracted with ciuill warres. Therefore he was driuen to make choyce of his his partie; and to helpe those whom he thought fittest for his turne, against the others. This troublesome businesse, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly haue spared; yet it got him reputation by his victories, & made the vnsteady Gaule, ready to enter into his pay. Hereupon the dispersed Legions of the Romans, that vnder Proconsuls, and Pretors, lay ready to bee employed where need should require; were directed vnto the borders of Lombardie and Liguria, there to make head against Mago. But all his menaces passed away in vapour. For a fleet either comming to his ayde from Carthage, or by him sent thither (the report is vncertaine) loaden with the booty that he had taken, fell into the hands of the Roman Pretor, that gouerned in Sardinia. This did much disable him: and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with store of money, heartening him in his proceedings: yet some impediments which hee found, and that fatall voyage of Scipio into Africke, disturbed all; and made him be recalled home.

Against Hannibal, was nothing done this yeere. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Historians haue bin pleased to take notice. Onely it is said, that he spent the Summer by the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, where he raised an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, grauen in Punike, and Greek letters. Such accompt of winnings past, is commonly in Gamesters that are at the height of their fortune, a cause of remission, and carelesnesse; in those that are vpon the losing hand, a cause both of the same for the present, and shortly after of deiection, when they finde a notable change. A great pestilence, infesting both the Carthaginian and the Roman Campe, is said to haue beene the occasion of this yeeres idlenesse; which fell out not much amisse for the Citie of Rome, that was maruailously empouerished by this warre; and had already tried the vtmost way to defray the charges, which grew insupportable. To relieue the present necessitie, it was well thought vpon, that a great part of Campania (not many yeeres since confiscated) should be sold, or let out: in which bargaine, that the Citie might receiue no losse; the tenth part of the fine was ordained as a reward, vnto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other money, none was giuen to Scipio. Neither was he allowed to make presse of Souldiers for his African voyage; neither did he ouer-much labour to obtain it. That which the Senate refused, the People did for him: or rather they did it for themselues; that were therein wiser than the Senate. It is vsually found in Councels of estate, that the busie, or obstinate heads of a few, doe carry all the rest. And many times men make a surrender of their owne iudgements, to the wisedome that hath gotten it selfe a name, by giuing happie direction in troubles forepast. Therefore, he that reposeth himselfe vpon the aduice of many, shall often finde himselfe deceiued: the counsaile of those many being wholly directed by the empire of a few, that ouer-sway the rest. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his warie nature sorted well with the busines, that fell out in the chiefe of his employment. Vnto him therefore Q. Fabius adhered, with other of the Senators, that were growne old in following one course; from which they could not shift, as the change of times required. But the People (who though they could not well aduise, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needfull resolution of Scipio: in such sort, that besides his Roman forces, hee had from diuers parts of Italy about seuen thousand Voluntaries. He had also prouision from the seuerall Townes; Corne, Iron, Canuas for sailes, Axes, Beede-hookes, Hand-mills, and the like implements, Firre for building of ships, many thousands of Targets, Helmets, and Speares of all kindes: euery place furnishing him with that commoditie, which it best could afoord.

Vnto this willingnesse of the People, the diligence of Scipio was correspondent. In the compasse of fiue and fortie dayes, he had both feld his Timber, built, and lanched twentie Trireme, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; wherewith he transported his Armie into Sicil. In Sicil he found, besides other forces, two Legions, that had serued at Cannæ: which were old Souldiers, and (as he himselfe well knew) not guilty of the ouerthrow; for which they had long vnder-gone a heauy censure. They had serued vnder Marcellus and Leuinus, at the taking of many Cities, and strong pieces: in which regard, they were like to be of good vse to him in Africk, where would be store of such employment. For increasing the number of his horse, he pressed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthy yong men, and such as loued well their ease. These he afterward discharged from the Warre, highly highly to their contentment: but with condition that they should deliuer their Horse and Arms to as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought ouer with him for the purpose. Whilst he was prouiding, to haue things in a readinesse for Africk, the banished Locrians that followed the Roman side, made him acquainted with an intelligence, wherby they hoped to recouer their City. Some handicraftsmen, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadels of Locri (for there were two in the Towne) being taken prisoners by the Romans, promised to betray the place, if they might be ransomed, and rewarded. Scipio being aduertised of this, gaue order to haue the attempt made by night: which happily succeeded; and that Citadel was surprised. The other Citadel was strongly defended by the Carthaginian Garrison, which sent to Hannibal for aide. The Romans in like sort, fearing lest their owne paucitie should make them too weake for Hannibal, craued helpe of the Consul Scipio. The Townsmen were doubtfully affected: but the best, and most of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the comming of Scipio caused thence to depart; and caused likewise the Carthaginian Garrison to abandon the other Cittadell. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in custodie of the Towne. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians vnto the Roman Senate; not onely against those of the Garrison: but much more against Pleminius the Captaine, who gaue bad example, and was worse than all the rest. Besides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other villanies: the Temple of Proserpina, that had a great fame of sanctitie, was spoyled by these barbarous Theeues. The Locrians therefore aduised the Senate to make present amends to the goddesse for this sacriledge: saying, that the like had neuer beene committed, without notorious reuenge by her taken vpon the Authors. The Senate gaue good eare to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redressed the iniuries done vnto them; sent for Pleminius, with other principall the offenders, whom they cast into prison, and vsed according to their deserts: as also they restored vnto Proserpina her money twice told. But old Q. Fabius was not herewithall contented. He laid much of the blame vpon Scipio, that had placed such a man in Locri; and had not carefully hearkened to the complaints made against him, but suffered him to runne on in these his wicked courses. By the sharpe inuective that Fabius made, others tooke courage to speake what they pleased, as well against the demeanour of Scipio, as against the dissoluteness of his Armie; which lay, as they said, idle in Sicil, neither mindefull of any seruice toward, nor fit for it if need should require. Finally, things were so farre vrged, that tenne Legates were sent ouer into Sicil, together with the Pretor appointed for that Iland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Ædiles; who should examine these matters; and either cause the Generall to returne into Italy, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all, was: they found him so well prepared against Carthage, as that they hastned him on his iourney, and gaue him high commendations at their returne.

Scipio had already employed Lelius in Africk; rather to make discouery, than to worke any other great effect of warre. Hee tooke a great bootie: and strucke no little terrour into the Carthaginians; who saw their affaires to be vpon termes of change. But the greatest fruit of his iourney was, That speaking with Masanissa, hee well informed himselfe of the state of Africk; and knew what was to be expected of those two Kings, that had promised to ioyne with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Masanissa his reuolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made vnder-hand with the Romans: Liuie doth professe, That there was no such euident cause thereof at the present; but that the long continuance of his faith and constancie, in following times, must helpe to proue, that this his change, was not without some good cause. But Appianus (an Historian farre inferiour to Liuie, both in Worth and Time) giues one reason so probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carries with it a great appearance of necessary truth. Onely the doubt is, How it could any way come to passe; that the knowledge of such a matter should haue escaped the diligence of Liuie, if it had been true: vnlesse we should beleeue, that he wilfully forbare to rehearse a Tragedie; the sorrow whereof would cause men to thinke amisse of Scipio. Howsoeuer it was, thus * Appian tels it: and many circumstances of things done, confirme it. Asdrubal, the sonne of Geseo, had a faire daughter, whom both King Syphax and Masanissa loued. Masanissa, being brought vp at Carthage, and being withall a goodly Gentleman of person, and excellent in qualities, was chosen by Asdrubal to bee his sonne-in-law.

When

When the virgin was betrothed vnto him, he went into Spaine, and there did great ſeruice. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the marriage of Aſdrubals daughter to be a matter of State: and beſtowed her vpon Syphax; without ſtanding to acquaint her father or Maſaniſſa therewithall. This they did, for that Syphax was the more mighty Prince; and for that the indignity of the repulſe, had made him become their enemy. Hereof Maſaniſſa was aduertiſed: and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, ſecretly as he thought; yet not ſo ſecretly, but ſome notice was taken of it: which would haue coſt him his life, had he not with great circumſpection conueighed himſelfe home into his fathers Kingdome. Thus farre forth we may beleeue Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things paſt, and following. Onely it ſeemes, that howſoeuer Sophonisba the daughter of Aſdrubal, was promiſed by the Carthaginians vnto Syphax: yet ſince this their courteſie proceeded from feare, Hee thought it wiſedome to continue and increaſe the ſame their feare, by making faire promiſes to the Romans; vntill Aſdrubal had ſent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was conſummated. In other matters concerning the warre it ſelfe, wherein Appian differs much from Liuie, and from Polybius, whom (as appeares by the broken pieces of his workes remaining) Liuie did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed vnto his reports.

Liu. Lib. 29.

Maſaniſſa was the ſonne of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whoſe father dying, the Crowne deſcended by order of the Countrie, vnto Deſalces the brother, not vnto Maſaniſſa the ſonne. But this Vncle of Maſaniſſa ſhortly dyed: and his elder ſonne, who took poſſeſſion of the kingdome, was vanquiſhed, and ſlaine in battaile by a Rebel, that made himſelfe Protector ouer the younger which was a childe. The Traitor fortified himſelfe againſt Maſaniſſa, whoſe returne he feared, by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not ſerue: Hee, and his Pupill, were diſpoſſeſſed of their Eſtates by Maſaniſſa; that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloued for the memorie of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reaſon would haue beene glad, that Maſaniſſa, who had done them notable ſeruice, was thus confirmed in his Eſtate: had they not been guiltie of the iniurie by them done vnto him; whilſt his Vncle or Couſin reigned, and he ſeemed vnlikely to ſtand them in any ſtead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his own malice towards his Corriual, warred vpon him; and ouer-charging him with numbers, draue him out of his Kingdome. Neuertheleſſe Maſaniſſa ſtill retained the hearts of his people: and thereby remained ſtrong enough, to infeſt both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though hee was often put in diſtreſſe, by great forces that were ſent againſt him. He therefore keeping much about the leſſer Syrtis, between the borders of the Carthaginians and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the comming of the Romans: yet ſo, as he made long roades ouer all the Countrey, euen as far as to Hippo; and when Lelius arriued thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to haſten on Scipio to the inuaſion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whoſe great aide and ſuccour was repoſed more hope of good ſucceſſe, than could be expected from the good will of poore Maſaniſſa; ſent an Embaſſage into Sicil about the ſame time, which was little pleaſing vnto Scipio. He excuſed himſelfe of his promiſe lately made: and ſignified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That he could not chooſe but fight for the defence of Africk, wherein he was borne and reigned; and for the defence of his beloued wiues Countrie, if it were inuaded. Neuertheleſſe he promiſed to remaine a Neuter; ſo long as the Romans & Carthaginians held war abroad, farre enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This meſſage haſtened Scipio in his expedition, much more than any perſwaſion could haue done. For the promiſed aſſiſtance of Syphax had not a little aduanced his enterpriſe; in procuring both the aſſent of the Senate, and the forwardneſſe of many Aduenturers. Leſt therefore the fayling of this hope, ſhould worke too great a change in common opinion; He thought it the beſt way to preuent all diſcourſe, and ſet the warre vndertaken immediately on foot. The Embaſſadours he diſmiſſed in all haſte, with letters to their King: wherein he willed him to conſider, that what hee had promiſed, hee had alſo ſworne; and therefore ſhould doe well to make it good. Hauing ſent them away, Hee called his Souldiers together, and bade them make readie for the voyage; which hee intended no longer to deferre. For, ſaid he, Maſaniſſa hath beene with Lelius: and Syphax hath newly ſent to mee; greatly wondring vpon what I ſhould thus ſtay; and ſaying, That they will prouide for themſelues, if I faile their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale take permitted all further inquisition, that might else haue beene made concerning the meaning of these Embassadors, whose followers had beene seene walking vp and downe Syracusa. And lest any thing should afterwards breake out, that might hinder the businesse in hand, Scipio immediately sent about his fleet vnto Lilybæum: and requesting by letters M. Pomponius, that was Prætor in Sicil, to meet him there, hasted thither with his Armie. In Lilybæum he agreed with the Prætor about the diuision of the Legions betweene them, which to leaue behinde for defence of the Iland, and which to carry with him into Africk. What numbers he transported, it is not certaine: some Historians reckoning onely ten thousand foot, and two and twenty hundred horse; others increasing them to fiue and thirty thousand, horse and foot. Concerning his directions from embarking, and other matters belonging to their course, I hold it needlesse to set them downe: since they were points of ordinarie care, and which it is like that neither hee, when hee tooke his voyage into Spaine, nor others vpon like occasions, haue omitted; they being also worthie to be set downe by an Historian, who borrowed them from Liuie, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Army landed in Africk, neere to a fore-land then called the faire Promontorie: which how farre it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compasse, I cannot precisely affirme; because it is vncertaine, whether it were that Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercurie, and lay to the North-east of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by West. The comming of Masanissa vnto Scipio at his first arriuall, helpes to confirme the opinion of Xylander: who thinkes the faire Promontorie to haue been the same; that was also called Mercuries Cape: since with little difficultie Masanissa might come thither from the lesser Syrtis, whereabout was his common abiding. But forasmuch as without any memorable impediment vpon after his arriuall, Scipio encamped before Vtica, that stood Westward from Carthage beyond the Riuer Bagradas: it may rather seeme, that hee landed within the Promontorie of Apollo, whence the way to Vtica was not long. This is also strongly proued; for that out of Carthage were sent, the next day, fiue hundred horse to trouble him in his dis-embarking. Neither was it so hard for Masanissa, that roued about the Countrie with a troupe of horse, to finde out the Romans, though they landed farre from the place to the which he vsually resorted, like as before hee had met with Lelius at Hippo that was farther off; as it would haue beene for Scipio, with his Armie and Carriages, to ouercome the trouble of a long iourney, and fetch a great compasse to Vtica, by Land; when he might haue dis-embarqued neerer vnto it. Neuertheless it may passe as a coniecture, That Scipio came first of all to Emporia, a plentifull Region about the lesser Syrtis; since he gaue charge to the Masters of his ships, at the setting forth from Lilybæum, to shape their course for that coast. The Countrey thereabout was very rich, and fit for sustenance of an Armie: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well prouided to make resistance. Thus much perhaps Masanissa had signified vnto Lelius, when he spake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howsoeuer they made braue promises, would not come strong enough to fight at head. But when hee saw their fleet and Armie to bee such, as not onely serued to inuade the lands of Carthage, but threatned a conquest of the Citie, and whole Estate: then might he better aduise them to set sayle for Vtica, and make warre vpon the Enemies at their owne doores.

The Carthaginians had at that time neither any Captaine of great worth at home, nor better Armie than of raw Souldiers; that were leuied, or to be leuied in haste. Asdrubal the son of Gesco, the same that had lately beene chased out of Spaine by Scipio was their best man of war. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanno and his fellowes, of whose faction he was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobilitie, together with the affinitie of King Syphax, made him passeable. Hee was then with the King his son-in-law, working him (no doubt) against the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage, both to Syphax and to him, informing them of the Inuasion: entreating the one of them to giue assistance, and commanding the other to make his repaire vnto the Citie, where he was chosen Generall. But ere these could be ready, Scipio had beaten the troupe of Carthaginian horse, that were sent out of the Citie to disturbe his landing; and slaine Hanno a yong Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had also taken and sacked a Towne of the Carthaginians: wherein, besides other bootie, hee tooke eight thousand prisoners; all which he conueighed aboord his Hulks or Ships of burden, and ſent them backe loaden into Siell. He tooke likewiſe a Towne called Salera, which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with foure thouſand Numidian horſe: whoſe ſeruice being fitter for the field, than for defence of walled places, made Scipio to perceiue the vnskilfulneſſe of their Leader, that had thus houſed them. Wherefore he ſent Maſaniſſa before him: who rode vp to the gates; and, by making a brauado, trained out the improuident Hanno ſo farre, that hee drew him vnto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victorie was eaſily gotten, and Hanno either taken, or ſlaine. With thoſe that fled, the Romans entred pell-mell into the towne, which preſently they made their owne. Thence went Scipio to Vtica, a Citie of great importance, * of which mention hath beene formerly made, and ſate downe before it. Forty dayes he ſpent about it, aſſayling it both by Land and Sea, and vſing all his enginers of battery whereof he had plenty, yet was in no likelihood of preuayling. And now the Summer was quite ſpent: ſo that it was time for him to chooſe a place, and fortifie his Winter-Campe, which muſt be well ſtored againſt the yeere following. Whileſt thus neceſſitie vrged him to leaue Vtica: and ſhame of taking the repulſe in his firſt great enterpriſe, rather than any hope of better ſucceſſe, cauſed him to ſtay there: Aſdrubal and Syphax gaue him the honour of a faire pretence to leaue the ſiege. Aſdrubal had made a Leuie of thirty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe: yet aduentured not with this ill-trained Army to draw neere vnto the Romans, before the coming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him vnto Carthage fifty thouſand foot, and ten thouſand horſe: which ioyning vnto the forces of Aſdrubal, they marched brauely toward Scipio; who thereby tooke occaſion to diſ-lodge. He choſe for his Winter-campe the banks of an Inlet, that had good harbour for his Nauie. His foot-men he lodged on a Promontorie, ioyning to the Continent by an arme of Land: his horſe-men he beſtowed vpon lower ground, on the other ſhoare: in the bottome of the Creek he moted his ſhips; and there he quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged vnto the Fleet. The whole campe he ſtrongly fortified, and ſo attended the ſeaſon of the yeere, when it ſhould ſerue him againe to fight. Of cattell and other bootie Maſaniſſa had brought in great ſtore, by driuing the Countrey, before the comming of Aſdrubal and Syphax. Corne alſo hee had gotten ſome: and great ſtore was ſent him from Sicil and Sardinia. Likewiſe apparrell for his Souldiers, was ſent from home, or from Sardinia: though ſcarce enough to ſerue turne, for that it was a matter of more coſt. The ſhips that brought theſe things, he frighted homewards with ſuch part of his bootie, as he could beſt ſpare; eſpecially with captiues to be ſold for ſlaues. Aſdrubal and Syphax encamped neere vnto Scipio not ſo ſtrongly fortifying themſelues, as did the Romans, either for that they wanted the ſeuere inſtitution, which the Romans vſed in the diſcipline of warre, or for that they preſumed vpon their multitude, againſt which they found in Scipio no diſpoſition to iſſue foorth of his ſtrength, and fight. So the Winter paſſed without action.

When Spring drew neere, Scipio thought it good to aſſay his old friend the Numidian King, if perhaps hee might be wonne by perſwaſions to forſake the Carthaginians. It was conſidered, that thoſe Barbarians were naturally vnconſtant; and particularly, that Syphax had giuen proofe before this of his much leuitie. It might therefore bee hoped, That hauing wearied himſelfe, by lodging a whole Winter in the Campe: and being peraduenture no leſſe weary with ſatiety of his wife, who had cauſed him to enter into this warre: he might be moued with a little entreatie to withdraw himſelfe home into his Kingdome, and reſt a Neuter. But it is not vnlikely, that ſuch a friend as this King, had beene highly entertained and honoured in the City of Carthage, which was neere at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleaſed him, or as he had beene inuited, to make a ſtep thither and repoſe himſelfe awhile: his wife Queene Sophonisba lying alſo there at the ſame time, to cheriſh him in his reſolution. Howſoeuer it were, Syphax did onely make an ouerture of peace: propounding it as reaſonable, That Hannibal ſhould be recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: & that the Romans in like ſort ſhould quietly depart out of Africke, and ſo make an end of the warre: wherewith now both Africke and Europe were diſquieted. Vnto this would not Scipio at the firſt giue care: yet being preſſed earneſtly by many meſſages from Syphax, and deſiring to continue the inter-courſe of Embaſſadors; he began to make ſhew, as if he would conſider of the motion. He was giuen to vnderſtand by thoſe whom he had ſent vnto the king, That the Enemies had their campes without any great defence of earth, ful of woodden Cabbins, bins, and couered with boughs: and that the Numidians, such of them as came first with Syphax, vsed couerings of Mattes and Reeds; others, that came later, had thatched their lodgings with drie boughes and leaues vnder which they lay carelesly without their Trenches. Vpon this aduertisement he bethought himselfe, That it would not be hard for him to set their campes on fire, and thereby giue them a notable ouerthrow. Without helpe of some such stratageme, he fore-saw that it would be a worke of great difficulty for him, to proceed in his warres when time should serue. It was a plaine open Countrey wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great aduantage of him in number, especially in horse; which, vpon such ground, could not be resisted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought vpon the matter, the more needfull he found it for himselfe, to make some sudden attempt vpon their Campe. To this end hee sent many Embassadours, vnder pretence of treating about the Peace, but indeed of purpose to discouer all that might concerne the intended surprise. With these Embassadors he sent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers disguised like slaues; that wandering (as it were) idle vp and downe the Campe, might obserue the wayes and entrances, with whatsoeuer else was needfull. When he had learned as much as hee desired: vpon the sudden he sent word to Syphax, that it was vaine to hold any longer Treatie, forasmuch as he could not get the consent of his Councell of warre; without whose approbation, all that himselfe could doe, was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, to the end that, without any breach of faith, hee might put his designe in execution. The Truce being thus cut off, Asdrubal and Syphax were very pensiue; as hauing lately perswaded themselues, that their trouble was almost at an end. But since it could be no better, they began to deuise, by what art they might draw Scipio out of his Campe, and prouoke him to battaile in those Plaines. This if they could doe, they hoped to make his Councell of warre repent as greatly the refusall of peace, as did Marcus Atilius after the like presumption. But if he should refuse to come forth of his Trenches, what else remained than to besiege him: which they themselues were well able to do by land, and the Carthaginian fleet should doe by Sea, that was making ready for the purpose. By such discourses these two comforted themselues; recompencing (in conceipt) the losse of their hopes past, with that of victorie to come. But herein they were extreamly and worthily disappointed: for that consulting about the future, they prouided not against present danger, but continued in the same negligence, which was growne vpon them by the long discourse of peace. As for Scipio, he was not idle; but made preparation out of hand, as it were somewhat against Vtica. Two thousand Souldiers he had made ready, and appointed to take the same peece of ground, whereon he lay against Vtica before. This he did, partly to keep secret that which he had in hand, lest being suspected by his owne Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to haue notice of it; partly to hinder those of Vtica from setting vpon the few, that he purposed to leaue behinde him in his Campe. Hee caused his men that night to sup well, and betimes; that they might bee ready for the iourney. After supper, he appointed such Companies as hee thought fit, to the defence of his Campe; all the rest of the army he led forth, about nine of the clocke at night. The Carthaginians lay from him seauen miles and an halfe: whom he purposed to vndertake himselfe with the one halfe of his army; the other halfe he committed to Lelius and Masanissa, whom he sent before him to set vpon the campe of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the campe of Syphax should bee on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might seeme to haue taken hold by casualty vpon the Numidians, that lay farther off: whereas if it first appeared in the campe of Asdrubal, it would be suspected as the doing of enemies, and giue Syphax warning to look to himselfe. To this end therefore Scipio marched faire and softly; that Lelius and Masanissa, who had a longer iourney, and were to fetch a compasse about for feare of being discouered, might haue time to get before him, & do their feat. It was about two or three of the clocke in the morning, when the campe of Syphax began to blaze: which not onely the Numidians, but their king himselfe, imputed vnto casualty; as thinking themselues safe enough from enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interposed betweene them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to doe, some, starting halfe asleepe; and others, that had sitten vp late at drinking, ranne out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But so great was the tumult, that they neither could rightly vnderstand in what case they were, nor giue any remedie to the mischance, as it was ſuppoſed. Many were ſmothered and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for feare of the ſudden miſchiefe, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that eſcaped the fire, fell vpon the enemies ſword, which was ready to receiue them. Eſpecially Maſaniſſa, that beſt knew the Countrie, did great execution vpon them, hauing laid all the waies, by which hee foreſaw that they would ſeeke to eſcape. The Carthaginians perceiuing this fire, thought none other than that it was a pitifull miſchance: ſo that ſome ranne out to helpe the poore Numidians, carrying onely what would ſerue to quench the fire. Others ranne vp to the Rampart: where, fearleſſe of any danger towards themſelues, they ſtood beholding the greatneſſe of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out right as Scipio would haue it. He therefore loſt no time: but ſetting vpon thoſe that were running towards the Numidians, he killed ſome, and purſued the reſt back into their campe, which in a little while he made to burne as bright, as did that of Syphax. Aſdrubal ſeeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not ſtand to make reſiſtance, but ſhifted onely for himſelfe, and eſcaped with a few of his horſe about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had beene taken in ſuch a manner: it is more than probable, that old Hanno would haue iudged him worthy to be crucified. It would then haue beene ſaid, that with leſſe than one halfe of thirty thouſand men, hee might at leaſt haue giuen ſome bad recompence, to them that were taking pains in kindling theſe fires, had he not beene only carefull how to ſaue his owne fearefull head. Neuertheleſſe Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is moſt likely to haue beene true, That if Aſdrubal, or any of thoſe about him, would haue ſtriuen to ſhew valour, when the Campe was once on fire: He ſhould not thereby haue done any manner of good, becauſe of the tumult and conſternation. I ſhall not need to tell what a fearefull thing it was, to heare the cries of ſo many thouſands that periſhed by fire and ſword, or to behold the cruell flame that conſumed them; which (as Polybius affirmes) none that hath beeing is able to deſcribe. It is enough to ſay, That of thoſe many thouſands very few did eſcape; which accompanied Aſdrubal and Syphax in their ſeuerall wayes of flight. Beſides theſe alſo there were ſome ſcatterers, eſpecially of the Numidians, that ſaued themſelues in the darke: but they were not many, as after ſhall appeare. Surely it muſt needes haue beene very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwiſe made away, and what numbers eſcaped in the darke of night. Wherefore Liuie, who in the reſt of this Relation, as often elſewhere, doth follow Polybius, may ſeeme to haue followed ſome leſſe worthy Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in caſting vp the ſumme. For hee reckons onely two thouſand foot, and fiue hundred horſe, to haue eſcaped; forty thouſand to haue periſhed by ſword or fire; and aboue ſixe thouſand to haue bin taken priſoners: the whole number of all which together, is farre ſhort of fourteſcore and thirteene thouſand, which were in theſe two Campes.

Aſdrubal, putting himſelfe into the next town that was very ſtrongly fortified, thought there to finde the Romans worke, vntill the Carthaginians at good leiſure might repaire their Army. He had with him no more than two thouſand foot, and fiue hundred horſe: which hee thought ſufficient to defend the Towne; if the Towneſ-men would not be wanting to themſelues. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earneſt in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yeeld. Vnto this diſputation, hee well foreſaw, that the arriuall of Scipio would ſoone giue an end. Wherfore, leſt they ſhould lay hold vpon him, and ſeeke the Victors fauour by deliuering him vp; he ſhrunke away betimes, and made all haſte to Carthage. As for the towne, which he left; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his firſt comming: and thereby preſerued it ſelfe from all manner of loſſe. The two next Townes adioyning would needs be valiant, and make countenance of warre: but their ſtrength not being anſwerable, they were ſoone taken by Scipio, who abandoned them to the pleaſure of his Souldiers. This being done, hee returned to the ſiege of Vtica.

The Carthaginians were ſore troubled, as they had good reaſon; when, in ſtead of either Peace or Victorie, which they lately hoped for, they heard newes of ſuch a lamentable ouerthrow. Neceſſitie enforced them to make haſtie prouiſion for the future: but how to doe it, few of them ſaw any meanes. Some gaue aduice to craue peace of Scipio: others, to ſend for Hannibal out of Italy; but the moſt, and they which finally preuailed, were of opinion, That notwithſtanding the loſſe of this Armie, they might well defend themselues against the Romans, by raising new forces: especially, if Syphax would not leaue them. It was therefore concluded, That they should bend all their care this way, levying in all haste another Armie, and sending Embassadours to deale with Syphax, who lay then at a Towne called Abba, not passing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the same their vnfortunate Commander, Asdrubal the sonne of Gesco was employed to make new leuies of men: and Queene Sophonisba went forth with Embassadours to her husband Syphax, who hauing gathered together as many as hee could of his subiects that had escaped from the late slaughter, was thinking to returne into his owne kingdome. Sophonisba laboured so with her husband, that at length shee wanne him to her owne desire. And it fell out at the same time, that foure thousand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians, were brought ouer to serue in Africk. Of these were made such braue reports, as if their courage, and the armes which they vsed, were not to be resisted. Euen the multitude within Carthage beleeued these tales, and were more glad than they had cause to be; which is great wonder, sithee in one Age, the whole country of Spaine had beene twice conquered, first, by the Carthaginians themselues, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax these tales preuailed much: which the Carthaginian Embassadours helped with a lie; saying, That there were come ten thousand of these terrible Spaniards. Vpon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered such spirit, that in thirty dayes they made vp an Armie, consisting well-neere of thirty thousand men, reckoning the Spaniards, and Syphax with his Numidians in the number. So they incamped in a Region called, The Great Fields, about fiue dayes iourney from Vtica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Vtica thither, to visit them: leauing behinde him his impediments, with some part of his Armie, to make a shew of continuing the siege. Two or three dayes, after the meeting of both armies, passed away in skirmish, without any great thing done. It had now beene time for Asdrubal to follow the example of the Roman, Fabius, and seeke to weary out the Enemy by delayes. But either (which is likely) he was a farre worse Commander, or else, it was not in his power to giue such directions as best pleased himselfe. The fourth day the Armies met in battaile; wherein the Romans were marshalled by Scipio after their wonted manner, hauing their Italian horse in the right wing, and Masanissa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary side, Asdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax, the left; and the Spaniards, the battaile. The victorie was gotten without many blowes: for the vntrained followers of Syphax and Asdrubal, could not sustaine the first charge of the Italians, or of Masanissa. Onely the Spaniards fought a long time, euen vntill they were all in a manner slaine: rather as men desperate, and not hoping for mercy, since they were thus come out to fight against Scipio, who had otherwise deserued of them, than vpon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obstinacie was beneficiall to those that fled; for that it hindred the Romans from making any great pursuit. Hereby Asdrubal and Syphax escaped: Asdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home to his owne kingdome; whither his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scipio, hauing thus got ent the mastery of the field, tooke counsaile about the prosecution of the warre. It was resolued vpon as the best course, That he himselfe, with part of the Army, should attempt the Cities round about him: and that Masanissa, with his Numidians, and Lelius, with some of the Roman Legions, should follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take rest within his owne Kingdome, where easily else he might repaire his forces, and put them to new trouble. This aduice, it seemes that Masanissa gaue; who knew best the quality of the Numidians; and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a victory. The least that could be expected, was his restitution into his owne kingdome, vsurped by Syphax: which to accomplish, it no lesse concerned the Romans at the present, than it did himselfe. According to this order concluded, Lelius was sent away with Masanissa: and Scipio stayed behinde, carrying the warre from towne to towne. Many places yeelded for feare; many were taken by force; and all the subiects of Carthage wauered in their fidelity, as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of those vnreasonable burdens, which their proud Masters had laid vpon them for maintenance of the warre in Spaine and Italy. What to do in this case, the Carthaginians could hardly resolue. Fortune was their Enemy; they had lost their Armies, and many of their Townes: neither durst they make bold to trouble their owne subiects with any violent exaction of men or money; who nevertheless of their own free-wil were likely to giue little help. Very much it grieued them to ſend for Hannibal out of Italy: yet ſince there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Army; it was decreed, That Embaſſadours ſhould be forthwith ſent to call him home. Some there were that gaue aduice, to ſet out a fleete againſt that of Scipio, that rode before Vtica, weakly manned, and eaſie to be taken, whilſt Scipio himſelfe was buſied in the In-land Countries. Some were of opinion, That it ſhould be their principall care, to fortifie by all meanes the City of Carthage: vpon the ſafety whereof they ſaid all depended: adding, that whileſt they were true, and at vnity among themſelues, they might well enough ſubſiſt, and expect thoſe opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtleſſe) would preſent them. Theſe counſels were not reiected; but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning the defence of the City, and for the attempt vpon the Roman fleet at Vtica. Neuertheleſſe, it was conſidered, that hereby they ſhould onely protract the warre, without any aduancing their owne affaires towards likelihood of victory, no, though it ſhould fall out, that all the ſhippes at Vtica might be taken or deſtroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, That hee ſhould immediatly come ouer into Africke, as the laſt refuge of Carthage. The Councell was no ſooner broken vp, than all the Senators betooke themſelues to the execution of that which was decreed: ſome, to the fortification of the Towne: ſome, to make ready the Fleet; and ſome, appointed thereunto, forthwith to embarque themſelues for Italy.

In this their trepidation Scipio comes to Tunes, a City in thoſe dayes very ſtrong, and ſtanding in proſpect almoſt of euery part of Carthage. This place, or rather ſome defencible piece adioyning, he eaſily tooke; the garriſon forſaking it, and running away as ſoone as he drew neere. But whileſt he was about there to incampe, and fortifie himſelfe againſt the City, he might perceiue the Carthaginian Fleet ſetting forth, and making towards Vtica: What this meant, he readily conceiued, & ſtood in great feare, leſt his own ſhips, that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heauily loden with engines of battery, & wholly diſpoſed in ſuch order, as was moſt conuenient for aſſaulting the towne) ſhould make bad reſiſtance, againſt a fleet appointed for that ſpeciall ſeruice. Wherefore he haſted away towards Vtica, to aſſiſt with his preſence in this needfull caſe. It fell out well, that he had ſent his carriages, and all the great booty which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, hee ſhould haue come too late. Neither could he indeed haue beene there in due time, if the Carthaginians had vſed ſuch diligence as was conuenient. But they reſted one night in harbour by the way: and at their comming to Vtica, they tarried awhile to make a brauado; preſenting themſelues in order of battell, as if the Romans would haue put forth to Sea againſt them. But Scipio had no ſuch intent: hee thought it would be ſufficient, if he could preſerue his Gallies. As for the pleaſure of their brauerie at Sea, it ſhould little auaile the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and loſt their whole eſtate by Land. Wherefore he tooke his ſhips of burden, and faſtning them together with cables, in foure ranks, one behinde another, made a foure-fold bridge ouer the Channel of the Hauen; whereon he placed a thouſand of his choice men, with ſtore of Darts, and other caſting weapons, to make defence. Some open ſpaces he left, whereat his Frigots, and other ſmall Veſſels, might run out and backe againe vpon any aduantage or need: but theſe he couered with planckes, vſing the maſts and yards of his ſhips in ſtead of rafters, to ioyne all together, that his men might helpe one another, and the bridge it ſelfe not be torne aſunder. Scarce was this worke finiſhed, when the Carthaginians, ſeeing none iſſue forth againſt them, came into the Hauen. The fight betweene them and the Romans that were in the Hulks, was rather like to the aſſaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that ſtood vpon the bridge, had ſure footing, and threw their weapons downwards, with their whole ſtrength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and vnſteady, could not do. But the Roman Frigots & long boats, aduenturing forth from behind the bridge, were greatly ouer-born by the force of the Gallies; and were one occaſion of that ſmall loſſe which followed. They that ſtood vpon the Bridge were neither able to relieue them, nor yet could freely beſtow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for feare of hurting theſe their friends, that were intangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grapling hooks, hanging at Iron chaines. Theſe they threw vpon the maſts and yards which ſerued as arches to ioyne the bridge together: then rowing

ing backwards, they tore all aſunder; in ſuch ſort, that one ſhip followed another, and all the firſt ranke was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to ſaue themſelues as haſtily as they could, by ſhifting into the next ranke of ſhips, that lay behinde them vntouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themſelues any further in this laborious worke: but hauing haled away ſixe ſhips of burden, and towed them out of the Hauen, returned home to Carthage. Their wel-come was greater than their victory: becauſe among ſo many grieuous loſſes, onely this exploit had ſucceeded well, though it were of ſmall importance.

Whileſt things thus paſſed about Carthage, Lælius and Maſaniſſa, in their iourney againſt Syphax, found as good ſucceſſe as could be deſired. The fame of the victories already gotten, reſtored Maſaniſſa to his kingdome, without farther contention: the Maſæſyli, his ſubiects, ioyfully receiuing him, & forſaking the vſurpers. But here they ſtayed not: neither indeed would Syphax permit them to be quiet. He had ſuch abundance of men and horſes, that he felt not greatly the loſſes paſt: and therfore being ſollicited by Aſdrubal and Sophonisba, hee prepared againe for warre. But beſide the inſtigation of his beloued wife; the loſſe of the Maſæſili would let him take no reſt: neither was it the purpoſe of Lælius and Maſaniſſa, to giue him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no leſſe vnwillingly from that which they haue gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance; but to thinke all alike their owne, whereof they are in poſſeſſion, bee the title vnto ſome part neuer ſo vniuſt. Hereunto alludes the fable of the young Kite; which thought that ſhe had vomited vp her owne guts, when it was onely the garbage of ſome other fowle, that ſhee had haſtily ſwallowed, and was not able to digeſt. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, beleeued the kingdome of the Maſæſili to be part of his entrailes: Lælius and Maſaniſſa will ſhortly giue him ſomewhat that ſhall make him caſt his gorge. For to this purpoſe chiefly are they come ſo farre. It concerned the Romans to diſpoſſeſſe (if it might be) that king, whoſe falſe and hollow friendſhip towards them, had beene conuerted into ſtrong enmity; as alſo to ſet in his place another, who might do them ſuch good offices, as Syphax had lately done vnto the Carthaginians. How eaſily this might be effected, Maſaniſſa knew beſt, as being well acquainted with the nature of thoſe Countries, wherein, euen to this day, though there be many ſtrong Towns, yet the fortune of a battaile is enough, to tranſlate the kingdome from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came againſt them with no leſſe an Armie, than his former, and marſhalled in the Roman order, according to the skill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, long agoe ſent vnto him out of Spaine from Cn. Scipio. But though he could teach his men how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight couragiouſly. They were a rabble of all ſorts, gathered vp in haſte: and few of them had ſeene warre before. Encamping neere vnto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that ſome ſmall troupes of horſe on both ſides, encountred one another in the mid-way: and they that had the worſt, were ſtranded by other of their fellowes. By continuance of the skirmiſh, more and more were drawne out from either Campe: ſo that at length Syphax, vnwilling to diſ-hearten his men by taking any foyle at their firſt meeting with the Enemy, came vp with all his horſe, which were the beſt part of his forces, and therewith ouer-charged Maſaniſſa, whoſe numbers were farre leſſe. But whileſt he was proſecuting his hope of victory: ſome Roman ſquadrons of Foot came againſt him through their own Troupes of horſe; which fell to the ſides, and made a lane for them. So their battaile ſtanding now more firme, than a little before, Syphax was vnable, though hee laboured much in vaine, to make them giue ground. Maſaniſſa likewiſe, and his Troupes grew confident vpon this aſſiſtance: and charging afreſh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, cauſed him to giue backe. Herewithall the Legions came in ſight: which terrified ſo the Numidian horſe, that they beganne preſently to diſ-band. Faine would Syphax haue ſtayed them from flight: and to that end made head in perſon againſt the Romans; with hope, that his men would be aſhamed to leaue him. But it fell out vnhappily, that hee was caſt from his horſe; which receiued a wound, and ſo taken priſoner. Of others that were ſlaine or taken, the multitude was not great. It ſufficed, that they forſook the place, and fled, and that their king, vpon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Maſaniſſa told Lælius, that this victory ſhould make an end of the Numidian war, if preſently they haſted away to Cirta the chiefe City of the kingdome; whither he himſelfe deſired

to be sent before with the Horse, carrying Syphax along with him. Hereunto Lelius agreed. Masanissa comming to Cirta, before any newes of the Kings mischance was there arriued, called out the chiefe of the City to parlee: wherein by many faire promises and threats, but especially by shewing vnto them Syphax bound, he preuayled so farre, that the gates were forthwith opened vnto him; and euery one stroue to get his fauour, that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the rest, Queen Sophonisba yeelded her selfe into his hands, and vehemently besought him, that she might not be deliuered vp vnto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beauty, so commended her suite, that Masanissa forthwith granted it, and to make good his promise, married her himselfe that very day: thereby to preuent Lelius and Scipio from determining otherwise of her, since she was his wife. But Lelius, when he came thither, tooke the matter hainously, so that at first he would haue haled her away, together with Syphax and other prisoners, and haue sent her vnto Scipio. But being ouer-intreated by Masanissa, hee suffered the matter to rest a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's discretion: to whom he sent away Syphax and other captiues immediately; following shortly after himselfe with Masanissa, when they had done what was needfull in the kingdome.

At the comming of Syphax, there was great ioy in the Roman Campe: the mighty Armies which he had lately brought into the field; and his entertainment of Scipio and Asdrubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together sought his friendship: with such other commemoration of his past and present fortune, ministring to euery one a large argument of discourse. Scipio demanded of him, what had moued him, not onely to forsake the Roman friendship, but to make warre vpon them, vnprouoked. He briefly answered, That his wife had moued him so to doe; calling her a Fury, and a pestilent creature: and saying, that Masanissa was no wiser than himselfe, since hee had now taken the same woman to his wife, who would shortly draw him to the same courses. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and stood in great doubt, lest this perillous woman should deprive him of Masanissa, as she had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Masanissa and Lelius came vnto him: both of whom together he louingly welcomed, and highly commended in publique, for their notable seruice in this Expedition. Then taking Masanissa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him vnderstand, that the Romans had title to her head, and that she was a mischieuous enemy of theirs. Wherefore he intreated him to moderate his affections: and not to deface the memory of his great seruices already done, (for which he should bee highly rewarded to his owne contentment) by committing a great offence vpon little reason. Masanissa blusht, and wept: and finally promised to be gouerned by Scipio, whom hee neuertheless intreated, to thinke vpon his faith giuen to Sophonisba, that she should not be deliuered into the Romans power. So he departed to his owne Tent, where, after some time spent in agony, he called vnto him a seruant of his that had the custody of his poyson (which Princes vsed then to haue in a readinesse, against all mischances that might make them vnwilling to liue:) and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, sent it vnto her with this message; That gladly he would haue had her to liue with him as his wife: but since they who had power to hinder him of his desire, would not yeeld thereto, he sent her a cup, that should preserue her from falling aliue into the hands of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and estate, and accordingly to take order for her selfe.

At the receit of this Message and Present, shee onely said; That if her husband had no better taken to send vnto his new wife, she must accept of this; adding, That she might haue dyed more honourably, if she had not wedded so lately before her funerall. And herewithall she boldly dranke off the poyson. Thus Liuie reporteth. But Appian varies from this, and sets it downe agreeably to that which hath beene spoken before, concerning the pre-contract betweene Masanissa and Sophonisba. He saith, That after the taking of Syphax, Embassadours from Cirta met with Lelius and Masanissa vpon their way thither, yeelding vp their City, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her owne priuate, sent messengers to excuse her marriage with Syphax, as made against her will, by compulsion of those in whose power she was. Masanissa readily admitted this excuse, and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had receiued information from Syphax, how cunning in perswasion Sophonisba was; and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage; hee fell out about her with Masanissa at his returne, and challenged her, as a part of the booty belonging to the Romans. Masanissa said, she, was his owne wife, and vnto him betrothed many yeeres before. But Scipio would not heare of this; or if it were true, yet he said it was no reason, that Masaniſſa ſhould keepe her in poſſeſſion, as long as it was diſputable, vnto whom ſhe might appertaine. Wherfore he willed him firſt of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claim vnto her, wherein he ſhould haue no wrong. Herewithall he ſent to fetch her away: and Masaniſſa accompanied the meſſengers, as it were to deliuer her: but making her acquainted with the neceſſity, gaue vnto her a cup of poyſon, wherwith ſhe ended her life, before they came that ſhould haue apprehended her. So hee ſhewed vnto the Romans her dead body, which he royally interred. The ſudden violence of Maſaniſſa his loue, and the ready conſent of Sophonisba to marry with him: adde not ſo much credit vnto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other euident cauſe (which Liuie notes) of the ſudden falling out between him and the Carthaginians, vnder whom he had bin trained vp, and done them great ſeruice. Howſoeuer it were; Scipio, hearing of this tragicall accident, ſent for Maſaniſſa, and comforted him as well as he could, leſt his melancholy ſhould leade him to ſome inconuenience. Hauing therefore gently reboked him for his raſhneſſe, he brought him forth in preſence of the Army: where extolling his noble acts, and ſhewing how highly he had deſerued of the City of Rome, he proclaimed him King, and gaue vnto him a Crowne of gold, with other royall ornaments. This was indeed the ready way to diuert his thoughts from the ſad remembrance of that which was paſt, vnto the more cheerefull contemplation of good fortune, that began to ſmile vpon him.

This was the firſt time that the Romans took vpon them to create or proclaim a king. Which honour though Maſaniſſa well deſerued: yet would not the Title haue redounded vnto his great benefit; neither ſhould he haue beene much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their meanes recouered poſſeſſion of his Country, together with the greateſt part of Syphax his Dominions. It ſeemeth not vnlikely, that had he remained a Neuter in theſe warres, and ſuſtained himſelfe with his troupe of horſe, in ſuch ſort as he did before the comming of the Romans; he might neuertheleſſe haue recouered his proper inheritance, by the loue of his owne ſubiects, without other helpe, when Syphax had once or twice beene vanquiſhed. As for the inlargement of his kingdome, it was not more than he deſerued: neither were the Romans then in caſe, to make a conqueſt of Numidia for themſelues; neither could they haue wiſhed a fitter opportunity, than of ſuch a man, vpon whom to beſtow it, that was their aſſured friend, and paſſable withall among the Numidians, as being (for the Maſæſyli were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the ſame Nation. Yet this liberality of the Romans, was noyſed abroad as very glorious: and the Romans themſelues, in a politicke ſort of grauity, tooke highly vpon them; as if euen their ſaluting him by the name of King, had beene a matter of great conſequence. He thriued indeed well after it: and by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, incroaching vpon his neighbours on all ſides; but moſt of all vpon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little diſpleaſed. Hence it grew that Vermina the ſonne of Syphax (of whom we ſhall ſhortly ſpeake more) which held ſome piece of his fathers kingdome, deſiring friendſhip of the Romans, and promiſing by all meanes to deſerue their loue, requeſted therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were ſo, that neuer any before him had made this a matter of ſuit: yet the Roman Senate was puntilious herein, and anſwered very grauely, That it was not their cuſtome to giue the honour of that appellation, ſaue onely vnto ſuch kings, as had greatly deſerued of their City. Thus they made it a matter of State; & in proceſſe of time grew ſo proud of this their imaginary prerogatiue, that they imputed as a ſingular benefit vnto Kings, that no way depended vpon them, the ſaluation by * that name, though it were not accompanied with any other fauour or profit thence redounding.

§. XIX.

The Carthaginians deſire Truce, and breake it.

THe Carthaginians were extreamely diſmayed, when they heard of the great calamity, that was befalne their good friend Syphax; and vnderſtood that Maſaniſſa their immortall enemy, had got poſſeſſion of his kingdome. To increaſe their feare, Scipio returned againe to Tunes in view of their City: where hee made an end of that Fortification, which hee had begun at his laſt being there. The Carthaginians had neither forces, nor courage, to withstand him: but their hearts so failed them, that they sent forth vnto them thirty Embassadors, Princes of the city, which were their Priuy Councell, to make suite for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not onely prostrate themselues on the ground, but kissed the * feet of him, and of those that sate in Councell with him.

* Excerpt. è Polib. lib. 15. Liu. lib. 30.

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed themselues to haue vniustly broken the Peace between them and Rome, and to haue deserued whatsoeuer punishment it should please the Romans to inflict vpon them. Yet they humbly besought Scipio and the rest, that in common regard of those misfortunes, whereto all men are subiect, they would shew mercy vnto the city of Carthage, and let it remaine, as a monument of their clemency; which, by the folly of her Citizens, had now twice deserued to be ouerthrown. Herewithal they did not forget, to lay the blame vpon Hannibal: who without their appoyntment had beguune the warre; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole Citie. By this it appeares, that these Embassadours were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanno, and the choice of his company; who had now their long desired worke in hand, of suing vnto the Romans for peace. Whatsoeuer they were, it must needs be that they were most insolent men ouer those that were subiect vnto their power: for they would not haue made such adoration to the Romans in their owne necessity, vnlesse they themselues had expected the like, where they had the aduantage.

It was not vnknowne to Scipio, or to his assistants, in what poore case the city of Rome then was; and how vnable to defray the charges of continuing the war. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the losse of so many Armies, in such ill case, as the Romans themselues had very lately beene. For they had money enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a Citie farre stronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrusted the wals of Carthage, though Vtica, a weaker Citie, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Army, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission, and told them, That though hee came into Africke, to make a conquest, and not a Peace: yet hauing the Conquest as it were in his hand, he would not deny to grant them the Peace which they desired; for thereby should all Nations vnderstand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of Iustice, both in making warre, and in concluding it. The Conditions which he imposed vpon them, were these; That they should render vp vnto him all the prisoners that they had taken, together with all Renegadoes and fugitiue slaues: That they should withdraw their Armies out of Italie and Gaule: That they should not meddle in Spaine, nor yet in any Iland betweene Italy and Africke: That they should deliuer vp all their shippes of warre, saue twenty; and that they should pay a great summe of money, with certaine hundred thousand bushels of wheat and barley. To consider of these Articles, he gaue them three dayes: and when they had approued them, he granted a Truce; that they might send Embassadours vnto the Roman Senate.

This done, Masanissa was dismissed, and went home into his kingdome, as if the warre had beene already at an end. Syphax was a little before sent with Lelius vnto Rome: where the fame of these victories filled men with ioy, and gaue hope, that the long endured miseries would be shortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were set open; and an holy day appointed for thankesgiuing and supplication to their gods. Lelius was accompanied with Embassadors from King Masanissa: who gratulating the happy successe of the Romans in their African warre, and giuing thankes vnto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio vnto their Master, made request for the Numidians, such as were now his subiects and prisoners in Rome, that they might be bestowed vpon him, who by rendring them to liberty, should doe an act very plausible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reigne. The Roman Senate were not behind with Masanissa in complement: but shewing themselues to be highly pleased with all that Scipio had done, and should do for him, they called him King againe; released his Numidians that were captiues; and sent him two purple Cassocks, that had each of them one gold button, with such other presents, as in time of their pouerty might serue to testifie their good will. Scarcely were these and Lelius gone from Rome, when the newes came, that Embassadors from Carthage were arriued to desire peace. These Embassadors were not admitted into the Citie, but were lodged without: vntill Lelius being sent for, came backe from Ostia, to be present when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience giuen them in the Temple of Bellona, that stood in the Suburbs. The errand of these Embassadours, was peace, but the meaning of them and of their City, was onely to winde time, and get respite for warre; vntill Hannibal and Mago should come out of Italy, either to chase the Romans out of Africk, or to obtain peace for Carthage, by vertue of their great names and Armies, vpon more easie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle discourse of the League, that was concluded between them and Lutatius Catulus, at the end of the former warre. This League they said, all things well considered, did still remaine in force: neither had there since beene any warre at all, betweene the people of Rome & the Carthaginians. For it was onely Hannibal, that, without any leaue from Carthage, had of his owne head besieged and razed the Towne of Saguntum: and after that aduentured in like sort, without Commission, to passe the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italy. This being so, their Message was none other than to desire, that the League before spoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter stand in force, as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to doe. The Senators had cause to wonder at this tale, hearing these Embassadors make (as it were) a iest of a warre that had beene so terrible. Wherefore they asked them a great many questions, concerning that Peace made by Lutatius, and other passages following betweene the two Cities. But they excused themselues, by their age: (for they were all yong men) and said, That those things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but collusion, and that they sought no other than to gaine time, vntill they might repaire the warre. Wherefore they were sent home in company of Lelius, without any conclusion at all of peace; and, in effect, without answer. This notwithstanding, wee finde in Polybius, That the Senate receiuing aduertisement from Scipio, of that which had passed between him and the Carthaginians in this Treatie of peace, approued the Conditions by him propounded, and gaue him licence thereupon, to proceed vnto conclusion. This may with good reason bee beleeued, since it was not vnknowne, that if the warre continued, all these goodly hopes must rest vpon the most vncertaine issue of one battell between Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune should bee auerse to them, their forces in Africke were no better than quite lost. Excerpt. è Polyb. lib. 15.

Matters thus hanging in suspence, before the Carthaginian Embassadors came backe from Rome, a Fleete out of Sicil, wherein were two hundred shippes of burden, and thirty Gallies, being bound for Africke, to victuall the Roman Campe, was ouer-taken by foule-weather at Sea, and hardly escaping wreck, was dispersed, and driuen aground in diuers parts of the Bay of Carthage, euen in view, and vnder command of the Citie. There was at that time, as wee finde in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuals in Carthage, which caused the people to cry out vpon their Magistrates, that the should not let such a booty escape them, saying, that the danger of famine was greater and worse, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were so that hunger vrged them, or that they yeelded to their owne greedy desires: the multitude in Carthage vnderstood (as it seems) that all this discourse of Peace in hand, was no better than meere mockery, and therefore cared not for obseruation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewise in Alexandria, for all the rascality, together with women & boyes, to be medling in vproares; the clamors of the boyes being in such tumults no lesse violent than of the men. Wherefore it is no marualle, if little regard were had of reason, or of honour, in any such commotion. A Fleete was sent out vnder Asdrubal, to gather vp the dispersed Roman shippes of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oares, recouered the station whereto their camp adioyned) and bring them into Carthage; which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not onely for the losse, and for that the Towne was thereby relieued; but for that by this breach of Truce, he fore-saw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the war, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he sent Embassadours vnto them, both to require satisfaction for the iniury done; and to deterre them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had so much desired. These gaue the Carthaginians to vnderstand, That Letters were come from Rome vnto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the Peace, vpon those conditions which he had propounded. But (said they) we hold it strange, That ye, who so lately haue cast your selues to the ground before vs, and kissed our feete,

after an vnusuall manner of humilitie, confessing your selues to haue perfidiously broken the League that was betweene vs, and thereby to haue deserued such punishment as is due vnto Rebels; should so soone forget what ye then vttered, and runne headlong againe into the same crimes, for which ye acknowledged your selues worthy to be destroyed, hauing onely recourse vnto our mercy. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repose in Hannibal, that thus emboldens you. Yet were it not amisse, that yee should consider, how long he hath bin pent vp in a corner of Italy, among the Brutians; where he is in a manner besieged, and vnable to stirre: so that ye are like to find his helpe wanting in your greatest need. Or let it be supposed, that he were now in Africke, and ready to giue vs battaile: yet should it well agree with your wisedome, to doubt what might befall; remembring that he is a man, and not inuincible. Now if it should happen that he were ouercome, what refuge haue ye left vnto your selues against hereafter? what gods will yee either sweare by, to be beleeued, or call vpon in your misery? what words, and lamentable gesture will ye henceforth vse, to moue compassion? Surely yee haue already wasted all your force of perswasion, and shall not againe obtaine vs, if ye refuse the grace, whereof at this present ye are capable. It is no marueil though the Carthaginians were angry, when they heard themselues vpbraided with the base demeanor of their Embassadours. For it was not the generall opinion of the Citie, that the Truce was broken by themselues: though it had pleased Hanno, or such as were of his faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of submission; and to renounce not onely their hope of the future, but all iustification of matters past. And indeed it seemes, that the Roman Embassadours were very much delighted, in the rehearsall of that point which was yeelded vnto them; as knowing that thereon depended the iustice of the quarell. But the Carthaginians took this in so ill part, that hardly they could refraine from doing violence vnto the men, who had vsed vnto them such insolent speeches. Yet the fury of the multitude was in some sort appeased; either by Hanno, whom Appian, (I know not why) calles Hanno the Great: or by the very reuerence, due vnto the place of those that had vttered such liberall words. So they were dismissed in friendly sort, although it were without answer to their Proposition. There were also two gallies appointed for their safe conuoy home; though with little intent of good vnto their persons. Asdrubal was then in the mid-way, as men sailed from Carthage towards Vtica. He, whether onely desirous to please the multitude, of whose disposition he was informed, or whether directed by publike order to cut off these Embassadours in their way homeward, lay waiting for them behinde a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the riuer Bagradas. Their Conuoy hauing brought them on the way, as farre as to the mouth of Bagradas, wished them a good voyage; and so tooke leaue of them, as if they had beene then in safety, since the Roman Camp was euen in sight. The Embassadours tooke this in ill part, not as fearing any danger toward; but thinking themselues too much neglected, forasmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leaue them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Asdrubal fell vpon them, in such manner, as they might well discerne his purpose; which was to haue stemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquereme, that had more bankes of Oares, than had any Gallie of Asdrubal, they slipt away, and made him ouer-shoot himselfe. Yet hee gaue them chase, and had well-neere surprised them. But they discouered some Roman Companies on the shoare ouer against them, and therefore aduentured to runne their vessell aground: whereby they saued their owne liues, though a great part of their company were slaine, or hurt. This practice of the Carthaginians was inexcusable: and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartned in such a dishonorable attempt, by those that were desirous to continue the warre; that thereby they might bee driuen to studie nothing else, than how to get the victory, as hauing none other hope remayning. Yet likely it is, that the same feare, which had caused them to make such earnest suite for peace, would also haue caused them to be better aduised, than thus to abandon all hope of Treatie: had they not been giuen to vnderstand, that Hannibal was already landed in Africk, in whom they reposed no small confidence; but verily perswaded themselues, that he would change their fortune, & teach the Romans to hold themselues contented with more easie conditions, than were those that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

§. XX.

In what sort Hannibal spent the time after the battaile of Metaurus. The doings of Mago in Italy. Hannibal and Mago called out of Italy. How the Romans were grieuously affected by Hannibals departure.

Euen since the losse of that battaile at Metaurus, Hannibal remained in the Countrey of the Brutians, waiting for another supply from Carthage. The Roman Consuls that succeeded vnto Claudius and Liuius, by whom Asdrubal was ouercome and slaine, were contented to be quiet all their yeere. Neither did Licinius the Colleague of Scipio ought worthy of remembrance against Hannibal: being hindred by the pestilence that was in his Armie. Sempronius the Consul, who followed Licinius; and Cu. Seruilius Capio, who followed Sempronius, were earnestly bent to haue done somewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitlesse. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, they had the better; in some the worse: and a few poore Townes they got from him, as it were by stealth; his care being more to preserue his Armie, than to keepe those places that were weake.

The Romans had at this time so many great pieces of work in hand, that their chiefe enemy was become, not the chiefe part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent vpon Affrick, whereon they were at no small charges to maintaine the Armie, which (as was hoped) should bring the warre to a short and happy conclusion. They stood neuertheless in much feare of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who tooke exceeding paines among the Ligurians and Gaules to raise an Armie, wherewith to kindle anew the warre in Italy, that beganne to waxe cold. Mago solicited also the Hetrurians, and found them so readie to stirre in his behalfe, that if he could haue entred their Country strong, it might haue proued no lesse needfull for Scipio to returne home out of Affrick, than shortly it was for Hannibal, to make speed vnto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romans to imploy one of their Consuls or Proconsuls, with an Armie, among the Hetrurians, another among the Gaules, and a third among the Ligurians: forasmuch as it was vncertaine, vpon which side Mago would breake out. Being thus busied, it is no wonder though they forbore to ouercharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in some readines for his setting forwards, he met in the country of the Insubrians, which is about Millan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconsul, and P. Quintilius Varrus one of the Prætors. With these he fought a battaile, wherein though his vertue shewed it selfe worthy of his father and brethren, yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtfull, in such sort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prætor, taking vnto him all the Roman Horse, thought to haue shaken the Enemies to pieces. The Legions at the same time gaue a loud shout: and strained themselues hard, as if at that brunt the victory should haue beene carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse: the seruice of those beasts being fitter for such vse, than against the Squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent, and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered ouer the field, their Riders being vnable to manage them. Hereby the Numidians got aduantage vpon them: whose manner of fight was more auaileable against those that were loose, than against the Troupes that were close and thicke. Then fell the Elephants vpon the Legions: which entertained them after the accustomed manner, with a showre of darts, and killed foure of them; causing all the rest to giue backe. This notwithstanding, the same Legions were so vehemently pressed by the Enemie; that more for shame of running away, than by any great force to make resistance, they held their ground. The Proconsul therefore brought vp those forces, which he had kept vnto the last, to succour where need should most require. Against these Mago imployed some of his Gaules, whom he had in readinesse for the like occasion. But these Gaules discharged their parts very ill. They were soone beaten off, and recoiled so hastily, that they brought feare vpon all the rest. When Mago saw that his men began to shrinke, Hee put himselfe in the head of his Armie, and held them so well to it, that keeping their order, they made a faire Retrait, with their faces toward the Enemie. But at length hee receiued a grieuous wound in his thigh; whereof shortly after hee dyed. Hee was taken vp, and carried out of danger by some of his owne men: the reſt of them, after little further reſiſtance, prouided euery one for himſelfe: So the Romans obtained victory, not without great coſt; as purchaſing the death of about fiue thouſand enemies, with the loſſe of two thouſand and three hundred of the Prætors Armie, beſides thoſe that dyed of the Proconſuls Legions; alſo beſides diuers Colonels, Captaines, and Gentlemen of marke, that fell in this hot piece of ſeruice. Neither were there any priſoners taken; whereby it may ſeeme that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recouered ſome ground that might aſſure them from purſuit. However it were, this victory would haue much imported for the aſſurance of Italy, if the State of Carthage could longer haue permitted theſe valiant ſonnes of Amilcar to abide therein. But Mago with-drawing himſelfe (by eaſie iournies, becauſe of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embaſſadors from Carthage attending him: who gaue him to vnderſtand the pleaſure of their Citie, which was, That both hee and Hannibal ſhould preſently repaire home with all their forces; not ſtaying any longer to thinke vpon the conqueſt of Italy, ſince Carthage it ſelfe was ready to be loſt. He obeyed this Commandement, and imbarqued ſhortly his Armie; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the ſame time Hannibal receiued the like command from Carthage to returne into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnaſhing his teeth, and groaning, and hardly keeping in the teares, that were ready to burſt out, whileſt the Embaſſadors were deliuering their errand. When their meſſage was done; He told them, That this was yet plaine dealing. For, ſaid He, They that now directly bid mee come home, haue long agoe done their beſt to hale me out of Italy; though more cloſely and crookedly they went to worke, by ſtopping the ſupply, that ſhould haue enabled me to mannage the Warre here. Scipio therefore ſhall not need to bragge, that he hath drawne me home by the heeles: it is Hanno, that hath wrought this noble feat; and ouerwhelmed the houſe of the Barchines, for lacke of other meanes to doe it, with the ruine of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readineſſe, doubting that, which after came to paſſe: wherein he imbarqued, beſides his owne men, as many of the Italians, as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were, that ſhrunke backe from him, and refuſed to doe ſeruice in this Expedition: of whom ſuch as he could take he ſlew; not ſparing thoſe that fled into the Temple of Iuno Lacinia, which had been held an inuiolable Sanctuary vnto that day. He was indeed then wholly tranſported with rage; and departed out of Italy no leſſe paſſionate, than men are wont to be, when they leaue their owne Countries to goe into exile. Hee looked backe vnto the ſhore: accuſing both gods and men; and curſing his owne dulneſſe, in that hee had not ledde his Armie from Cannæ, hot and bloudied as it was, directly vnto the walls of Rome. With ſuch vexation of ſpirit He quitted the poſſeſſion of Italy; wherein he had liued almoſt halfe his time.

If it could haue been foretold vnto the Romans, in the firſt beginning of this Warre, with what exceeding ioy in times following they ſhould entertaine the newes of Hannibal his departure out of Italy: they would (I thinke) leſſe earneſtly haue preſſed the Carthaginians to ſend him ouer thither. When ſure aduertiſement was brought vnto the Citie, that Hannibal was gone with all his Armie: an Holy-day was appointed for thankſgiuing vnto their gods; & extraordinary great ſacrifices publiquely made, for ioy of ſuch happy tidings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did ſtill remaine the ſame, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal at his comming into Africk, would finde P. Scipio other manner of worke, than he had been troubled with at any time before; and would doe greater matters in his owne Country, than euer he was able to performe abroad in a land of ſtrangers. The remoue of the war from their owne doores, and the conceit of that victory for which they hoped; was enough to make them preſume further, than at other times they would haue done. When therefore the Saguntine Embaſſadors brought vnto them a great maſſe of Gold and Siluer, together with ſome Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spain: only the Carthaginian priſoners were accepted; the treaſure was rendred back vnto the Saguntines that had ſurpriſed it. Vpon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of thoſe monies, that had bin borrowed in time of more neceſſity from priuate men. Hence alſo proceeded the ſeuere chaſtiſement, laid vpon thoſe 12. Colonies, that for want either of meanes, or of good will, had refuſed to giue aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and inforced, to giue double the number of Foot to that which they had had beene wont to ſet out for the Warres, with a proportion of Horſe anſwerable to the very moſt of their ability. So confident were the Romans growne (though their wealth were not as yet ſutable to the greatneſſe of their ſpirit) vpon the good ſucceſſe of the battaile at Metaurus, and the hopes which they repoſed in Scipio. All this notwithſtanding, when they conſidered more neerely of that which might happen; and were informed, that the terrible Armie, whereof Italy had beene few daies ſince diſcharged, was landed ſafe in Africk: they began to reuolue a thouſand fearefull matters in their heads, and to ſtand in doubt, leſt Q. Fabius (who died about the ſame time) would bee found a true Prophet. For, bethinking themſelues of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories againſt Syphax & Aſdrubal no ſpecialty of ſuch great worth, as might promiſe the like ſucceſſe againſt another manner of Generall, followed by other manner of men, than were either of thoſe two. The Numidian King had beene wont to bring into the field a raſcall multitude of halfe-ſcullions, that were good for nothing, being himſelfe a fit Captaine for ſuch Souldiers. Likewiſe Aſdrubal the ſonne of Giſco, was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate; but otherwiſe one, that in the field was only good at ſauing himſelfe by a ſwift retrait. But now there came an Armie of men, hardened from their childhood with incredible patience, fleſhed many hundred times in Roman bloud, and wearing the ſpoyles, not onely of good ſouldiers, but of braue Captaines, by them ſlaine. Such talke vſed the people of Rome, ſaying, That Scipio was like to meet in battell, with many that had ſlaine Roman Prætors, yea and Conſuls, with their owne hands; with many, that had been firſt in getting ouer the Trenches of ſeuerall Roman Camps, or in winning the tops of wals at the ſiege of Townes; briefly, that he ſhould now be oppoſed by an Armie, as good as euer had ſerued in warre, and following the dreadfull name of Hannibal.

§. XXI.

Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio; treates with him about peace in vaine, loſeth a battaile at Nadagara, and perſwades the Carthaginians to ſue for peace. Of the peace granted from Rome to Carthage.

HAnnibal diſembarqued his Army at Leptis, almoſt an hundred miles from Carthage, Eaſtward from the Headland of Mercurie, and ſomewhat more then one degree to the South. He was ill prouided of Horſe; which it was not eaſie for him to tranſport out of Italie. Therefore it behoued him to land, as he did, ſomewhat farre from the Enemy; that hee might furniſh himſelfe of theſe and the like needfull helpes, againſt the day of battell. From Leptis he paſſed on to Adrumetum, and ſo along through the In-land Country, gathering friends vnto him by the way. Tycheus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was ſaid to haue in thoſe dayes the beſt Horſes of ſeruice, that were to be found in Africk: Him therefore did Hannibal allure vnto his partie; making him vnderſtand, that if the Romans got the victory, it ſhould be eaſie for Maſaniſſa, by their countenance and helpe to oppreſſe both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes as hindered his proſpect. This argument, and the fame of him that vſed it, preuailed with Tycheus; who ſhortly after brought vnto the Carthaginian two thouſand Horſe. Appian further addes, That Mezetullus, (the ſame who had made himſelfe Protector ouer Maſaniſſa his Couſins; and was Head of a Family, and aduerſe to the Numidian kings of that race) brought to Hannibal another thouſand Horſe: as likewiſe that Vermina the ſon of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers kingdom, began at the ſame time to aſſaile the places that yeelded obedience to Maſaniſſa. This Vermina, as we finde in Liuie, came with more than 16. thouſand men (for he loſt more than ſo many) to ſuccour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in ſuch hard eſtate, or (at leaſt) ſo impatient of the ſtate wherein they were, that they could not attend the leiſure of thoſe preparations, which would haue made the victory aſſured. When they conſidered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatneſſe of his Acts: it offended them to thinke, that they had beene ſo baſe as to make humble ſuit vnto the Romans for peace, whileſt they had ſuch a braue Champion aliue, to maintaine their cauſe by Warre. But when as they bethought themſelues of their owne ſufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimity to indure them, appeared greater than indeed they were: then cried they out earneſtly, that it was no time to linger, but preſently to fight; that ſo they might ſee an end of theſe troubles, either good or bad: and to this purpoſe they ſent their Mandates to Hannibal: requiring him, without any further protraction, to doe what he could doe out of hand. Hannibal made anſwer, That they were his good Lords, and had power to diſpoſe of him and his Armie: but ſince he was Generall of their forces, Hee thought it reaſonable that they ſhould ſuffer him to doe as a Generall ought to doe; and to chooſe his owne times. Nteuertheleſſe, to giue them ſatisfaction, Hee made great marches to Zama; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce, made by the Carthaginians: The violence, done to his Embaſſadours: and the news of Hannibal his being landed in Africk; made Scipio to vnderſtand the reſolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yeeld vnto any conditions vnprofitable for themſelues, as long as they were able to make reſiſtance. Wherefore hee ſent vnto Maſaniſſa: and informed him of all that was fallen out; praying him to come away with ſpeed, and lay all other buſineſſe a-part. Tenne Roman Companies, of Horſe and Foot together, Maſaniſſa had with him; that were lent vnto him by Scipio, to doe him ſeruice in the eſtabliſhing and inlarging of his kingdome. But he well vnderſtood, that thoſe and many more beſides all his own forces would but little auaile him; if Hannibal ſhould driue the Romans out of Africke. Wherefore taking ſuch order as he could vpon the ſudden, for the ſafety of his owne kingdome; with foure thouſand Horſe, and three thouſand Foot he made all haſte vnto Scipio.

Soone after the beginning of theſe new troubles, the Carthaginian Embaſſadors that had been at Rome, returned backe vnder the conduct of Lælius and Fuluius: who brought them ſafe into the Roman Campe. There when they arriued, and vnderſtood what had lately paſſed, eſpecially how their Citizens had behaued themſelues towards the Roman Embaſſadours: they made little doubt, how their owne heads ſhould anſwer for ſuch notorious outrage. To confirme them in this opinion:

M. Babius one of the late Embaſſadors that had bin in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Camp, laid hands vpon them and detained them; ſending word vnto his Generall, who was gone abroad to make warre in the Country, that hee had them in his power, & that now the Carthaginians might be repaid in their owne Coyne, for the iniurie by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to heare of this; & commanded Babius to vſe them with all poſſible courteſie, & ſend them ſafe home. By thus doing, He brake the hearts of his enemies; & cauſed them to acknowledge themſelues (which was a great victory) far leſſe honourable than the Romans. This notwithſtanding, Hee made more cruell warre vpon them than before: taking their Townes by force; and putting them to ſacke, without hearkning to any Compoſition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they tooke a Town by aſſault, to put all that came in their way to the ſword, whatſoeuer they were, without regard. This they did, to make themſelues terrible: and the better to worke ſuch impreſſion in the minds of thoſe, with whom they had to do, they vſed oftentimes to kill the very Dogges and other Beaſts, that ranne athwart them in the ſtreets; hewing their bodies aſunder, as men delighted in ſhedding of blond. This being their practiſe at other times: it is likely, that now they omitted no piece of cruelty; when they meant to giue proofe of their vehement indignation, and reuengeful minds, for the iniuries receiued. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were ſo earneſt in preſſing Hannibal to fight.

Excerpt. è Polyb. lib. 10.

Hannibal being incamped at Zama, ſent forth his Scowts and Spies, to diſcouer where the Romans lay; what they were doing, and as much as might be of their demeanour. Some of theſe were taken, & brought vnto Scipio: who in ſtead of truſſing them vp, gaue them free leaue to view his Campe at pleaſure, appointing one to conduct them vp and downe, and ſhew them whatſoeuer they deſired. This done, Hee gaue them leaue to depart; and ſent them away ſafe vnto their Generall. Hannibal vnderſtanding this, admired the brauery and courage of his Enemy: with whom on the ſudden hee grew deſirous to haue an Enter-view, and perſonal conference; and ſignified ſo much vnto him, by a meſſenger ſent of purpoſe. Of this motion the Roman liked well, and returned anſwer, that Hee would meet him ſhortly in a place conuenient. The next day Maſaniſſa came with his Armie: whom Scipio taking with him, remooued vnto a Towne called Nadagara; neere vnto which he ſat downe, in a place otherwiſe commodious, & cloſe by

by a water that might opportunely serue his Campe. Thence hee sent word vnto the Carthaginian, That the time & place did fitly serue, if he had ought to say to him. Hannibal thereupon remoued from Zama, & came within foure miles of the Enemy: where he incamped well to his owne good liking in all things else, excepting that his men were driuen to take much paines in fetching their water somewhat farre off. Then was order taken for their meeting, and the two Generals, each of them with a troupe of Horse, rode forth of their Campes, till they came vnto a piece of ground, which was before well searched for feare of ambush. There they left their followers to stand off: and themselues with each of them one Interpreter, encountred each other in the mid-way betweene their Companies. They remained a while silent, viewing one the other with mutuall admiration. Then begann the Carthaginian, saluting the Roman, to deliuer his minde to this effect: That it had beene better both for Carthage and Rome, if they could haue limited and contained their ambition within the shores of Africk & of Italy; for that the Countries of Sicil and of Spaine, about which their fathers and themselues had striuen, were no sufficient recompence for so many Fleets as had been lost, and of so much blood as had beene shedde, in making those costly purchases. But since things past could not be recalled: He said, That it was meet for them to consider, vnto what extreame dangers their owne Cities had beene exposed, by the greedy desire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was euen time for them now at length, to make an end of their obstinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wisedome hereafter. And to such peaceable disposition Hee affirmed that his owne yeares and long triall of Fortune both good and euill, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience, might rather fixe his minde vpon vncertaine hopes, than vpon the contemplation of that mutability, whereto all humane affaires are subiect. *Yet (said he,) mine owne example may peraduenture suffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that same* Hannibal, who after my victory at Canna, wonne the greatest part of Italie: and deuised with my selfe, what I should doe with your Citie of Rome, which I hoped verily to haue taken. Once I brought mine Armie to your walles, as thou hast since brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, see the change! I stand heere entreating thee to grant vs peace. This may serue as a document of Fortunes instabilitie. I haue fought with thy father, Scipio: He was the first of the Romain Generalls, that euer met mee in the field. I did then little thinke, that the time would come, that I should haue such businesse, as now at the present, with his sonne. But this is euen one of Fortunes Pageants, whereof shee hath many. And thou maist haue experience of the like in thy selfe, who knowes how soone? Thinke vpon M. Atilius. If he would haue harkened vnto such perswasions, as I now vse to thee; he might haue returned home to Rome an happy man. And so maist thou doe now, if any reasonable offer will giue thee satisfaction. How saist thou? Canst thou be contented, that all Spaine, Sicil, Sardinia, and whatsoeuer Hands else are situate betweene Italie and Africke, bee abandoned by the Carthaginians for euer; and left vnto the Romans, to beare Dominion therein? Thou shalt haue glory enough by effecting thus much: and the Romans may well bee glad of such a bargaine. As for vs: our owne quiet shall henceforth giue vs contentment. And the same contentment of ours, shall make vs faithfully obserue the Peace with you. But if thou thinkest all too little, I must desire thee to ponder well how great an hazzard thou must vndergoe for obtaining a very little more, than that which thou maist haue without contention. It is now in thine owne power, to lay hold vpon good Fortune, if it please thee, stay but vntill to morrow night; and thou maist take such fortune, as it please the gods. The issue of battaile is vncertaine, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and steele wee shall each of vs bring into the field: but of the victory, neither of vs hath assurance. Let vs therefore without more adoe, make peace. And doe not tell me, that some false-hearted Citizens of ours dealt fraudulently of late in the like Treatie: It is I Hannibal that now desire peace with thee; which I would neuer doe, if I thought it not expedient for my Country. And thinking it expedient, I will alwaies maintaine it: like as I haue maintained, vnto my power, as long as the gods did not enuie me, the Warre by me begun.

Hereunto Scipio made answer, That it was no ambitious desire of ruling in Sicil and in Spaine which had moued the Romans to enter into this or the former War: but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had caused them to put on those armes; which the gods by the finall issue of the Warres had approued, and would approue to bee most iust. As for the mutability of Fortune hee said, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that without any note of insolence, or ouer-weening, he might well refuse the conditions offered. For was it not plaine, that all these Countries, with which the Carthaginians now so willingly departed, were already wonne from the Romans? If, said He, these Conditions had beene propounded whilest as yet yee detained some part of Italy, they might peraduenture not haue beene reiected. But as the case now stands, I see no reason, why I should remit vnto you any one piece of these my former demands; to which the Carthaginians haue yeelded already, and thought mee to be gracious in dealing so moderately. Rather I say, that the iniuries which they haue done me since, haue made them vnworthy of obtaining peace vpon so friendly termes. But I cannot blame thee, Hannibal, though thou wouldest be glad to make thy Citizens vnderstand, from how much of their burden they are by thy meanes eased. Onely thou must thinke, that in like sort it concernes me in honour, not to let them be gainers or sauers by the wrongs which they haue done of late. Thou knowest well, that besides those offers which thou here hast made, they were well contented to restore vnto vs ransome-free, all prisoners that they haue of ours; to pay vs fine thousand Talents; to deliuer vp their Gallies, and to deliuer hostages for assurance of faire dealing. And must they now be discharged of all this, by their breach of Truce, their spoyling of our Fleet, and their violating our Embassadors? Not so. But if they can be contented, besides all this, to make such amends as I shall require, for these iniuries newly done: then will I take aduice with my Councell what answer to giue you; otherwise, you may euen prepare for warre, and blame your owne selues for that I haue denied you peace.

Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his owne Campe, with no other newes than warre; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battaile, wherein should be decided the quarrell between Rome & Carthage. The next morning at breake of day they issued into the field: a notable march, and such as hath very seldome been found; whether we regard the Generals, their Armies, the two cities that contended; or the great importance of the battaile at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing first the Hastati, diuided into their Maniples, or small Battalions, with a reasonable distance betweene them: Not farre behinde these followed the Principes, likewise diuided; and so after them the Triarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinary custome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes opposite vnto the void spaces betweene the Hastati, that so the Hastati, as was vsuall, might fall backe betweene the Principes; but he placed them directly one behinde another, as it were, in File. This he did, because of the Elephants, whereof Hannibal had many. For of those beasts the danger was lesse, whilest there was open way to let them through. Therefore hee took such order, that when they had passed through the spaces betweene the first Battalions, they should not come vpon the Principes in Front. Vnto his Velites, or those of the light armature, that were to beginne the fight, he gaue direction, that when they found themselues to be ouer-charged, either by the Enemies, or (which was most to be feared) by the Elephants, they should runne backe through those lanes that were betweene the Maniples; and that those which were swiftest, or otherwise best able, should continue on their flight, vntill they were got behinde all their owne Armie; thereby leauing roome enough vnto those that were wounded, or cast behind, to saue themselues on the voyde ground, that was betwixt the first and second, or the second and third battailes, without cloying vp the way betweene the Maniples, which hee desired to keepe open. His Italian horse he placed in the left wing vnder C. Lælius. In the right wing was Masanissa with his Numidians. He himselfe riding vp and downe, exhorted his men to doe valiantly; vsing words, not many, but forcible. Hee bade them remember what they had atchieued, since their comming into Africk. He told them, that if this day were theirs, the warre was at an end: and that their victory in this war, should make them Lords of all the world; for that afterwards, none would be found able to resist them. On the contrary, if they were beaten, he asked them whither they would flie. They were farre from home, yea and farre from their owne standing Campe: neither was there any place in Africke, that would giue them shelter: if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therfore there was none other way, but death or victory: vnlesse they would liue like wretched slaues vnder most mercilesse Enemies. In such necessity, he said, that they which consider themselues to be, & take resolution answerable thereunto, haue neuer beene knowne to faile of getting victory. Hannibal on the other side placed his Elephants, that were more than fourescore, in Front of his Battaile. Next behinde theſe, he made his Vantguard all of Mercenaries, Ligurians, Gaules, Baleares and Moores. Then followed his Battaile: which was of Carthaginians & Africans, more intereſſed in the quarrell than were thoſe Mercenaries; though not ſo good ſouldiers: but to helpe (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them foure thouſand Macedonians, lately ſent from King Philip. More than the ſpace of a furlong behinde theſe came his Rereward, conſiſting of thoſe braue Souldiers which had ſerued him in his Italian warres; and were the onely men, in whom he repoſed any confidence. Oppoſite to Lelius, in his owne right wing hee beſtowed the Carthaginian Horſe. Tychæus and the Numidians he placed in his left wing againſt Maſaniſſa. Hee was indeed farre too weake for the Enemie in Horſe, both in number and in goodneſſe. For Tychæus and Mezetulus had no more than three thouſand; and thoſe not ſo well exerciſed, as were the foure thouſand of Maſaniſſa. The Carthaginians alſo were no more, nor none other than ſuch as could be leuied in the haſte of a few dayes; and the remainder of thoſe, that had of late beene often vanquiſhed, and accuſtomed to flye. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authoritie, to make theſe his companions alight and ſerue on foot, ſetting better men in their ſaddles. All that he could haue done, was to ſtay a little longer, and expect more helpe. Had Vermina the ſon of Syphax come thither, as he did in few dayes after, with ſixteene thouſand and vpwards, the moſt of them Horſe, the aduantage of number might haue ſerued well to ſupply all other defect. Yet ſince the Lords of Carthage would brooke no delay: Hannibal muſt be faine to comfort himſelfe, with the hope that he repoſed in his old Italian ſouldiers; whoſe vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more ſtrongly oppoſed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their ſeuerall conditions: promiſing vnto the Mercenaries bountifull rewards: threatning the Carthaginians with ineuitable ſeruitude, if they loſt that day; but eſpecially animating his old fellow-ſouldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained againſt farre greater numbers. Hee bade them to looke vpon the Enemies; and make an eſtimate, whether they were any thing like ſo many, as that huge Armie which they had ſlaughtered at Cannæ. Hee willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, euen the father of this man, whom they had firſt of all compelled to runne away. Hee told them, that theſe Legions which they yonder beheld, were, for the moſt part of them, the very worſt of the Roman Souldiers; euen ſuch, as for their daſtardly flight out of ſundry battailes, could no longer be truſted to beare Armes in their owne Countrie. As for the reſt: they were young men, the ſons of Cowards, and bred vp in the continuall feare of thoſe weapons, by which their fathers were daily ſlain or chaſed. Wherefore he entreated theſe his old companions, vpon whoſe vertue hee meant wholly to repoſe himſelfe, that they would this day ſtriue to make good their honour; and to purchaſe the fame of men inuincible.

Such exhortations vſed the two Generals before the fight. When they drew neere together, the Numidian Horſemen on both ſides began to skirmiſh. The Trumpets, and other inſtruments of warre, ſounded to battaile: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to breake vpon the Romans. Of theſe Elephants (as they were alwaies an vncertaine kind of help) thoſe that ſtood neere vnto the point of the left wing, turned back for feare: and ran vpon their own Numidian Horſe; which they affrighted and diſordered. Maſaniſſa eſpying this, gaue charge vpon the ſame Numidians; and not ſuffering them to re-ally themſelues, draue them quite out of the field. The reſt of thoſe beaſts made a great ſpoile of the Roman Velites, whom they followed into the ſpaces between the Maniples: but without any harm to the Battalions themſelues; which gaue them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well prouided. Diuers of them receiuing many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be gouerned: but ran backe vpon the right point of their owne battaile, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithall they diſordered the Carthaginian Horſe which were in that wing: againſt whom they gaue to Lelius the ſame aduantage, that Maſaniſſa had againſt the Numidians; which he vſed in like ſort. In the meane while, the battailes of foot aduanced, and drew neere together with a ſlow and ſtately pace, til they were almoſt within a weapons caſt: at what time they gaue a ſhout, and ran one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time ſeemed both in audacitie, and in quickneſſe, to haue the better of the Romans; wounding many, and doing more harme, than they tooke. But the Roman diſcipline after a while, preuailed againſt the boiſterous violence of theſe vntrained Barbarians. Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battell-of the Principes, following somewhat neere after the Hastati, encouraged their fellowes, and shewed themselues ready, if need were, to relieue them. Contrariwise, the Mercenaries receiued no manner of helpe or comfort, from those that should haue seconded them. For the new-leuied Carthaginians & Africans, when they saw their hired souldiers giue back, did also themselues retire. This caused the Ligurians, Gaules, and the rest, to thinke themselues betrayed: whereupon they enclined vnto flight. The Carthaginian Battaile was herewith more terrified than before, so as it refused to giue way vnto the Mercenaries for their safe retrait; and yet withall forbore to make head against the Enemies, that pursued them. It was no time to aske them what they meant by this: Feare and Indignation caused those that were at once chased by the Romans, and betrayed, as they thought, by their owne fellowes, to turne their Armes with an heedlesse furie against both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten downe and slaine, through their owne indiscretion, by their owne Mercenaries. The Roman Hastati in like sort, fighting with desperate men in a throng; had their hands so full of worke, that the Principes were faine to come vp vnto them, and helpe to ouer-beare this great medley of enemies, that were together by the eares among themselues. In this place was made a great slaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindering one another, could neither fight, nor easily flye. Such of them as escaped, ranne towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not stirre one foote, to helpe or saue these Run-awaies. Hee caused his men to bend their Pikes at those of his owne side, that would haue rushed vpon him: whom he thereby compelled to turne aside beyond his Battaile, and saue themselues in the open field. The ground, ouer which the Romans were now to march, ere they could meet with Hannibal, was couered with heapes of dead bodies and weapons, and so slipperie with blood: that Scipio began to stand in great doubt, lest the orders of his Battalions should bee dissolued in passing that way. In such case, if he should fight with that warlike Armie, which hee saw before him, remaining yet entire, and without feare expecting him; He might be well assured to receiue a notable ouerthrow. Hee caused therefore the Hastati to make a stand there where they were, opposite to the maine battaile of the Hannibalians. Then drawing vp his Principes and Triarij: He placed them, when they had ouercome the bad way, all in one Front with the Hastati, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, hee aduanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than euer hee had beene receiued in his life before. All the dayes worke till now, seemed to haue beene a matter of pastime; in regard of the sharpe Conflict, that was maintained betweene these notable Souldiers. The Romans were encouraged by their hauing preuailed all the day before: They were also farre the more in number. But these old Souldiers of Hannibal were fresh; (and perhaps) the better men. They fought with such obstinate resolution, that no man gaue backe one foot; but rather chose to die on the ground, whereon hee stood. So that, after a long time, it was vncertaine which part had the worse: vnlesse it may seeme, that the Romans were beginning to shrinke; for as much as the returne of Masanissa and Lælius from pursuit of the Enemies Horse, is said to haue beene most happie and in a needfull time. These vpon a sudden charged the Hannibalians in Rere, and ouer-bearing them by meere violence, compelled them to fall to Rout.

In this Battaile there died of the Romans fifteene hundred and vpwards: on the Carthaginian side, aboue twenty thousand, besides as many that were taken, of whom, Sopater Captaine of the Macedonians was one. The singular skill that Hannibal shewed in this his last fight, is highly commended by Polybius; and was acknowledged, as Liuie reporteth, by Scipio himselfe. But the Enemies were too strong for him in Horse: and being enioyned, as he was, by the State of Carthage to take battaile with such disaduantage, he could worke no maruels. Hee saued himselfe with a few Horse, and stayed not in his iourney, till he came to Adrumetum. Thence was he sent for to Carthage, from which he had beene absent sixe and thirtie yeeres. At his comming into the Senate Hee said plainly, That there was none other way left, than to take such peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians not knowing what other course to take, resolued to send Embassadours againe; and trie the fauour of Scipio, whose Armes they could not now resist.

Scipio hauing spoyled the Enemies Campe, returned backe to Vtica: where he found P. Lentulus newly arriued, with fiftie Gallies and an hundred Shippes of burden. With this this Fleet, and that which he had before, Hee thought it best to make towards Carthage: rather of purpose to terrifie the Citie, than with any hope to take it. His Legions hee commited vnto Cn. Octauius; whom he willed to meet him there by land. Then sending Lelius away to Rome with newes of the victory, he set saile from Vtica towards Carthage. He was encountred on the way by ten Embassadors from the City: who bearing vp with the Admirall Gallie, began to vse the pittifull gesture of suppliants. But they receiued none other answer, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where he would giue them audience. So rowing along before the City: and viewing it more in brauery, than with meaning to attempt it; He returned back to Vtica, and called back Octauius thither, with whom in person He set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their iourney thither, they heard the newes, that Vermina the son of Syphax, was comming with an Armie of more Horse than Foot, to the succour of those that were already vanquished. This Vermina seemes to haue bin both careless of getting intelligence how things passed, and very defectiue in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Armie. Part of the Roman foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him: which did not onely beate him, but so compasse him in, that he hardly escaped himselfe with a few; leauing fiftene thousand of his followers dead behinde him, and twelue hundred taken prisoners. If this good company had bin with Hannibal at Nadagara, they should haue beene farbetter conducted, and might well haue changed the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian lost, by default of Horse. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to be doubted, that this victory, though it were no great accesse vnto the former; yet serued well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater feare of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirty Embassadours from Carthage: whose behauiour though it was more pittifull than it had bin before; yet procured it lesse commiseration, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like sort humbled themselues. Nethertheless it was considered, what a long and laborious work it would proue, to besiege the mightie Citie of Carthage. And particularly Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honour of this warre, if it were protracted, should be taken out of his hands; and giuen to one of the Consuls. Cn. Seruilius Capio, that Consul who had charge of the warre against Hannibal, at such time as he departed out of Italy: was bold to passe ouer into the Ile of Sicil (as it were in chase of Hannibal by him terrified and driuen away) with a purpose thence to haue proceeded into Africk, and taken from Scipio the command of the Armie there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to restraine the ambition of this Consul Seruilius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made suite for the same Prouince of Africk: and was therein so earnest, that though neither the Senate, nor People, would grant him his desire; yet he needs would be going, procuring onely leaue of the Senate, that he being Consul might ioyne with Scipio, were it with no more than equall authoritie. But ere He could haue his Fleet and all things in a readinesse for the iourney, wherein no man cared to further him: Winter came on, and hee was onely tost at Sea with foule weather, first vpon the Coast of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Consulship expired, and so hee returned home a priuate man. Then came the ioyfull newes to Rome, of the victory obtained against Hannibal, and that the warre was now euen at an end. Yet was Lentulus the new Consul so passionate, in desiring Africk for his Prouince, That he said he would suffer nothing to passe in the Senate, vntill hee had first his will. Much adoe there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the people, at last it was ordered, That if Peace were granted, it should bee granted by Scipio; if the warre continued, Scipio should haue command therein by Land, and the Consul at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to giue the more fauourable answer vnto the Carthaginian Embassadours. Hee willed them to consider what they had deserued: and in regard thereof to thinke themselues well dealt withall in that he was contented to leaue vnto them their libertie and their owne Lawes, without appointing any Gouernour ouer them, or Garrison to hold them in subiection; leauing also vnto them their possessions in Africk, such as they were at the beginning of this war. As touching the rest he was at a point, That, before he either granted them Peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilest the late Treatie was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yeeld; then required Hee, That immediatly they should deliuer vp vnto the Romans all Prisoners, Fugitiues, and Renegado's, that they had of theirs: likewise all their Gallies, excepting ten: and all their Elephants: That they should make no more at all thence-forth out of Africke, neither yet with him into Africke, without licence of the Romans: That the Countries, Townes, goods whatsoeuer, belonging any wise vnto Masanissa, or to any of his Ancestors, which were in their possession, should bee all by them restored vnto him: That they should finde corne for the Roman Armie, and wages for their Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, vntill the Peace were fully concluded: That they should pay tenne thousand Talents of Siluer, in the terme of fiftie yeeres, by two hundred Talents a yeere; and that for obseruance of Conditions, they should giue an hundred hostages, such as Scipio would choose, being none of them vnder fourteene yeeres of age, nor aboue thirtie.

With these conditions the Embassadours returned home, and reported them vnto the Citie. They were very vnpleasing; and therefore one Gesco stood vp to speake against them: and exhorted the people, who gaue good attention, that they should not condescend vnto such intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiuing this, and noting withall what fauourable audience was giuen to this vaine Oratour, by the vnquiet yet vnwarlike Multitude, was bold to pull him downe from his standing, by plaine force. Hereat all the People murmured, as if their common liberty were too much wronged, by such insolence of this presumptuous Captaine. Which Hannibal perceiuing, rose vp and spake vnto them, saying; That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwise than the customes of the Citie would allow; forasmuch as he had beene thence absent euer since he was a Boy of nine yeeres old, vntill he was now a man of fiue and fortie. Hauing thus excused himselfe of the disorder, hee discoursed vnto them concerning the Peace: and perswaded them to accept it, as wanting abilitie to defend themselues; had the Demands of the Enemie beene yet more rigorous. Finally, vpon good aduice, they resolued to yeeld vnto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they paid out of hand fiue and twenty thousand pounds weight of siluer, in recompence of damages, and iniuries by them done to his Fleet and Embassadours. Scipio granted them Truce for three moneths; in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithall he gaue iniunction, that they should neither in the meane while send Embassadours any whither else, nor yet dismisse any Embassadours to them sent, without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wise and honourable men, by the miseries whereinto Carthage was fallen through their malicious counsailes. Asdrubal, surnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and a great friend of Hanno, was chiefe of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in company of Scipio his Embassadours, who related vnto the Senate and People these ioyfull newes. About the same time arriued at Rome Embassadours from Philip King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were faine to waite awhile for audience, till the election of new Consuls then in hand was finished; and order taken, for the Prouinces of them, and the new Pretors. Then were the Macedonian Embassadors called into the Senate: who first answering vnto some points, wherein the Romans had lately signified vnto their King, that they found themselues grieued; returned the blame vpon those Greekes themselues, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they Marcus Aurelius: who being one of the three Embassadours, that had lately beene sent from Rome vnto King Philip, tarried in Greece behinde his fellows, and there leuying men, made warre vpon the King, without any regard at all of the League, that was betweene him and the Romans. Further they desired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countri-men, that had lately serued Hannibal for Pay; and being taken prisoners in Africke, were kept in bonds by Scipio, might be released and deliuered vnto them. Vnto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had sent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharp answer. He said, that the Greeks which were confederate with Rome, endured so many iniuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was faine to stay behinde, to help them as he might; which else were like to be brought vnder the Kings subiection. As for Sopater: hee affirmed him to bee one of the Kings Counsaile, and very inward with him; one that serued not for money, but carried money with him, and foure thousand men, sent from the King to the ayde of Hannibal. About these points when the Macedonian Embassadors could make vnto the Senate no good answer, they were willed to returne, and tell their Master, That warre he sought, and warre he ſhould finde, if he proceeded as hee had begun. For in two maine points Hee had broken the League, that was betweene him and the Romans: firſt, in that hee had wronged their Confederates; and ſecondly, in that he had ayded their Enemies againſt them with men and money.

Theſe quarrels with Philip, that promiſed to open a way into Greece and the Eaſterne Countries, helped well the Carthaginian Embaſſadours in their ſollicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reuerend company, when they entred into the Senate: and Aſdrubal aboue the reſt was much reſpected, as one, whoſe good offices had kept the Romans from neceſſitie of ſending Embaſſadours to Carthage, vpon the like errand. Hee liberally granted, that the iuſtice of the quarrell had beene wholly on the Romans ſide; ſaying that it was the fault of ſome violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuſe the Citie, that had been too vehement in the proſecution of bad counſaile. But if Hanno and himſelfe might haue had their wills: the Carthaginians, euen at the beſt of their Fortune, ſhould haue granted the peace which they now deſired. Herewithall hee commended the modeſtie of the Romans, as no ſmall argument of their valour; by which alwayes they had beene victorious. To the ſame effect ſpake the reſt of the Embaſſadours: all of them entreating to haue the Peace ratified, though ſome with more lamentable words than others, according to the diuerſitie of their ſtile. They had patience enough to endure ſuch reproofe of Periurie, as they themſelues might haue laid vpon the Romans, if their diligence and fortune had been ſuch as the Romans was. Among the reſt, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would ſweare to keepe the peace hereafter: Aſdrubal made anſwer; Euen by the ſame gods, that are ſo ſeuere vnto thoſe that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus the Conſul interpoſing the authoritie of his Office, would haue hindred the Senate from proceeding vnto concluſion of peace, for that hereby Hee was like to loſe the honour, which hee purpoſed to get by making warre in Africk. But the matter was propounded vnto the people, in whom reſted the Soueraigne Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly vnto the pleaſure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio with tenne Delegates ſent vnto him from Rome of purpoſe, ſhould make a League with the Carthaginians, vpon ſuch Conditions as ſeemed beſt: which were none other, than the ſame which he had already propounded. For this fauour, the Carthaginian Embaſſadours humbly thanked the Senate; and craued licence, that they might viſite their Countrimen, which were priſoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ranſome and carry home with them ſome, that were their eſpeciall friends; of whom they gaue in writing almoſt two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hunderd of thoſe Priſoners, which the Embaſſadours would chooſe, ſhould be ſent ouer into Africk, and be freely reſtored to libertie by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they tooke leaue, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to ioyne with Scipio in Commiſſion.

At their comming into Africk, the Peace was giuen, and accepted, without any controuerſie or diſputation. The Priſoners, Fugitiues and Renegado's, were deliuered vp to Scipio: likewiſe the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio tooke more vengeance vpon the Renegado's, than vpon the Fugitiues; and vpon thoſe of the Romans than vpon the Latines or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded: the Romans he crucified. About the firſt payment of their money, the Carthaginians were ſomewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treaſurie could haue ſpared two hundred Talents for the preſent: yet ſince the penſion was annuall, and to continue fiftie yeeres; it was thought meet to lay the burden vpon the Citizens. At the collection of the ſumme there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman yoke had begun to pinch them; ſo as many, euen of the Senatours, could not forbeare weeping. Contrariwiſe Hannibal could not refraine from laughter. For which when he was checked by Aſdrubal Hedus, and told, That it worſt of all beſeemed him to laugh, ſince he had bin the cauſe why all others did weep; He anſwered, That laughter did not alwayes proceed from ioy; but ſometimes from extremitie of indignation. Yet, ſaid He, My laughter is more ſeaſonable, and leſſe abſurd, than your teares. For yee ſhould haue wept, when yee gaue vp your Shippes and Elephants, and when yee bound your owne hands from the vſe of Armes; without the good leaue of the Romans firſt obtained. This miſerable condition keepes vs vnder; and holds vs in aſſured ſeruitude. But of theſe matters yee had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrung out of your priuate purſes, yee haue thereof some sense. Godgrant that the time come not hereafter, wherein I shall acknowledge That it was the very least part of your miserie, for which yee haue shed these teares. Thus did he curse Hannibal vnto those, who tasting the bitter fruits of their owne malicious counsaile, repented when it was too late; and in stead of cursing their owne wretchednes, which had bred this grieuous disease, accused the Phisician, whose noble endeauours had bin employed in procuring the remedie.

Scipio being to take leaue of Africk, produced Masanissa, and magnified him in presence of the Armie, with high commendations not vndeserued. To him also he consigned ouer those townes of King Syphax, which the Romans at that present held: wherein, to say truth, he gaue him but his due; & that which otherwise he knew not well how to bestow. But the loue of the Romans, & friendship of Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the desertings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there rested no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans embarqued themselues for Sicil: where when they arriued at Lilybæum, Scipio with some part of his Army took his way home to Rome by land, and sent the rest before him thither by Sea. His iourney through Italy was no lesse glorious than any triumph: all the people thronging out of the Townes and Villages, to doe him honour as he passed along. Hee entred the Citie in Triumph: neither was there euer before, or after, any Triumph celebrated with so great ioy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in bravery of the pompe, there were others in time shortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the Citie in this Triumph, and died soone after in prison: or whether hee were dead awhile before; it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be auowed, That it was a barbarous custome of the Romans, to insult ouer the calamities of mighty Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea though they were such, as had aliuates made faire and courteous warre. But hereof we shall haue better example, ere the same Age passe. It was neither the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grieuous warre past, whereof the Romans had bin in a manner without hope that euer they should set Italy free. This made them looke cheerefully vpon the Author of so great a conuersion, and filled them with more ioy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gaue to Scipio the Title of the African: stiling him by the name of that Prouince which he had subdued. This honourable kinde of surname, taken from a conquered Prouince, grew afterwards more common, and was vsurped by men of lesse desert: especially by many of the Cæsars, who sometimes arrogated vnto themselues the title of Countries, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if such glorious Attributes could haue made them like in vertue vnto Scipio the African.

Of the great similitude found in worldly euents, the limitation of matter hath beene assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined vnto a subiect that is not vnbounded; the workes of Nature must needes bee finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seeme to haue their whole dependance vpon the will of man, wee are lesse to wonder, if wee finde lesse varietie: since it is no great portion of things which is obnoxious obnoxious to humane power; and since they are the same affections, by which the wills of sundrie men are ouer-ruled in managing the affaires of our daily life. It may be obserued in the change of Empires, before those times whereof wee now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans inuaded the Kingdome of Medes, with two hundred thousand Foot, and threescore thousand Horse: but failing in their intended conquest, they became subiect within a while themselues vnto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell vpon the Greekes with such number of men, as might haue seemed resistlesse. But after that the Persians were beaten home againe, their Empire was neuer secure of the Greekes, who at all times of leisure from intestine Warre, deuised vpon that conquest thereof, which finally they made vnder the great Alexander. If Nabuchodonosor with his rough old souldiers, had vndertaken the Medes: or Cyrus with his well-trayned Armie, had made attempt vpon Greece; the issue might, in humane reason, haue beene farre different. Yet would it then haue beene expedient for them, to employ the trauell and vertue of their men, rather than the greatnesse of their names, against those people, that were no lesse valiant, though lesse renowned, than their owne. For the menacing words vsed by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greekes (in which kinde it may bee, that Nabuchodonosor likewise offended the Medes and Persians) were not so auaileable to victory, as to draw on reuenge in the future. Great Kingdomes, when they decay in strength, suffer as did the old Lyon, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolfe, gored by the Bull, yea and kickt by the Asse. But Princes are often carried away from reason, by misse-vnderstanding the language of Fame: and despising the vertue that makes little noyse, aduenture to prouoke it against themselues; as if it were not possible that their owne glorie should bee foyled by any of lesse-noted excellence. Against the same stone, whereat Xerxes, and before him as (I take it) Enilmerodach, had stumbled; Pyrrhus the Epirot hath dasht his foot. He was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of marke, and a better souldier than any other Greekish King, when he entred into warre against the Romans. This warre hee vndertooke as it were for his minds sake: hauing receiued no iniurie, but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greekes that serued vnder him, to preuaile so easily against the barbarous Romans, that they should onely serue as a step to his further intended conquests, of Sicil and Africk. But when the Romans, by their victory against Pyrrhus, had found their own vertue to be of richer mettall, than was the more shining valour of the Greekes: then did all the braue ry of the Epyrot (his Elephants and whatsoeuer else had serued to make him terrible) serue only to make the Romans, in time following, to thinke more highly of themselues. * For since they had ouercome the best Warriour in Greece, euen Him, that, being thus beaten by them, could in a yeere after make himselfe Lord of Greece and Macedon: what should hinder them from the conquest of all those vnwarlike Prouinces, which in compasse of 12. yeeres a Macedonian King of late memory had wonne? Certainely there was hereunto requisite no more, than to bring to their owne deuotion by some good meanes, the whole Countrey of Greece: all the rest, this done, would follow of it selfe. How to deale with the Greekes; Philip and Alexander had shewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learne, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

When therefore the first Punicke warre was ended, which followed soone after the wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leisure to hearken after newes in Greece; and to entertaine any good occasion, that should be on that side presented. They had also then a strong Fleet: and were become, though not otherwise very skilfull Mariners, yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wished, that the Illyrian Queene Teuta made at the same time cruell war vpon the Greekes: wasting their Countrey, and sacking their Townes, onely because they were vnable to resist, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrell if the Romans were desirous to enter; the Queene was not slow to giue them cause. And their happy accomplishing of that war which they made with Her, was, in their own opinion, a matter not vnworthy to make their Patronage to bee desired by the Greekes. But no such thing happened: though they sent Embassadours, as it were to offer themselues; by signifying, that for loue of Greece they had vndertaken this Illyrian warre. Thus beganne the first acquaintance betwixt the Greekes and Romans: which afterwards encreased very hastily, through the indiscretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whose businesse with them, being now the subiect of our storie, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reigne, and his first Actions. It was like to proue a busie time in the world, when, within the space of 4. yeeres, new Kings began to reigne in the most of all Countries knowne; and 3. of them young boyes, in 3. of the greatest Kingdomes. This happned from the third yeere of the hundreth thirty ninth Olympiad, vnto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose roome succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the great. Ptolomie Philopater succeeded in the Kingdome of Ægypt vnto his father Euergetes. And Philip the sonne of Demetrius, being 16. or 17. yeeres old, receiued the Kingdom of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achæans and most of the Greekes; by the decease of his Vncle Antigonus Doson, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also vanished like change in Cappadocia, Lacedæmon, & the Countries about the Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then began his reigne in Cappadocia. Lycurgus found meanes to make himselfe King ouer the Lacedæmonians, whose Commonweale, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headlesse; and Achæus, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebell vnto him, occupied the Regions neere vnto Mount Taurus, & kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third yeers of the hundred & fortieth Olympiad it was, that open war brake out betweene Rome & Carthage, & that Hannibal began his great Inuasion vpon Italie. Those troubles of the Westerne world, which were indeed the greatest, we haue already followed vnto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolomie, & the rest, we shall speake hereafter, when the Romans find them out.

* The King of Spaines pretended inuincible Naule, being beaten out of the British seas, inuited vs to those of Spaine: and hauing broken the greatest Fleet that euer the Spaniards gathered together; we neuer made account of any of his preparations after that time.

Philip, soone after the beginning of his reigne, came into Peloponnesus, greatly desired of the Achæans, and many others his dependants. That Country, hauing freed itselfe by the helpe of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subiection vnto Cleomenes, was now become no lesse obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should haue beene to the Spartan, & therewithall it lay open vnto the violence of the Ætolians; who despised euen the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. The Ætolians were no men to bridle, nor were much addicted vnto any other Art than warre. Therefore wanting employment, they fell vpon the Messenians that were their owne Clients, and (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinitie) the onely good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their inuasion was no lesse vnexpected, than it was vniust; whereby with greater ease they made spoyle of the Countrey, finding none prepared to make resistance. The Achæans, were called by the Messenians to helpe: which they did the more willingly, because the Ætolians passing without leaue through their Territorie, had (as was their manner) done what harme they listed. Olde Aratus could hardly abide these Ætolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembring the iniuries, wherewith most ingratefully they had requited no small benefits done to them by the Achæans. Hee was therefore so hastie to fall vpon this their Army, that hee could hardly endure to stay few daies vntill the time of his owne Office came; being chosen Prætor of the Achæans for the yeere following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himselfe a man fitter (as hath beene already noted of him) for any other seruice, than leading of an Armie. He suffered them to passe quietly along with their bootie, through a part of the Countrey, wherein he might very easily haue distressed them; and afterwards pressed them so neere, when they had recouered ground of aduantage, that they easily defeated all his Armie. So they departed home rich, and well animated to returne againe. As for the Achæans, they got hereby onely the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made confederacy. Shortly after, the Ætolians inuaded Peloponnesus againe; hauing no more to doe, than to passe ouer the narrow Streights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulph of Lepanto, where they might land in the Countrey of the Eleans. There ioyned with them, in this their second inuasion, a great number of the Illyrians; who neglecting that Condition imposed vpon them by the Romans, of setting out no ships of warre vnto the coast of Greece, made bold to seek aduentures againe, & did great mischiefe. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shorly repented him of this his voyage, which caused him to lose his Kingdom, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, & fell vpon the Ilands of the Cyclades in the Ægean sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip, or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians vnder Scerdilaidas, or Scerdilæus, hauing gotten what they could elsewhere by roving at Sea, accompanied the Ætolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater wast in the Countrey now, than in their former Expedition, and returned home, without finding any resistance.

Of these things great complaints were made vnto Philip, when hee came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satisfie themselues with some speedy reuenge, there were that vrged to haue some grieuous punishment layd vpon the Lacedæmonians: who were thought vnder-hand to haue fauoured the Ætolians, in meere despight of the Achæans and Macedonians, by whom themselues had lately beene supplied. It is true, that the Lacedæmonians had beene so affected: and (which was worse) at the arriuall of Philip, they slew such friends of his, as hauing checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselues to iudgement: but entreated the King, that he would abstaine from comming to them with an Army; since their Towne was lately much disquieted with ciuill discord, which they hoped soone to appease, and meant alwayes to remaine at his deuotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that he (or rather old Aratus, whom he wholly gouerned) did not vnderstand the Lacedæmonians: but for that a greater worke was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth, in presence of the King, the Embassadours of the Achæans, Bœotians, Epirots, and Acarnanians; all complayning vpon the Ætolians, and desiring to haue warre decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters vnto the Ætolians, requiring them to make ready their answer in some conuenient time: if they could alledge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium, for that purpose: whither if it pleased him to come, or send, he should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to haue beene there at the day. But when the Ætolians vnderstood this for certaine, they adiourned the Councell vnto a further time: saying, That such weighty matters ought not to be handled, saue in the great Parliament of all Aetolia. This tricke of Law notwithstanding, open warre was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were to shew how well they had deserued it, made election of Scopas to be their Prætor, that was Author of these Inuasions made on Peloponnesus, and the onely man in sort, vpon whom they must haue laid the blame of these actions, if they would haue shifted it from the publike.

After this, Philip went into Macedon, where hee prepared busily for the warre against the yeere following. He also assayed the Illyrian, Scerdilaidas, with faire words and promises, whom he easily won from the Aetolian side, forsmuch as the Aetolians had couzened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Achæans, who had first of all others proclaimed the warre in their owne Countrey, sent vnto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Messenians, and Lacedæmonians; requesting them forthwith to declare themselues, and to denounce warre vnto the Aetolians, without staying (as it were) to await the euent. Hereunto they receiued diuers answers, according to the qualities of those with whom they deale. The Acarnanians, a free-hearted and valiant, though a small Nation, and bordering vpon the Aetolians, of whom they stood in continuall danger, said, that they could not honestly refuse to shew their faithfull meaning in that warre, which was concluded by generall assent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were neuerthelesse more cunning and reserued also: that they stood vpon a needlesse point, and desired to be held excused, vntill Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to haue made any doubt) should first proclaime the warre. The Messenians, for whose cause the warre was vndertaken, excused themselues, by reason of a Towne which the Aetolians held vpon their borders: and said, that they durst not be ouer-bold, vntill that bridle were taken out of their mouths. As for the Lacedæmonians, the chiefe of them studied onely, how to maintaine their reason, for which there City had beene so lately pardoned: and therefore dismissed the Embassadours of the Confederates, without any answer at all. They had three yeeres together continued subiect against their wills to the Macedonians, expecting still when Cleomenes should returne out of Egypt, to reigne ouer them againe, and maintaine, as hee was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they chose not any Kings, but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of these there were some, that thought the publike safety to consist, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had pursued them: And hereto they referred all their counsailes; being perhaps a little mooued with respect of the benefit, which might redound vnto themſelues, by adhering firmely to thoſe which at the preſent bore rule ouer them. Others, and thoſe the greater part, were ſtill deuiſing how to make all ready for Cleomenes againſt his returne, & ſought to ioyne with the Aetolians, which were the moſt likely to giue him ſtrong aſſiſtance. The Macedonian faction had the more authority and durſt more freely ſpeake their minds: but the contrary ſide was the more paſſionate, and ſpared not by murders or any other violent courſes to effect ward their deſire. Neyther did it ſuffice, that about theſe times there came certaine report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which theſe intended: fancying vnto themſelues the glory of their Anceſtors in ſuch Ages paſt, as were not like to come againe. Cleomenes was, they knew, the moſt able man to reſtore them vnto their greatneſſe and luſtre, which once hee had in a manner performed: But ſince hee was dead, and that, without iniury to his well deſerning vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would haue, and thoſe of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without ſuch helpes, they muſt continue little better than ſubiects vnto the Macedonian, and farre leſſe by him reſpected, than were the Achæans. Thus were they tranſported by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the moſt working ſpirits among them procured the Aetolians to ſend an Embaſſe to Sparta, which propounded the matter openly vnto the people, whereof no one of the Citizens durſt haue made himſelfe the Author. Much diſputation, and hot, there was, betweene thoſe of the Macedonian partie, and theſe their oppoſites: in ſuch wiſe that nothing could be concluded, vntill by maſſacre or baniſhment of all, or the chiefe, that ſpake againſt the Aetolians, the diuerſitie of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded betweene the Lacedæmonians and Aetolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Achæans, who had ſpared the Citie, when they might haue deſtroyed it. Then alſo they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was ſo nice, and ſo regardfull of their ancient Lawes, as touching the chooſing of the one King, that we may iuſtly wonder, how they grew ſo careleſſe in making choyce of the other. In the one of their royall Families they found Ageſipolis, the ſonne of Ageſipolis the ſonne of King Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to reigne ouer them, as heire apparant to his grandfather. This Ageſipolis was a yong Boy, ſtanding in neede of a Guardian: and had an vncle, his fathers brother, that was fit for the Gouernement. Yet becauſe the Law required, that the ſonne, how young ſoeuer, ſhould haue his fathers whole right and title: the Lacedæmonians, though ſtanding in neede of a man, were ſo punctuall in obſeruation of the Law, that they made this childe their King, and appointed his Vncle Clomenes to bee his Protector. But in the other branch of the royall Family, though there was no want of heires: yet would not the people trouble themſelues about any of them, to examine the goodneſſe of his Claime, but made election of one Lycurgus, who hauing no manner of title to the kingdome, beſtowed vpon each of the Ephori, a Talent, and thereby made himſelfe bee ſaluted King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lycurgus, to gratifie his Partiſans, and to approue his worth by action, inuaded the Countrey of the Argiues: which lay open and vnguarded, as in a time of peace. There hee did great ſpoile, and won diuers Townes; whereof two hee retained, and annexed vnto the State of Lacedæmon. After ſuch open hoſtility, the Lacedæmonians declared themſelues on the Aetolian ſide, and proclaimed warre againſt the Achæans.

Thus the beginnings of the warre fell out much otherwiſe, than the Achæans and their Confederates had expected, when they firſt made preparation. Philip was not ready: the Epirots gaue vncertaine anſwer: the Meſſenians would not ſtirre: all the burden muſt lie vpon themſelues and the poore Acarnanians, whom the Aetolians, by fauour of the Eleans, could inuade at pleaſure, as they were like to doe, and by helpe of the Lacedæmonians, could aſſaile on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Aetolians, paſſing ouer the Bay of Corinth, ſurpriſed the Towne of Aegira: which if they could haue held, they ſhould thereby grieuouſly haue molеſted the Achæans, for that it ſtood in the mid-way betweene Aegium and Sycion, two of their principall Cities, and gaue open way into the heart of all their Countrey. But as Aegira was taken by ſurpriſe: ſo was it preſently loſt againe, through greedineſſe of ſpoyle; whilſt they that ſhould haue made it their firſt care, to aſſure the place vnto themſelues, by occupying the citadell and other peeces of ſtrength, fell heedleſly to ranſacke priuate houſes, and thereby gaue the

the Citizens leaue to make head, by whom they were driuen with great slaughter backe vnto their Fleet. About the same time, another Aetolian Armie landing among the Eleans, fell vpon the Westerne Coast of Achaia; wasting all the Territorie of the Dymæans and other people, that were first beginners of the Achæan Confederacie. The Dymæans and their neighbours made head against these Inuaders; but were so well beaten, that the enemie grew bolder with them than before. They sent for helpe vnto their Prætor, and to all the Townes of their Societie. In vaine. For the Achæans hauing lately been much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to do little of themselues: neither could they get any strength of Mercenaries; forasmuch as at the end of Cleomenes his warre, they had couetously with-held part of their due from those that serued them therein. So through this disability of the Achæans, and insufficiency of their Prætor; the Dymæans, with others, were driuen to with-hold their contribution heretofore made for the publike seruice, & to conuert the money to their own defence. Lycurgus also with his Lacedæmonians, began to win vpon the Arcadians; that were confederate with Philip & the Achæans. Philip came to the borders of the Aetolians, whilst their Armie was thus employed a farre off in Peloponnesus. The Epirots ioyned all their forces with him: & by such their willing readines, drew him to the siege of a Frontier peece, which they desired to get into their owne hands; for that, by commodity thereof, they hoped shortly to make themselues Masters of Ambracia. There he spent forty dayes, ere he could end the busines; which tended onely to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entred into the heart of Aetolia at his first comming in; it was thought that he might haue had an end of the war. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken vpon small Townes or Forts: and not seldome, that the importunity of Associates, to haue their own desires fulfilled, conuerts the preparations of great kings to those vses for which they neuer were intended; thereby hindering the prosecution of their maine designes. Thus was our king Henrie the eight led aside, and quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperor to the siege of Tournay: at such time as the French king Lewes the twelfth, hearing that the strong City of Terwin was lost, and that his Cauallerie, wherein rested his chiefe confidence, two thousand were beaten by the Earle of Essex with seuen hundred English; was thinking to withdraw himselfe into Brittaine, in feare that Henrie would haue come to Paris.

The stay that Philip made at Ambracus, did wondrously embolden the Ætolians: in such sort, as their Prætor Scopas aduentured to leade all their forces out of the Countrey; and therewith not onely to ouer-runne Thessalie, but to make impression into Macedon. He came as farre as to Dium, a Citie of Macedon vpon the Ægean Sea; which, being forsaken by the Inhabitants at his comming, He tooke, and razed to the ground. He spared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but ouerturned all: and among the rest, hee threw down the Statua's that were there erected, of the Macedonian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Countrey-men at his returne; forasmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to bee growne terrible, not onely (as before) vnto Peloponnesus, but euen to Macedon it selfe. But this their pride was soone abated; and they rewarded shortly at home in their owne Countrey, for their paines taken at Dium. Philip hauing dispatched his worke at Ambracus, made a strong inuasion vpon Ætolia. He tooke Phoetiæ, Metropolis, Oeniade, Pæanium, Elæus, and diuers other Towns and Castles of theirs: of which he burnt some, and fortified others. He also beat the Ætolians in sundry skirmishes; and wasted all the Countrie ouer, without receiuing any harme. This done, while he was about to make a cut ouer the Streights into Peloponnesus and to doe the like spoile in the Countrey of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently sollicited by the Achæan Embassadours; newes came out of Macedon, that the Dardanians were ready with a great Armie to fall vpon the Countrey. These Dardanians were a barbarous people, diuided by Mount Hæmus from the Northerne part of Macedon, & were accustomed to seeke booty in that wealthy Kingdome, when they found their own times. Hauing therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a iourney into Peloponnesus; they purposed in his absence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themselues in his Countrey; as had beene their manner vpon the like aduantages. This made the King to dismisse the Achæan Embassadours, (whom he should haue accompanied home with his Armie) and to bid them haue patience vntill another yeere. So Hee tooke his way homewards: and as hee was passing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there repaired vnto him Demetrius Pharius, with no more than one Ship; that was newly chased out of his Kingdome by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himselfe a friend to Antigonus Doson in the warres of Cleomenes: and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was readie, at their first request, to take part with Philips Captaines. These, or the like considerations, made him welcome vnto the Macedonian King: whose Counsailour he was euer after. The Dardanians hearing of the Kings returne, brake vp their Armie; and gaue ouer for the present their inuasion of Macedon, towards which they were already on their way.

All that Summer following the King rested at Larissa in Thessalie, whilst his people gathered in their Harueſt. But the Ætolians rested not. They auenged themselues vpon the Epirots: whom for the harmes by them and Philip done in Ætolia, they requited with all extremities of warre, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the most famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, and all thought of warre, vntill another yeere, was laid aside: Philip stole a iourney into Peloponnesus, with fiue thousand Foot, and about foure hundred Horse. As soone as he was within Corinth, He commanded the Gates to be shut, that no word should be carried foorth of his arriuall. He sent priuily for old Aratus to come thither vnto him: with whom he tooke order, when, and in what places, he would haue the Achæan Souldiers ready to meete him. The Enemies were then abroad in the Countrie, with somewhat more than two thousand Foot and an hundred Horse, little thinking to meete with such opposition. Indeede they had little cause to feare; since the Achæans themselues were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians, vntill they heard, that these two thousand Elæans, Ætolians, and their fellowes, were by him surprised, and all made prisoners, or slaine. By this exploit which he did at his first comming, Philip got very much reputation, and likewise he purchased both reputation and loue, by diuers actions immediately following. He won Psophis, an exceeding strong Town, in the borders of Arcadia, which the Elæans and Ætolians then held. He won it by assault at his first comming: wherein it much auailed him, that the Enemie, not beleeuing that he would vndertake such a peece of worke at such an vnseasonabe time of the yeere, was careleſse of prouiding euen such store of weapons, as might haue serued to defend it. The Towne was preserued by the King from sacke, & giuen to the Achæans, of his own meere motion, before they requested it. Thence went he to Lasion, which yeelded for very feare, hearing how easily he had taken Psophis. This Towne also he gaue to the Achæans. The like liberality he vsed towards others, that had ancient title vnto places by him recouered. Then fell he vpon the Countrey of Elis, where was much wealth to bee gotten: for that the people were addicted to husbandrie, and liued abroad in Villages; euen such as were of the wealthier sort amongst them. So he came to the Citie of Olympia: where hauing done sacrifice to Iupiter, feasted his Captaines, and refreshed his Armie three daies; He proceeded on to the spoile of those, that had taken pleasure to share with the Ætolians in the spoiles of their other-wise-deseruing neighbours. Great abundance of Cattell hee tooke, with great numbers of slaues, and much wealth of all sorts, such as could bee found in rich villages. Then fell he in hand with the Townes, wherein a great multitude of the Countrie-people were fled. Some of these were taken at the first assault. Some yeelded for feare. Some preuented the labour of his iourney, by sending Embassadours to yeeld before he came. And some that were held with Garrisons against their wils, tooke courage to set themselues at liberty, by seeing the King so neere; to whose Patronage thenceforth they betooke themselues. And many places were spoyled by the Ætolian Captaines, because they distrusted their ability to hold them. So the King wonne more Townes in the Countrey, than the sharpenesse of Winter would suffer him to stay three dayes. Faine he would haue fought with the Ætolians: but they made such haste from him, that he could not ouertake them, till they had couered themselues within the Towne of Samicum; where they thought to haue beene safe. But Philip assailed them therein so forcibly, that he made them glad to yeeld the place, obtaining licence to depart, with their liues and armes. Hauing performed so much in this expedition, the King reposed himselfe awhile in Megalopolis, and then remooued to Argos, where hee spent all the rest of the Winter.

Before the Kings arriuall in Peloponnesus, the Lacedæmonians, with Lycurgus their new King, had gotten somewhat in Arcadia; & threatned to do great matters. But when they were admonished, by the calamitie that fell vpon the Eleans, of the danger hanging ouer ouer their owne heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themselues home. This Lycurgus, as hee had no other right to the Kingdome of Sparta, than that which he could buy with money: so was he neither free from danger of conspiracies made against him, nor from those iealousies, with which Vsurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royall blood, that thinking himselfe to haue best right vnto the Kingdome, purposed to make way thereunto, by massacre of his opposites; and afterwards to confirme himselfe, by propounding vnto the Multitude such reformation of the State as was most popular: namely, by making an equall distribution of all the Lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient institution of that Common wealth. Hee wonne to his partie some two hundred men; with whom hee fell vpon the Ephori as they were together at supper, and slew them all. Then went he to Lycurgus his house: who perceiuing the danger, stole away and fled. It remained that he should giue account of these doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their minds being not hereto prædisposed; they so little regarded his goodly offers, as euen whilst he was vsing his best perswasions, they were consulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceiued whereabout they went, and shifted presently away. So he liued afterwards among the Achæans a banished man, and hated of his owne people. As for Lycurgus, hee returned home: and suspecting thenceforth all those of Hercules his race, found meanes to driue out his fellow-King young Agesipolis; whereby he made himselfe Lord alone. His doings grew to bee suspected, in such sort, as once hee should haue beene apprehended by the Ephori. But though his actions hitherto might haue beene defended; yet rather than to aduenture himselfe into iudgement, he chose to flie for a time, and sojourne among his friends the Ætolians. His wel-knowne vehemencie in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured vnto him such good liking among the people, that in his absence they beganne to consider the weakenesse of their owne surmises against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, He tooke better heede vnto himselfe: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was so acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not be in the power of the Citizens to expell him when they lifted. By what actions he got the name of a Tyrant; or at what time it was, that he chased Agesipolis out of the Citie; I doe not certainely finde. Like inough it is, That his being the first of three vsurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to be placed in the ranke of Tyrants; which he last of the three very iustly deserued. Whatsoeuer he was toward some priuate Citizens: in the warre against Philip, He behaued himselfe as a prouident man, and carefull of his Countries good.

§. II.

How Philip was misaduised by ill Counsailors; who afterwards wrought treason against him; and were iustly punished. He inuadeth the Ætolians a second time: and forceth them to sue for peace: which is granted vnto them.

WHilst the King lay at Agros deuising vpon his businesse for the yeer following, some ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently for their owne greatnesse, as they were like to haue spoiled all that hee tooke in hand. Antigonus Doson had left vnto Philip such Counsailors, as to him did seeme the fittest men for gouerning of his youth. The chiefe of these was Apelles, that had the charge of his person, and also the ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himselfe a great Politician, thought that he should doe a notable peece of seruice to his Prince, if hee could reduce the Achæans vnto the same degree of subiection, wherein the Macedonians held them. To bring this to passe, during the late Expedition he had caused some of the Macedonians to thrust the Achæans out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the booty that they had gotten. Proceeding further as occasion fell out, Hee was bold to chastise some of that Nation, causing his Ministers to take and whippe them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not refrain) to helpe their fellowes; them he laid by the heele, and punished as Malefactors. Hereby he thought to bring it to passe by little and little, that they should be qualified with the habite of blind obedience; and thinke nothing vniust that pleased the King. But these Achæans were tenderly sensible in matters of liberty: wherefore if they could haue beene contented so to suffer any little diminution, they needed not haue troubled the Macedonians to helpe them in the war against Cleomenes. They bemoaned themselues vnto olde Aratus; and besought him to thinke vpon some good order, that they might not bee oppressed by degrees. Aratus foorthwith dealt earnestly with the King; as in a matter more weighty than at first it might seeme. The King bestowed gracious words vpon those that had beene wronged; and forbade Apelles to follow the course begunne. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he dissembled his choler for a time. Hee thought so well of his owne Proiect, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps vnable to doe the King any valuable seruice, in businesse of other nature. Hee purposed therefore hereafter to beginne at the head; since, in biting at the taile, the fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise bee than that among the Achæans there were some, who bore no hearty affection to Aratus. These he enquired out, and sending for them, entertained them with words of Court; promising to become their especiall friend, and commend them vnto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himselfe: letting him know, that as long as hee continued to make much of Aratus, hee must be faine to deale precisely with the Achæans, and as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to giue countenance vnto those others whom he himselfe commended, then should the Achæans, and all other Peloponnesians, be quickly brought to conforme themselues vnto the duty of obedient Subiects. By such perswasions, he drew the King to bee present at Ægium, where the Achæans were to hold election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would haue bin needefull in a businesse of more importance, the King by faire words and threatnings together, obtained so much, That Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new fauourites, was chosen Prætor, in stead of one more worthy, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good introduction vnto greater matters that should follow. The King from thence passed along by Patras and Dyma, to a very strong Castle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The garrison yeelded it vp for feare, at his first comming: whereof he was glad, for that he had an earnest desire to bestow it vpon the Dymæans, as he presently did.

The King thought it strange, that all this while he heard of no messengers from the Eleans, to sue for peace. For at his departure out of their Countrey the last Winter, he had let loose one Amphidamus a Captaine of theirs, that was his prisoner, because hee found him an intelligent man, and one that vndertooke to make them forsake their alliance with the Ætolians, and ioyne with him vpon reasonable termes. This if they could be contented to doe, he willed Amphidamus to let them vnderstand, That hee would render vnto them freely all prisoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forreign inuasion; and that they should hold their liberty entire, liuing after their owne Lawes, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept vnder by any garrison. These conditions were not to be despised, if they had found credit as they might haue done. But when Philip came to the Castle of Tichos, and made a new inuasion vpon their Countrey: then beganne the Eleans, (that were not before ouer-hastie to beleeue such faire promises) to suspect Amphidamus as a Traitour, and one that was set ouer them for no other end, than to breede a mutuall diffidence betweene them, and the Ætolians. Wherefore they purposed to lay hands vpon him, and send him prisoner into Ætolia. But he perceiued their intent, and got away to Dyma in good time for himselfe; in better for Aratus. For the king (as was said) mistrusting what should be the cause, that hee heard no newes from the Eleans, concerning the offers which hee had made vnto them by Amphidamus: Apelles, his Counsailor thereby tooke occasion to supplant Aratus. He said that old Aratus, and his sonne together, had such deuices in their heads, as tended little to the kings good. And long of them he said it was, that the Eleans did this hold out. For when Amphidamus was dismissed home, the two Aratij (the father and the sonne) had taken him aside, & giuen him to vnderstand, that it would be very preiudicial to all Peloponnesus, if the Eleans once became at the deuotion of the Macedonian. And this was the true cause, why neither Amphidamus was very carefull in doing this message, nor the Eleans in hearkning to the kings offers. All this was a false lye; deuised by Apelles himselfe, vpon no other ground than his owne malice. Philip had no sooner heard this tale but in a great rage he sent for the two Aratij, and bade Apelles rehearse it ouer againe to their faces. Apelles did so, and with a bold countenance taking talking to them as to men already coulted. And when he had said all he rested, ere either Philip or they spake any word; He added this clause as it were in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you such vngracefull wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achæans; and therein having made it knowne what ye are, to depart into Macedon, and leaue you to your selues. Old Aratus gravely admonished the King; That whensoeuer he heard any accusation, especially against a friend of his owne or a man of worth, He should forbeare a while to giue credit, vntill hee had diligently examined the businesse. For such deliberation was Kingly, and he should neuer thereof repent him. As the present hee said there needed no more, than to call in those that had heard his talk with Amphidamus, and especially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very absurd thing, That the king should make himselfe the Author of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other euidence, than one mans yea, and anothers no. Hereof the king liked well, and said that hee would make sufficient inquirie. So passed a few dayes: wherein whilst Apelles delaied to bring in the proofe, which indeed he wanted, Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befalne him there. The king was not forgetfull, to examine him about the conspiracie of the Aratij: which when he found no better than a meere deuice against his honourable friends; Hee entertained them in louing manner as before. As for his loue to Apelles, though it was hereby somewhat cooled; yet by meanes of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remission therein could be discerned.

The vnrestfull tempest of Apelles, hauing with much vehemencie brought nothing to passe; beganne (as commonly Ambition vseth) to swell and grow venemous for want of his free motion. He betakes him selfe to his cunning againe: and as before, being checkt in his dolings with those of the vulgar, he had prepared a snare for the Aratij: so fayling of them; he thinkes it wisedome to lay for the King himselfe, and for all at once which were about him. In such manner sometime, the Spider thought to haue taken the Swallow which draue away Flies out of the chiemnie; but was carried (net and all) into the Ayre by the bird, that was too strong to be caught and held by the subtile workemanship of a Cob-web. Of the foure that next vnto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chiefe place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponnesus, and Alexander Captaine of the Guard, were faithfull men, and such as would not be corrupted. The other two, Leontius Captaine of the Targuettiers, & Megaleas chiefe of the Secretaries, were easily won to be at Apelles his disposition. This politician therefore studied how to remoone the other two from their places, and put some Creatures of his owne into their roomes. Against Alexander He went to worke the ordinary way, by calumniation and priuie detraction. But for the supplanting of Taurion he vsed more finenesse; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of warre, & one, whom for his many vertues the King might ill spare from being alwaies in his presence. By such Art hee thought to haue remoued him, as we say, Out of Gods blessing into a warme Sunne. In the meah season Aratus retired himselfe; and sought to auoide the dangerous frendship of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affaires of State. As for the new Prætor of Achaia, lately chosen by such vehement instance of the King; Hee was a man of no dispatch; and one that had no grace with the People. Wherefore a great deale of time was lost, whilst Philip wanted both the money and the Corne, wherewith hee should haue beene furnished by the Achæans. This made the King vnderstand his owne errour; which hee wisely sought to reforme betimes. He perswaded the Achæans to reiourne their Parliament from Aegium, to Sycion, the Towne of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his son, perswading them to forget what was past; and laying all the blame vpon Apelles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keepe a more diligent eye. So by the trauell of these worthy men, He easily obtained what he would of the Achæans. Fifty talents they gaue him out of hand, with great store of Corne: and further decreed, That so long as he himselfe in person followed the warres in Peloponnesus, hee should receiue ten talents a moneth. Being thus enabled, he began to prouide shipping, that so he might inuade the Aetolians, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians, that were maritime people, at his pleasure, and hinder their excursions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond measure, to see things goe forward so well without his helpe; euen by the ministery of those whom he most hated. Wherefore he entred into conspiracie with Leontius and Megaleas: binding himselfe and them by Oath, to crosse and bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King should take in hand. By so doing, they thought to bring it to passe, that very want of ability to doe anything without them, should make him speake them faire, and be glad to submit himselfe to their directions. The King it is like had stood in some awe of them whilst he was a child; and therefore these wisemen perswaded themselues, that, by looking bigge vpon him, and imputing vnto him all that fell out ill through their own misgouernment of his affaires, they might rule him as a childe still. Apelles would needs goe to Chalcis, there to take order for the prouisions, which were to come that way out of Macedon. The other two staid behind with the King, to play their parts; all more mindfull of their wicked ends, than of their duties.

His Fleet and Armie being in a readinesse, Philip made countenance, as if hee would haue bent all his forces against the Eleans; to whose aid therfore the Aetolians sent many, little fearing that the mischiefe would haue fallen, as soone after it did, vpon themselues. But against the Eleans and those that came to helpe them, Philip thought it enough to leaue the Achæans, with some paro of his & their Mercenaries. He himselfe with the body of his Armie putting to Sea, landed in the Ile of Cephallenia: whence the Aetolians dwelling ouer against it, vsed to furnish themselues of shipping, when they went to rone abroad. There he besieged the Towne of Palæa, that had beene very seruiceable to the Enemie against him and his Confederates; and might bee very vsefull to him, if hee could get it. Whilst hee lay before this Towne, there came vnto him fifteene shippes of warre from Scerdilaidas; and many good souldiers, from the Epirots, Acarnanians, and Messenians. But the Town was obstinate; and would not bee terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts saue one, on which side Philip carried a Mine to the wall, wherewith he ouerthrew two hundred foote thereof. Leontius Captaine of the Targettiers, was appointed by the King to make the assault. But he, remembring his couenant with Apelles, did both wilfully forbeare to doe his best; and caused others to doe the like. So the Macedonians were put to foyle, and many slaine, not of the worst souldiers, but such as had gotten ouer the breach, and would haue carried the Towne; if the Treason of their Captaine, and some by him corrupted, had not hindred the victory. The King was angry with this, but there was no remedie; and therefore he thought vpon breaking vp the siege. For it was easier vnto the Towne's-men to make vp the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whilst hee stood thus perplexed and vncertaine what course to take: the Messenians and Acarnanians lay hard vpon him, each of them desirous to draw him into their owne Country. The Messenians alledged, that Lycurgus was busie in wasting their Country: vpon whom the King might come vnawares in one day; the Etesian windes which then blew, seruing fitly for his Nauigation. Hereto also Leontius perswaded; who considered that those windes, as they would easily carry him thither, so would they detaine him there perforce (blowing all the Dogge-dayes) and make him spend the Summer to small or no purpose. But Aratus gaue better counsaile, and preuailed. He shewed how vnfitting it were, to let the Aetolians ouer-runne all Thessalie againe, and some part of Macedon, whilst the King withdrew his Armie farre off to seeke small aduentures. Rather, hee said that the time now serued well to carry the warre into Aetolia; since the Prætor was gone thence abroad on roning, with the one halfe of their strength. As for Lycurgus, he was not strong enough to doe much harme in Peloponnesus: and it might suffice, if the Achæans were appointed to make head against him. According to this aduice, the King sets sayle for Atolia, and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which diuideth the Aetolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to see him on their borders; and ioyned with him as many of them as could beare armes, to helpe in taking vengeance vpon their bad neighbours. He marched vp into the in-land Country, and taking some places by the way, which he filled with Garrisons to assure his Retrait, He passed on to Thermum, which was the Receptacle of the Aetolians, and surest place of defence in all extremities. The Country round about was a great Fastnesse, enuironed with rockie Mountaines of very narrow, steepe, & difficult asce[n]t. There did the Aetolians vse to hold all their chiefe meetings, their Faires, their election of Magistrates, and their solemne Games. There also they vsed to bestow the most precious of their goods, as in a place of greatest security. This opinion of the naturall strength had made them carelesse in looking vnto it. When Philip therefore had ouercome the bad way, there was nothing else to do than to take spoile:

whereof he found such plenty, that hee thought the paines of his iourney well recompenced. So he loaded his Armie: and consuming all that could not be carryed away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chiefe of all belonging vnto the Ætolians; in remembrance of their like courtesie, shewed vpon the Temples of Dium and Dodona. This burning of the Temple, might (questionlesse) more for the Kings honour haue beene forborne. But perhaps he thought, as Monsieur du Gourgues the French Captaine told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his returne from Thermum, the Ætolians laid for him: which that they would doe, he beleeued before, and therefore was not taken vnawares: Three thousand of them there were that lying in ambush fell vpon his skirts. But he laid a Counter-ambush for them, of his Illyrians, who staying behind the rest, did set vpon the backes of the Ætolians, whilst they were busily charging in Rere the Armie that went before. So with slaughter of the enemie, hee returned the same way that he came: and burning downe those places that hee had taken before, as also wasting the Countrey round about him. Hee safely carryed all that hee had gotten aboard his Fleet. Once the Ætolians made countenance of fight, issuing out of Stratus in great brauery. But they were beaten home faster than they came, and followed to their very gates.

The ioy of this victorious Expedition being euery way complete, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any sinister accident; it pleased the King to make a great feast vnto all his friends and Captaines. Thither were inuited among the rest Leontius, with his fellow Megaleas. They came, because they could not choose: but their heauy lookes argued, what little pleasure they tooke in the Kings prosperitie. It grieued them to think, that they should be able to giue no better account vnto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings businesse; since Apelles himselfe, as will be shewed anon, had played his own part with a most mischieuous dexteritie. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent: they fell to reuiling him, throwing stones at him, so that they caused a great vprore; many running in (as happens in such cases) to take part with the one or the other. The King sending to inquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had passed. Which made him send for Leontius and his fellowes. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megaleas, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their disorder: and they, to giue him froward answers: insomuch, as they said at length, That they would neuer giue ouer, till they had rewarded Aratus with a mischiefe as he deserued. Hereupon the King committed them to ward. Leontius hearing of this, comes boldly to the King, with his Targettiers at his heeles: and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands vpon Megaleas, yea and to cast him into prison? Why, said the King, it was euen I. This resolute answer, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both sad and angrie; seeing himselfe out-frowned, and not knowing how to remedy the matter. Shortly after Megaleas was called foorth to his answer, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were; The hinderance of the Kings victory at Palea, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no lesse touching Leontius, that stood by as a looker on, than Megaleas that was accused. In conclusion, the presumptions against him were so strong, and his answers thereto so weake; that he, and Crinon one of his fellowes, were condemned in twenty Talents: Crinon being remanded back to prison, and Leontius becomming Bayle for Megaleas. This was done vpon the way home-ward, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip dispatched well a great deale of businesse this yeere. For as soone as hee was at Corinth, hee tooke in hand an Expedition against the Lacedæmonians. These and the Eleans had done what harme they could in Peloponnesus, whilst the King was absent. The Achæans had opposed them as well as they could, with ill successe, yet so, as they hindred them from doing such harme as else they would haue done. But when Philip came, he ouer-ran the Countrey about Lacedæmon: & was in a manner at the gates of Sparta, ere men could well beleeue that he was returned out of Ætolia. He tooke not in this Expedition any Cities, but made great waste in the fields: and hauing beaten the enemie in some skirmishes, carryed backe with him to Corinth a rich booty of cattell, slaues, and other Countrie-spoyle. At Corinth he found attending him, Embassadors from the Rhodians & Chians: that requested him to set Greece at quiet, by granting peace vnto the Ætolians. They had gracious audience: and he willed them to deale first with the Ætolians; who if they would make the same request, should not finde him vnreasonable. The Ætolians had sped ill that yeer: neither saw they any likely hopes for the yeeres following. The Army that they had sent foorth to waste Thessaly and Macedon, found such opposition on the way, that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the meane season they had beene grieuously afflicted, as before is shewed, by Philip in the centre of their owne Countrey. All Greece and Macedon was vp in armes against them, and their weake Allies the Eleans & Lacedæmonians. Neither was it certaine, how long the one or other of these their Peloponnesian friends should be able to hold out, since they were not strong enough to keepe the field, but had already suffered those miseries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each to seeke their owne peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Ætolians readily entertained this negotiation of Peace: and taking truce for thirty daies with the King, dealt with him by intercession of the same Embassadors, to intreat his presence at a Diet of their nation, that should be held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchsafe to come, they promised that he should find them conformable to any good reason.

Whilest these things were in hand, Leontius and Megaleas thought to haue terrified the King, by raising sedition against him in the Army. But this deuice sorted to no good effect. The souldiers were easily and quickly incensed against many of the Kings friends, who were said to be the cause, why they were not rewarded with so much of the booty, as they thought to belong of right vnto them. But their anger spent it selfe in a noyse, and breaking open of doores, without further harme done. This was enough to informe the King (who easily pacified his men with gentle words) that some about him were very false. Yea the souldiers themselues, repenting of their insolence, desired to haue the Authors of the tumult sought out, and punished according to their deserts. The King made shew as if hee had not cared to make such inquisition. But Leontius and Megaleas were afraid, lest the matter would soone come out of it selfe to their extreme danger. Wherefore they sent vnto Apelles, the Head and Architect of their treason; requesting him speedily to repaire vnto Corinth, where hee might stand betweene them and the Kings displeasure. Apelles had not all this while beene wanting to the businesse, vndertaken by him and his treacherous companions. Hee had taken vpon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his owne hand: and thereby was hee growne into such credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Thessalie addressed themselues vnto him, and receiued from him their dispatch in euery businesse. Likewise the Greekes in all their flattering Decrees, tooke occasion to magnifie the vertue of Apelles, making slight mention (onely for fashions sake) of the King: who seemed no better than the Minister and Executioner of Appelles his will and pleasure. Such was the arrogancie of this great man, in setting himselfe out vnto the people: but in managing the Kings affaires, hee made it his speciall care, that mony, and all things needefull for the publike seruice, should bee wanting. Yea hee enforced the King, for very neede, to sell his owne Plate and houshold vessels: thinking to resolue these and all other difficulties, by only saying, Sir, be ruled wholly by me, and all shall be as you would wish. Hereto if the King would giue assent, then had this Politician obtained his hearts desire. Now taking his iourney from Chalcis in the Isle of Eubœa, to the city of Corinth where Philip then lay: he was fetcht in with great pompe and royaltie, by a great number of the Captaines and Souldiers, which Leontius and Megaleas drew forth to meete him on the way. So entring the city with a goodly traine, he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride, and had vehement suspicion of his falsehood. Wherefore one was sent to tell him, that he should wait a while, or come another time, for the King was not now at leisure to be spoken with. It was a pretty thing, that such a check as this made all his attendants forsake him, as a man in disgrace; in such sort, that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him saue his owne Pages. After this, the King vouchsafed him now and then some slender graces: but in consultations, or other matters of priuacie, he vsed him not at all. This taught Megaleas to looke to himselfe, and run away betimes. Hereupon the King sent foorth Taurion his Lieutenant of Peloponnesus, with all the Targettiers, as it were to do some piece of seruice, but indeede of purpose to apprehend Leontius in the absence of his followers. Leontius being taken, dispatched away a messenger presently to his Targettiers, to signifie what was befallen him: and they foorthwith sent vnto the King in his behalfe. They made request, That if any other thing were obiected against him, hee might not bee called forth to triall before their returne: as for the debt of Megaleas, if that were all the matter, they said they were ready to make a purse for his discharge. This affection of the souldiers made Philip more hastie than else he would haue beene, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere letters of Megaleas were intercepted, which hee wrote vnto the Ætolians; vilifying the King with opprobrious words; and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was euen ready to sinke vnder the burden of his owne pouertie. By this the King vnderstood more perfectly the falshood, not onely of Megaleas, but of Apelles; whose cunning head had laboured all this while to keepe him so poore. Wherefore he sent one to pursue Megaleas that was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his sonne, and another that was inward with him, to prison; wherein all of them shortly ended their liues. Megaleas also, neither daring to stand to triall, nor knowing whither to flie, was weary of his owne life; and slew himselfe about the same time.

The Ætolians, as they had begun this warre vpon hope of accomplishing what they listed in the Nonage of Philip: so finding that the vigour of this yong Prince, tempered with the cold aduice of Aratus, wrought very effectually toward their ouerthrow; they grew very desirous to make an end of it. Neuertheless being a turbulent Nation, and ready to lay hold vpon all aduantages: when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Megaleas, together with some indignation thereupon conceiued by some of the Kings Targettiers, they began to hope anew, that these troubles would be long lasting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium, of this was Philip nothing sorie. For being in good hope throughly to tame this vnquiet Nation; He thought it much to concerne his owne honour, that all the blame of the beginning & continuing the warre should rest vpon themselues. Wherfore he willed his Confederates, to lay aside all thought of peace, and to prepare for war against the yeere following; wherein he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian souldiers, by yeelding to let them winter in their owne Countrie. In his returne homeward, he called into iudgement one Ptolomie, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treasons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians, and suffered death. These were the same Macedonians, that lately could not endure to heare of Leontius his imprisonment: yet now they thinke the man worthy to die that was but his adherent. So vaine is the confidence, on which Rebels vse to build, in their fauour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip won some bordering Townes; from which the Dardanians, Ætolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accustomed to make rodes into his kingdome: when he had thus prouided for safetie of his owne; the Ætolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came againe Embassadors from the Rhodians and Chians, with others from Ptolomy King of Egypt, and from the City of Byzantium, recontinuing the former sollicitation about the Peace. This fashion had beene taken vp in matters of Greece, euer since the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken vpon them to set the whole Country at liberty: No sooner was any Prouince or Citie in danger to be oppressed and subdued by force of warre, but presently there were found intercessors, who pittying the effusion of Greekish blood, would importune the stronger to relinquish his aduantage. By doing such friendly offices in time of need, the Princes and States abroad sought to binde vnto them those people, that were howsoeuer weake in numbers, yet very good souldiers. But hereby it came to passe, that the more froward sort, especially the Ætolians, whose whole Nation was addicted to falsehood and robberie, durst enter boldly into quarrels with all their Neighbours: being well assured, that if they had the worst, The loue of Greece would bee sufficient for to redeeme their quiet. They had, since the late Treatie of peace, done what harme they could in Peloponnesus: but being beaten by the Achæans, and standing in feare to bee more soundly beaten at home, they desired now, more earnestly than before, to make an end of the Warre as soone as they might. Philip made such answer vnto the Embassadours, as he had done the former yeere; That he gaue not occasion to the beginning of this warre, nor was at the present affraid to continue it, or vnwilling to end it: but that the Ætolians, if they had a desire to liue in rest, must first bee dealt withall, to signifie plainly their determination, whereto himselfe would returne such answer as hee should thinke fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking vnto the Peace, being a yong Prince, and in hope to increase the honour which he daily got by the warre. But it happened in the middest of this Negotiation, that he was aduertised by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victorie Hannibal had obtained against the Romans in the Battaile at Thrasymene. These letters he communicated vnto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hannibal: and not to sit still, as an idle beholder of the Italian Warre. Hereby hee grew more inclinable than before vnto Peace with the Ætolians: which was concluded shortly in a meeting at Naupactus. There did Agelaus an Ætolian make a great Oration: telling, how happie it was for the Greekes, that they might at their owne pleasure dispute about finishing Warre betweene themselues, without being molested by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans or Carthaginians, had subdued one the other, it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith look Eastward, and seeke by all meanes to set footing in Greece. For this cause he said it were good, that their Countrie should be at peace within it selfe: and that Philip, if he were desirous of warre, should lay hold on the opportunitie, now fitly seruing, to enlarge his Dominion, by winning somewhat in Italy.

Such aduice could the Ætolians then giue, when they stood in feare of danger threatning them at hand: but being soone after wearie of rest, as being accustomed to enrich themselues by pillage, they were so farre from obseruing and following their own good counsell, that they inuited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought themselues and the whole Countrie, (but themselues before any other part of the Countrie) vnder seruitude of strangers. The Condition of this Peace was simple, That euery one should keepe what they held at the present, without making restitution, or any amends for damages past.

§. III.

Philip, at the persuasion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Tenour of the League betweene Hannibal and Philip.

THis being agreed vpon: the Greekes betooke themselues to quiet courses of life; and Philip to prepare for the businesse of Italy, about which hee consulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus passed the time away, till the great battaile of Cannæ: after which hee ioyned in league with Hannibal, as hath beene shewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice vnto the Romans; and knew no other way to be auenged vpon them, or to recouer his owne lost Kingdome, than by procuring the Macedonian, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counsaile, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwise beene farre more expedient for Philip, to haue supported the weaker of those two great Cities against the more mighty. For by so doing, hee should perhaps haue brought them to peace vpon some equall tearmes; and thereby, as did Hiero a farre weaker Prince, haue both secured his owne Estate, and caused each of them to be desirous of chiefe place in his friendship. The issue of the counsaile which hee followed, will appeare soone after this. His first quarrell with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Ætolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, vpon such Conditions that might easily be broken: haue beene related in another place, as belonging vnto the second Punicke Warre. Wherefore I will onely here set downe the tenour of the League betweene Him and Carthage: which may seeme not vnworthy to be read, if onely in regard of the forme it selfe then vsed; though it had beene ouer-long to haue beene inserted into a more busie peece.

The Oath and Couenants betweene Hannibal, Generall of the Carthaginians, and Xenophanes, Embaſſador of Philip King of Macedon.

THIS is the League ratified by oath, which Hannibal the Generall, and with him Mago, Myrcal, and Barmocal, as alſo the Senators of Carthage that are preſent, and all the Carthaginians that are in his Armie, haue made with Xenophanes the ſonne of Cleomachus Athenian, whom King Philip the ſonne of Demetrius hath ſent vnto vs, for himſelfe and the Macedonians, and his Aſſociates: Before Iupiter, and Iuno, and Apollo: before † The God of the Carthaginians, Hercules and Tolaus, before Mars, Triton, Neptune: before The Gods accompanying Armes, the Sun, the Moone, and the Earth; before Riuers and Meddowes, and Waters; before all the Gods, that haue power ouer Carthage; before all the Gods that rule ouer Macedon, and the reſt of Greece; before all the Gods that are Preſidents of Warre, and preſent at the making of this League. Hannibal the Generall hath ſaid, and all the Senators that are with him, and all the Carthaginians in his Armie: Be it agreed betweene You and Vs, that this oath ſtand for friendſhip and louing affection, that Wee become friends, familiar, and brethren, Vpon Couenant, that the ſafetie of the Lords the Carthaginians, and of Hannibal the Generall and thoſe that are with him, and of the Rulers of Prouinces of the Carthaginians vſing the ſame Lawes; and of the Vticans, & as many Cities & Nations as obey the Carthaginians, and of the Souldiers and Aſſociates, and of all Townes and Nations with which We hold friendſhip in Italy, Gaule, and Liguria, and with whom we ſhall hold friendſhip or make alliance hereafter in this Region; be preſerued by King Philip and the Macedonians, and ſuch of the Greekes as are their Aſſociates. In like manner ſhall King Philip and the Macedonians, and other the Greekes his Aſſociates, bee ſaued and preſerued by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Vticans, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Aſſociates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italy, Gaule and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or ſhall hereafter ioyne with Vs in Italy. Wee ſhall not take counſaile one againſt the other, nor deale fraudulently one with the other. With all readineſſe and good will, without deceit or ſubtletie, We ſhall be enemies vnto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting thoſe Kings, Townes, and Hauens, with which We haue already league and friendſhip. Wee alſo ſhall be enemies to the enemies of King Philip, excepting thoſe Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which Wee haue already league and friendſhip. The warre that We haue with the Romans, haue Ye alſo with them, vntill the Gods ſhall giue vs a new and happie end. Yee ſhall aide Vs with thoſe things whereof wee haue need, and ſhall doe according to the Couenants betweene Vs. But if the Gods ſhall not giue vnto You and Vs their helpe in this warre againſt the Romans and their Aſſociates; then if the Romans offer friendſhip, Wee ſhall make friendſhip in ſuch wiſe that Yee ſhall be partakers of the ſame friendſhip, with Condition, That they ſhall not haue power to make warre vpon you: Neither ſhall the Romans be Lords ouer the Corcyreans, nor ouer thoſe of Apollonia, nor Dyrrachium, nor ouer Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Parthini, nor Atintania. They ſhall alſo render vnto Demetrius Pharius all thoſe that belong vnto him, as many as are within the Romans Dominions. But if the Romans (after ſuch peace made) ſhall make warre vpon Yee or Vs; Wee will ſuccour one another in that warre, as either ſhall haue need. The ſame ſhall be obſerued in warre made by any other, excepting thoſe Kings, Cities, and States, with whom wee hold already league and friendſhip. To this league if We or Ye ſhall thinke fit to adde or detract, ſuch addition or detraction ſhall be made by our common conſent.

§. IIII.

How Philip yeelded to his naturall vices, being therein soothed by Demetrius Pharius. His desire to tyrannize vpon the free States his Associates: with the troubles, into which hee thereby fell, whilest he bore a part in the second Punick warre. Hee poysoneth Aratus: and growes hatefull to the Achæans.

HItherto Philip had carried himselfe as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wisedome, hee might haue offered his friendship to the Romans, that were like to be oppressed, than to the Carthaginians, who had the better hand: yet this his meddling in the Punick warre, proceeded from a royall greatnesse of minde, with a desire to secure and increase his owne estate, adding therewithall reputation to his Countrie. But in this businesse he was guided (as hath beene said) by Demetrius Pharius: who, looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate himselfe to his desires: and thereby shortly gouerned him as he listed. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed such as they seemed. He was lustfull, bloudy, and tyrannicall: desirous of power to doe what he listed, and not otherwise listing to doe what he ought, thah so farre forth, as by making a faire shew he might breed in men such good opinion of him, as should helpe to serue his turne in all that hee tooke in hand. Before hee should busie himselfe in Italy, he thought it requisite in good policie, to bring the Greekes that were his Associates vnder a more absolute forme of subiection. Hereunto Apelles had aduised him before: and he had liked reasonably well of the course. But Apelles was a boysterous Counsellor, and one that referring all to his owne glory, thought himselfe deepely wronged if he might not wholly haue his owne way, but were driuen to await the Kings opportunity at better times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to obserue the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach-man with the reines in his hand, those affections which himselfe did onely seeme to follow. Therefore he grew daily more and more in credit: so as, without any manner of contention, he supplanted Aratus: which the violence of Apelles could neuer doe.

There arose about these times a very hote Faction among the Messenians, betweene the Nobilitie and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diuerted (as happens often after a forreign warre) vnto domesticall obiects, than allayed and reduced vnto a more quiet temper. In processe of no long time, the contention among them grew so violent, that Philip was entreated to compound the differences. He was glad of this: resoluing so to end the matter, that they should not henceforth striue any more about their Gouernment: for that hee would assume it wholly to himselfe. At his comming thither, hee found Aratus busie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his owne secret purpose. Wherefore he consulted not with this reuerend old man: but talked in priuate with such of the Messenians as repaired vnto him. He asked the Gouernours, what they meant to stand thus disputing: and whether they had not Lawes, to bridle the insolence of the vnrulie Rabble: Contrariwise, in talking with the heads of the popular Faction, He said it was strange, that they being so many, would suffer themselues to be opposed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themselues from Tyrants. Thus whilest each of them presumed on the Kings assistance; they thought it best to goe roundly to worke, ere that hee were gone that should countenance their doings. The Gouernours therefore would haue apprehended some seditious Oratours, that were, they said, the stirrers vp of the multitude vnto sedition. Vpon this occasion the people tooke Armes: and running vpon the Nobilitie and Magistrates, killed of them in a rage almost two hundred. Philip thought, it seemes, that it would be easie to worrie the sheepe, when the Dogs their guardians were slaine. But his falshood and double dealing was immediately found out. Neither did the younger Aratus forbeare, to tel him of it in publike, with very bitter and disgracefull words. The King was angry at this. But hauing already done more than was commendable, or excusable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein hee should need the helpe and countenance of his best friends; Hee was content to smother his displeasure, and make as faire weather as hee could. Hee ledde olde Aratus aside by the hand; and went vp into the Castle of Ithome, that was ouer Messene. There hee pretended to doe sacrifice: and sacrifice he did. But it was his purpose to keepe the place to his owne vse: for that it was of notable strength, and would serue to command the further parts of Peloponnesus, as the Citadel of Corinth, which he had already cõmanded the entrance into that Countrie. Whilest he was therefore sacrificing, and had the entrailes of the beast deliuered into his hands, as was the manner, hee shewed them to Aratus, and gently asked him, whether the tokens that he saw therein did signifie, That being now in possession of this place, he should quietly goe out of it, or rather keepe it to himselfe. He thought perhaps, that the old man would haue soothed him a little, were it onely for desire to make amends for the angry words newly spoken by his sonne. But as Aratus stood doubtfull what to answer, Demetrius Pharius gaue this verdict: If thou be a Soothsayer, thou must goe thy waies, and let slip this good aduantage; If thou bee a King, thou must not neglect the opportunitie, but hold the Oxe by both his hornes. Thus hee spake, resembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus vnto the two horns of Peloponnesus. Yet would Philip needes heare the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainely, That it were well done to keepe the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith vnto the Messenians: But if, by seizing vpon Ithome, He must lose all the other Castles that he held, and especially the strongest Castle of all that was left vnto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it farre better to depart with his souldiers, and keepe men in dutie, as he had done hitherto, by their owne good wills, than by fortifying any strong places against them, to make them of his friends become his Enemies.

To this good aduice Philip yeelded at the present: but not without some dislike, thenceforth growing betweene Him and the Arati, whom he thought more froward than beseemed them, in contradicting his will. Neither was the old man desirous at all, to deale any longer in the Kings affaires, or be inward with him. For as he plainely discouered his Tyrannous purposes: so likewise he perceiued, that in resorting to his house, He had beene dishoneſt with his sonnes wife. He therefore staid at home: where at good leisure he might repent, that in despight of Cleomenes, his owne Countriman, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Peloponnesus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponnesus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refused to beare him company. In this iourney he found by experience what Aratus had lately told him, That vnhoneſt counsailes are not so profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers & dependants, and so they purposed to continue. But He would needes haue them so to remaine, whether they purposed it or not. Whereforeto make them the more obnoxious vnto his Will, He seised vpon their Towne of Orieum, and laid siege to Apollonia; hauing no good colour of these doings: but thinking himselfe strong enough to doe what he listed, and not seeing whence they should procure friends to help them. Thus in stead of setling the country, as his intended Voyage into Italy required: He kindled a fire in it which he could neuer quench, vntill it had laid hold on his owne Palace. Whilest hee was thus labouring to binde the hands that should haue fought for him in Italy: M. Valerius the Roman came into those parts, who not onely maintained the Epirots against him, but procured the Ætolians to breake the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that warre, the occurrents whereof wee haue related before, in the place whereto it belonged. In mannaging whereof though Philip did the offices of a good Captaine: yet when leisure serued, He made it apparant that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former desire, of oppressing the libertie of the Messenians; but made another iourney into their Countrie, with hope to deceiue them, as before. They vndestood him better now than before, and therefore were not hasty to trust him too farre. When he saw that his cunning would not serue, He went to worke by force, and calling them his Enemies, inuaded them with open Warre. But in that warre he could doe little good; perhaps, because none of his Confederates were desirous to helpe him in such an enterprise. In this attempt vpon Messene he lost Demetrius Pharius, that was his Counsailor and Flatterer, not his peruerter; as appeares by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worse that hee sped, the more angry hee waxed against those that seemed not to fauour his iniurious doings. Wherefore by the ministery of Taurion, his Lieutenant, hee poysoned old Aratus; and shortly after that he poysoned also the yonger Aratus: hoping that these things would neuer haue beene knowne, because they were done secretly, and the poysons themselues were more sure than manifest in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed vnto

Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymnes, and Processions, to be celebrated euery yeere twice, with a Priest ordained vnto him for that purpose; as was accustomed vnto the Heroes, or men, whom they thought to be translated into the number of the gods. Hereunto they are said to haue beene encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo: which is like enough to haue beene true, since the helpe of the Deuill is neuer failing to the increase of Idolatrie.

The louing memorie of Aratus their Patron, and singular Benefactor, could not but worke in the Achæans a maruellous dislike, of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He shall therefore heare of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counsaile for themselues. At the present, the murder was not generally known or beleeued: neither were they in case to subsist, without his helpe that had committed it. The Ætolians were a most outragious people, great darers, and shamelesse robbers. With these the Romans made a league, whereof the Conditions were soone diuulged, especially that maine point, concerning the diuision of the purchase which they should make, namely, That the Ætolians should haue the country and Townes; but the Romans the spoyle, and carry away the people to sell for slaues. The Achæans, who in times of greater quiet, could not endure to make streight alliance with the Ætolians, as knowing their vnciuill disposition; were much the more auerse from them, when they perceiued how they had called in the Barbarians (for such did the Greeks account all other Nations except their owne) to make hauock of the Countrie. The same consideration moued also the Lacedæmonians, to stand off a while, before they would declare themselues for the Ætolians, whose friendship they had embraced in the late warre. The industry therefore of Philip, and the great care which he seemed to take of the Achæans his Confederates, sufficed to retaine them: especially at such time, as their owne necessitie was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged vnto himself the Dymæans, by an inestimable benefit: recouering their Towne, after it had beene taken by the Romans and Ætolians; and redeeming their people where soeuer they might be found, that had been carried away Captiue, and sold abroad for slaues. Thus might he haue blotted out the memorie of offences past, if the malignitie of his naturall condition had not otherwhiles broken out, and giuen them to vnderstand, that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which caused him to make such a shew of goodnesse. Among other foule acts, whereof hee was not ashamed, He tooke Polycrata the wife of the younger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might serue to confirm in the people their opinion, that he was guiltie of the old mans death. But of such faults he shall be told, when the Romans make warre vpon him the second time: for, of that which hapned in this their first Inuasion, I hold it superfluous to make repetition.

§. V.

Of Philopœmen Generall of the Achæans; and Machanidas, Tyrant of Lacedæmon. A battaile betweene them, wherein Machanidas is slaine.

IT happens often, that the disease of one eminent man discouers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there stood vp Philopœmen: whose notable valour, and great skill in Armes, made the Nation of the Achæans redoubtable among all the Greekes, and careless of such protection, as in former times they had needed against the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopœmen: who being then a young man, and hauing no command, did especiall seruice to Antigonus at the battaile of Sellasia against Cleomenes. Thence forward vntill now he had spent the most part of his time in the Ile of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and seldome or neuer at peace betweene themselues; He bettered among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of warre. At his returne home, Hee had charge of the Horse: wherein he carried himselfe so stirrily, trauailing with all the Cities of the Confederacie to haue his followers well mounted, and armed at all pieces: as also he so diligently trained them vp in all exercise of seruice, that he made the Achæans very strong in that part of their forces. Being afterward chosen Prætor or Generall of the Nation, He had no lesse care to reforme their militarie discipline throughout, whereby his Countrie might be strong enough to defend it selfe, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend vpon the helpe of others. Hee perswaded the Achæans to cut off their vaine expence of brandry, in apparel, houshold-stuffe, and curious fare, and to bestow that cost vpon their Armes: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by so much were they like to proue the better Souldiers, and fitable in behauiour, vnto the pride of their furniture. They had serued hetherto with little light Bucklers, and slender Darts, to cast a farre off, that were vsefull in skirmishing at some distance, or for Surprises, or sudden and hastie Expeditions, whereto Aratus had beene most accustomed. But when they came to handie strokes, they were good for nothing, so long as they were wholly driuen to relie vpon the courage of their Mercenaries. Philopœmen altered this: causing them to arme themselues more weightily, to vse a larger kind of shield, with good swords, and strong pikes, fit for seruice at hand. He taught them also to fight in close order, and altered the forme of their embattailing: not making the Files so deep as had been accustomed, but extending the Front, that he might vse the seruice of many hands.

Eight moneths were spent of that yeer, in which he first was Prætor of the Achæans, when Machanidas the tyrant of Lacedæmon caused him to make triall, how his Souldiers had profited by his discipline. This Machanidas was the successor vnto Lycurgus, a man more violent than his fore-goer. He kept in pay a strong Army of Mercenaries: and he kept them not onely to fight for Sparta, but to hold the Citie in obedience to himselfe perforce. Wherefore it behooued him not to take part with the Achæans, that were fauourers of liberty; but to strengthen himselfe by friendship of the Ætolians: who, in making Alliances, tooke no further notice of Vice or Vertue, than as it had reference to their own profit. The people also of Lacedæmon, through their inueterate hatred vnto the Argiues, Achæans, & Macedonians; were in like sort (all or most of them) inclinable to the Ætolian Faction. Very vnwisely. For in seeking to take reuenge vpon those, that had lately hindred them from getting the Lordship of Peloponnesus; they hindered themselues thereby from recouering the Mastrie of their owne Citie. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his own security, and no small hope of good that would follow, suffered not Machanidas to be idle; but alwaies made him ready to fall vpon his neighbours backes, and take of theirs what he could, whilest they were enforced, by greater necessity, to turne face another way. Thus had he often done, especially in the absence of Philip: whose sudden comming into those parts, or some other opposition made against him, had vsually made him faile of his attempts. At the present he was stronger in men, than were the Achæans, and thought his owne men better Souldiers than were theirs.

Whilest Philip therefore was busied else-where, he entred the Country of the Mantineans: being not without hope to doe as Cleomenes had done before him; yea and perhaps to get the * Lordship of Peloponnesus, as hauing stronger friends, and weaker opposition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopœmen was ready to entertaine him at Mantinea; where was fought betweene them a great battaile. The Tyrant had brought into the field vpon Carts a great many of Engines, wherwith to beat vpon the Squadrons of his Enemies, and put them in disorder. To preuent this danger, Philopœmen sent foorth his light armature a good way before him; so as Machanidas was faine to doe the like. To second these, from the one & the other side came in continuall supply; till at length all the Mercenaries, both of the Achæans & of Machanidas, were drawn vp to the fight: being so farre aduanced, each before their owne Phalanx, that it could no otherwise be discerned which pressed forward, or which recoyled, than by rising of the dust. Thus were Machanidas his Engines made vnseruiceable, by the interposition of his own men; in such manner as the Canon is hindred from doing execution, in most of the battailes fought in these our times. The Mercenaries of the Tyrant preuailed at length: not onely by their aduantage of number, but (as Polybius well obserueth) by surmounting their opposites in degree of coutage; wherein vsually the hired Souldiers of Tyrants exceed those that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant than they which liue oppressed by Tyrannie, since the one, by doing their best in fight, haue hope to acquite somewhat beneficiall to themselues, whereas the other doe fight (as it were) to assure their owne seruitude: so the Mercenaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruits of his prosperity, haue good cause to maintaine his quarrell as their own; whereas they that serue vnder a free State, haue no other motiue to doe manfully, than their bare stipend. Further than this, When a free State hath gotten the victory: many companies (if not all) of forrein Auxiliaries are presently cast; and therefore ſuch good fellowes will not take much paines to bring the warre to an end. But the victory of a Tyrant, makes him ſtand in need of more ſuch helpers: becauſe that after it he doth wrong to more, as hauing more ſubiects; and therefore ſtands in feare of more, that ſhould ſeeke to take reuenge vpon him. The ſtipendaries therefore of the Achæans, being forced to giue ground, were vrged ſo violently in their retrait by thoſe of Machanidas, that ſhortly they betooke themſelues to flight; and could not be ſtaid by any perſwaſions of Philopœmen, but ran away quite beyond the battaile of the Achæans. This diſaſter had beene ſufficient to take from Philopœmen the honour of the day; had he not wiſely obſerued the demeanour of Machanidas, and found in him that errour which might reſtore the victory. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries gaue chaſe vnto thoſe that fled: leauing behind him in good order of battail his Lacedæmonians, whom he thought ſufficient to deale with the Achæans, that were already diſheartened by the flight of their companions. But when this his raſhneſſe had carried him out of ſight; Philopœmen aduanced towards the Lacedæmonians that ſtood before him. There lay betweene them athwart the Countrie a long ditch, without water at that time; and therefore paſſable (as it ſeemed) without much difficultie, eſpecially for Foot. The Lacedæmonians aduentured ouer it, as thinking themſelues better ſouldiers than the Achæans; who had in a manner already loſt the day. But hereby they greatly diſordered their owne Battaile; and had no ſooner the foremoſt of them recouered the further banke, than they were ſtoutly charged by the Achæans, who draue them headlong into the ditch againe. Their firſt rankes being broken, all the reſt beganne to ſhrinke: ſo as Philopœmen getting ouer the ditch, eaſily chaſed them out of the Field. Philopœmen knew better how to vſe his aduantage, than Machanidas had done. He ſuffered not all his Armie to disband and follow the chaſe: but retained with him a ſufficient ſtrength, for the cuſtodie of a bridge that was ouer the ditch, by which he knew that the tyrant muſt come backe. The tyrant with his Mercenaries returning from the chaſe, looked very heauily when he ſaw what was fallen out. Yet with a luſty troupe of Horſe about him, he made towards the bridge: hoping to finde the Achæans in diſorder; and to ſet vpon their backes, as they were careleſſly purſuing their victory. But when hee and his company ſaw Philopœmen ready to make good the bridge againſt them; then began euery one to look, which way he might ſhift for himſelfe. The tyrant, with no more than two in his company, rode along the ditch ſide, and ſearched for an eaſie paſſage ouer. He was eaſily diſcouered by his purple Caſſock, & the coſtly trappings of his Horſe. Philopœmen therfore leauing the charge of the bridge to another, coaſted him all the way as he rode; and falling vpon him at length in the ditch it ſelfe, as he was getting ouer it, ſlew him there with his own hand. There dyed in this Battaile of the Lacedæmonians ſide about foure thouſand: and more than foure thouſand were taken Priſoners. Of the Achæan Mercenaries, probable it is that the loſſe was not greatly cared for; ſince that Warre was at an end, and for their money they might hire more when they ſhould haue need.

§. VI.

Philip hauing peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares againſt Aſia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bythinia, and their Linages. Of the Galatians.

BY this victory the Achæans learned to thinke well of themſelues. Neither needed they indeed after a while (ſuch was their diſcipline, and continuall exerciſe) to account themſelues in matter of warre inferiour to any, that ſhould haue brought againſt them no great ods of number. As for the Macedonian, He made no great vſe of them: but when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Ætolians, he ſtudied how to enlarge his Dominion Eaſtward; ſince the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the Weſt. He tooke in hand many matters together, or very neerely together, and ſome of them not honeſt: wherein if the Achæans would haue done him ſeruice, they muſt, by helping him to oppreſſe others that neuer had wronged him, haue taught him the way how to deale with themſelues. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had ioyned with the Romans and Ætolians in warre againſt him.

This

This Attalus, though a king, was ſcarce yet a Noble-man, otherwiſe than as hee was ennobled by his owne, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune beganne in Philetærus his Vncle: who being guelded, by reaſon of a miſhap which he had when he was a childe, grew afterwards thereby to be the more eſteemed: as great men in thoſe times repoſed much confidence in Eunuches, whoſe affections could not be obliged vnto wiues or children. He was entertained into the family of Docimus, a Captaine following Antigonus the firſt; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Maſter, that betooke him ſelfe to Lyſimachus King of Thrace. Lyſimachus had a good opinion of him; and put him in truſt with his money and accompts. But when at length he ſtood in feare of this King, that grew a bloudy Tyrant: He fled into Aſia, where he ſeized vpon the Towne of Pergamus, and nine thouſand talents belonging to Lyſimachus. The Towne and money, together with his owne ſeruice, Hee offered vnto Seleuchus the firſt, that then was ready to giue Lyſimachus battell. His offer was kindly accepted, but neuer performed; for that Seleuchus hauing ſlaine Lyſimachus, dyed ſhortly after himſelfe, before he made vſe of Philetærus or his money. So this Eunuch ſtill retained Pergamus with the Country round about it; and reigned therein twenty yeeres as an abſolute King. He had two brethren: of which the elder is ſaid to haue beene a poore Carter; and the yonger perhaps not much better; before ſuch time they were raiſed by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philetærus left his Kingdome to the elder of theſe, or to the ſonne of the elder called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his kingdome; making his aduantage of the diſſention, betweene Seleuchus Calinicus and Antiochus Hierax, the ſonnes of the ſecond Antiochus. He fought a battell with Hierax, neere vnto Sardes, and won the victory. At which time, to animate his men againſt the Gaules that ſerued vnder his Enemy, he vſed a pretty deuice. He wrote the word * Victory vpon the hand of his Soothſayer, in ſuch colours as would eaſily come off: and when the hot liuer of the beaſt that was ſacrifized, had cleanly taken the print of the letters, He publiſhed this vnto his Armie as a Miracle, plainely foreſhewing that the gods would be aſſiſtant in that Battaile.

After this victory, he grew a dreadfull enemy to Seleucus: who neuer durſt attempt to recouer from him, by Warre, the Territory that he had gotten and held. Finally, when he had reigned two and twenty yeeres, he died by a ſurfeit of ouer-much drinke, and left his kingdome to Attalus, of whom we now entreat, that was ſonne vnto Attalus the yongeſt brother of Philetærus. Attalus was an vndertaking Prince, very bountifull, and no leſſe valiant. By his owne proper forces He reſtored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his kingdome, whence he had been expelled. He was grieuouſly moleſted by Achæus: who ſetting vp himſelfe as king againſt Antiochus the great, reigned in the leſſer Aſia. He was beſieged in his owne City of Pergamus: but by the helpe of the Tectoſagæ, a nation of the Gaules, whom he called ouer out of Thrace, He recouered all that he had loſt. When theſe Gaules had once gotten footing in Aſia, they neuer wanted employment: but were either entertained by ſome of the Princes reigning in thoſe quarters, or interpoſed themſelues, without inuitation, and found themſelues worke in quarrels of their owne making. They cauſed Pruſias King of Bithynia to ceaſe from his war againſt Byzantium. Whereunto when he had condeſcended; they neuertheleſſe within a while after inuaded his Kingdome. Hee obtained againſt them a great victory; and vſed it with great crueltie, ſparing neither age nor ſexe. But the ſwarme of them increaſing; they occupied the Region about Helleſpont: where in ſeating themſelues, they were much beholding vnto Attalus. Neuertheleſſe, preſuming afterwards vpon their ſtrength; they forced their Neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute: In the ſharpe exaction whereof, they had no more reſpect vnto Attalus, than to any that had worſe deſerued of them. By this they compelled him to fight againſt them: and Hee being victorious, compelled them to containe themſelues within the bounds of that Prouince, which tooke name from them in time following, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they ſtill to oppreſſe the weakeſt of their neighbours; and to fill vp the Armies of thoſe, that could beſt hyre them.

The Kings reigning in thoſe parts, were the poſterity of ſuch, as had ſaued themſelues and their Prouinces, in the ſlothfull reigne of the Perſians; or in the buſie times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were very ancient. For the firſt of their line had married with Atoſſa, ſiſter vnto the great king Cyrus. Their Country was taken from them by Perdiccas, as is ſhewed before. But the ſon of that king, whom Predicca crucified, espying his time while the Macedonians were at ciuil warres among themselues; recouered his dominion, and passed it ouer to his off-spring. The Kings of Pontus had also their beginning from the Persian Empire; & are said to haue issued from the royall house of Achamenes. The Paphlagonians deriued themselues from Pylamenes, a king that assisted Priamus at the warre of Troy. These, applying themselues vnto the times, were alwaies conformable vnto the strongest. The Ancestors of Prusias had begun to reigne in Bythinia, some few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay somewhat out of the Macedonians way: by whom therefore, hauing other employment, they were the lesse molested. Calantus, one of Alexanders Captaines, made an Expedition into their Country; where hee was vanquished. They had afterwards to doe with a Lieutenant of Antigonus, that made them somewhat more humble. And thus they shuffled, as did the rest, vntill the reigne of Prusias, whom we haue already sometimes mentioned.

§. VII.

The Towne of Cios taken by Philip, at the instance of Prusias, King of Bithynia, and cruelly destroyed. By this and like actions, Philip growes hatefull to many of the Greekes: and is warred vpon by Attalus King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

Prusias as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whose greatnesse he suspected, He therefore strengthened himselfe, by taking to wife the daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrary side, entred into a strict Confederacie with the Etolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greekes. But when Philip had ended his Ætolian warre, and was deuising with Antiochus about sharing betweene them two the Kingdome of Egypt, wherein Ptolomie Philopater a friend vnto them both was newly dead, and had left his sonne Ptol. Epiphanes a yong childe his heire; the Bithynian entreated this his Father-in-law to come ouer into Asia, there to winne the Towne of the Ciani, and bestow it vpon him. Prusias had no right vnto the Towne, nor iust matter of quarrell against it: but it was fitly seated for him; and therewithall rich. Philip came, as one that could not well deny to helpe his Sonne-in-law. But hereby he mightily offended no small part of Greece. Embassadors came to him whilest he lay at the siege, from the Rhodians, and diuers other States: intreating him to forsake the enterprise. He gaue dilatorie, but otherwise gentle answers: making shew as if he would condescend to their request, when he intended nothing lesse. At length he got the Towne: where, euen in presence of the Embassadors, of whose sollicitation he had seemed so regardfull, Hee omitted no part of cruelty. Hereby hee rendred himselfe odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and cruell Prince. Especially his fact was detested of the Rhodians, who had made vehement intercession for the poore Ciani: and were aduertised by Embassadors of purpose sent vnto them from Philip, That, howsoeuer it were in his power to winne the Towne as soone as he listed: yet in regard of his loue to the Rhodians, He was contented to giue it ouer. And by this his clemency, the Embassadours said, that he would manifest vnto the world, what slanderous tongues they were; which noysed abroad such reports, as went of his falshood and oppression. Whilest the Embassadours were declaming at Rhodes in the Theater to this effect; there came some that made a true relation of what had hapned: shewing that Philip had sacked & destroyed the Town of Cios, and, after a cruell slaughter of the Inhabitants, had made slaues of all that escaped the sword. If the Rhodians tooke this in great despite, no lesse were the Ætolians inflamed against him: since they had sent a Captaine to take charge of the Towne; being warned before by his doings at Lysimachia & Chalcedon (which he had withdrawn from their Confederacie to his owne) what little trust was to be reposed in the faith of this king. But most of all others was Attalus moued with consideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, & of his own estate. He had much to lose; and was not without hope of getting much if he could make a strong Partie in Greece. He had already, as a new king, followed the example of Alexanders Captaines, in purchasing with much liberality the loue of the Athenians; which were notable Trumpeters of other mens vertue, hauing lost their owne. On the friendship of the Ætolians hee had cause to presume; hauing bound them vnto him by good offices, many and great, in their late warre with Philip. The Rhodians that were were mighty at Sea, and held very good intelligence with the Egyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States he easily drew into a streight alliance with him; by their hatred newly conceiued against Philip.

Vpon confidence in these his friends; but most of all, in the ready assistance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deale with the Macedonian by open warre. It had beene vnseasonable to protrastinate, and expect whereto the doings of the Enemy tended; since his desire to fasten vpon Asia was manifest, and his falshood no lesse manifest, than was such his desire. They met with him shortly not farre from Chios, and fought with him a battaile at Sea: wherein though Attalus was driuen to runne his owne shippe on ground, hardly escaping to land: though the Admirall of the Rhodians took his deaths wound: and though Philip after the battaile tooke harbour vnder a Promontorie; by which they had fought, so that he had the gathering of the wracks vpon the shoare: Yet forasmuch as he had suffered far greater losse of ships and men, than had the Enemy: and since he durst not in few dayes after put foorth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to braue him in his Port; the honour of the victory was adiudged to his Enemies. This notwithstanding, Philip afterwards besieged and wonne some Townes in Caria: whether only in a bravery, and to despight his opposites; or whether vpon any hopefull desire of conquest, it is vncertain. The stratageme, by which he wonne Prinassus, is worthy of noting. He attempted it by a Myne: and finding the earth so stony, that it resisted his worke, he neuertheless commanded the Pioners to make a noise vnder ground; and secretly in the night-time he raised great Mounts about the entrance of the Myne, to breed an opinion in the besieged, that the work went maruellously forward. At length he sent word to the Towns-men, that by his vnder-mining, two acres of their wall stood onely vpon woodden proppes, to which if he gaue fire, and entred by a breach, they should expect no mercy. The Prinassians little thought, that he had fetcht all his earth and rubbish by night a great way off, to raise vp those heapes which they saw; but rather that all had beene extracted out of the Myne. Wherefore they suffered themselues to be out-faced, and gaue vp the Towne as lost, which the Enemy had no hope to winne by force. But Philip could not stay to settle himselfe in those parts. Attalus and the Rhodians were too strong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make haste back into Macedon, whither they followed him all the way in manner of pursuit.

§. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian warre, seeke matter of quarrell against Philip. The Athenians vpon slight cause, proclaime warre against Philip; mooued thereto by Attalus; whom they flatter. Philip winnes diuers Townes: and makes peremptory answer to the Roman Ambassadour. The furious resolution of the Abydeni.

THese Asiatique matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet serued well to make a noyse in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, if not with a desire of making warre in Macedon, at least with a conceit that it were expedient so to doe. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the state of those Eastern Countries, and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greeks, which lay between them and the Lordship of Asia. These Greeks were factious, and seldome or neuer at peace. As for the Macedonian, though length of time, and continuall dealings in Greece euer since the reignes of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference betweene him and the Naturalls; yet most of them abhorred his Dominion, because he was originally forsooth a Barbarian: many of them hated him vpon ancient quarrels: and they that had beene most beholding vnto him, were neuertheless weary of him, by reason of his personall faults. All this gaue hope, that the affaires of Greece would not long detaine the Roman Armies: especially since the diuisions of the Country were such, that euery petty Estate was apt to take counsaile apart for it selfe; without much regarding the generality. But the poore Commonalty of Rome had no great affection to such a chargeable enterprise. They were already quite exhausted, by that grieuous warre with Hannibal: wherein they had giuen by Loane to the Republike, all their money: neither had they as yet receiued, neither did they receiue vntill fifteene or sixteene yeers after this, their whole summe backe againe. That part of payment also which was already made, being not in present mony, but much of it in Land: it behoued them to rest a while; and bestow the more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the lesse able to bestow cost. Wherefore they took no pleasure to heare, that Attalus and the Rhodians had sent Embassadours to solicite them against Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Asia: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had sent letters of the same tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by setting out the preparations of this dangerous enemy, that sollicited not onely the Townes vpon the Continent, but all the Ilands in those Seas, visiting them in person, or sending Embassadours, as one that meant shortly to hold warre with the Romans vpon their owne ground. Philip had indeed no such intent: neither was he much too strong either of himself, or by his alliance in Greece, to be resisted by Attalus and the Rhodians, especially with the helpe of the Ætolians their good friends, (and in a manner) his owne professed enemies. But such things must bee published abroad, if onely to predispose men vnto the warre, and giue it the more honest colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thriue by intermedling in the affaires of those that were more mighty than himselfe. He was too vnskilfull, or otherwise too vnapt, to retaine his old friends: yet would he needs be seeking new enemies. And hee found them such, as hee deserued to haue them: for he offered his helpe to their destruction, when they were in misery, and had done him no harme. It behoued him therfore, either to haue strained his forces to the vtmost in making warre vpon them; or in desisting from that iniurious course, to haue made amends for the wrongs past, by doing friendly offices of his owne accord. But He, hauing broken that League of peace which is of all other the most naturall, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, vnlesse they thinke themselues iustly prouoked; was afterwards too fondly perswaded, that he might well be secure of the Romans, because of the written Couenants of peace betweene him and them. There is not any forme of oath, whereby such articles of peace can be held inuiolable, saue onely * by the water of Styx, that is, by Necessitie: which whilest it binds one partie, or both vnto performance, making it apparant, that he shall be a loser who starts from the Conditions; it may so long (and so long onely) bee presumed, that there shall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquished, the Romans neuer hearkened after Philip: for necessity made them let him alone. But when once they had peace with Carthage, then was the Riuer of Styx dryed vp: and then could they sweare as * Mercurie did in the Comedie, by their owne selues, euen by their good swords, that they had good reason to make warre vpon him. The Voyage of Sopater into Africke, and the present warre against Attalus, were matter of quarrell as much as needed: or if this were not enough, the Athenians helped to furnish them with more.

* Sir Fr. Bacon de Sap. Veterum.

* Plaut. Amphitr.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their own barren Territory, tooke state vpon them neuertheless, as in their ancient fortune. Two yong Gentlemen of Acarnania entring into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation, (wherein were deliuered the mysteries of Religion, or rather of idolatrous superstition, vainely said to bee auaileable vnto felicitie after this life) discouered themselues by some impertinent questions, to be none of those that were initiated. Hereupon they were brought before the Officers: and though it was apparant, that they came into the place by meere error, not thinking to haue therein done amisse; yet, as it had beene for some haynous crime, they were put to death. All their Country-men at home took this in ill part; and sought to reuenge it as a publike iniurie, by warre vpon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip some Macedonians to help them, they entred into Attica: who wasted it with fire and sword, and carried thence a great booty. This indignitie stirred vp the high-minded Athenians, and made them thinke vpon doing more, than they had ability to performe. All which at the present they could doe, was to send Embassadours to king Attalus, gratulating his happy successe against Philip, and intreating him to visit their Citie. Attalus was hereto the more willing; because he vnderstood that the Roman Embassadors, houering about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpose to be there at the same time. So he went thither, accompanied, besides his own followers, with some of the Rhodians. Landing in the Piræus, he found the Romans there, with whom hee had much friendly conference: they reioycing that he continued enemy to Philip; & He being no lesse glad, when he heard of their purpose to renew the war. The Athenians came out of their Citie, all the Magistrates, Priests, and Citizens, with their wiues and children, in as solemne a pompe as they could deuise, to meet and honour the King. They entertained the the Romans that were with him, in very louing manner: but towards Attalus himselfe they omitted no point of obseruance, which their flattery could suggest. At his first comming into the Citie they called the people to Assembly: where they desired him to honour them with his presence, and let them heare him speake. But he excused himselfe, saying, That with an euill grace he should recount vnto them those many benefits, by which hee studied to make them know what loue he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that hee should deliuer in writing, what he would haue to be propounded. He did so. The points of his Declaration were; first, what he had willingly done for their sake: then, what had lately passed betweene him and Philip: lastly, an exhortation vnto them, to declare themselues against the Macedonian, whilest he with the Rhodians, and the Romans, were willing & ready to take their part: which if they now refused to doe, he protested, that afterwards it would be vaine to craue his helpe. There needed little intreatie: for they were as willing to proclaime the warre, as he to desire it. As for other matters, they loaded him with immoderate honours: and obtained, That vnto the ten Tribes, whereof the body of their Citizens consisted, should be added another, and called after his name; as if he were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians they also decreed a Crowne of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhodians free Citizens of Athens.

Thus began a great noyse of warre, wherein little was left vnto the Romans for their part; Attalus and the Rhodians taking all vpon them. But while these were vainely misspending the time, in seeking to draw the Ætolians to their partie: that contrary to their old manner were glad to be at quiet: Philip wonne the Townes of Maronea and Ænus, with many other strong places about the Hellespont. Likewise passing ouer the Hellespont, he laid siege vnto Abydus; and wonne it, though he was faine to stay there long. The towne held out, rather vpon an obstinate resolution, and hope of succour from Attalus and the Rhodians, than any great ability to defend it selfe against so mighty an Enemy. But the Rhodians sent thither onely one Quadrireme Gallie: and Attalus no more than three hundred men; farre too weake an aide to make good the place. The Roman Embassadours wondred much at this great negligence, of them that had taken so much vpon them.

These Embassadours C. Claudius, M. Æmylius, and P. Sempronius, were sent vnto Ptolomie Epiphanes king of Egypt, to acquaint him with their victory against Hannibal and the Carthaginians; as also to thank him for his fauour vnto them shewed in that war; and to desire the continuance thereof, if they should need it against Philip. This Egyptian king was now in the third or fourth yeere of his Reigne, which (as his Father Philopater had done before him) he beganne a very yong boy. The courtesie for which the Romans were to thanke him, was, that out of Egypt they had lately beene supplied with Corne, in a time of Extreame Dearth; when the miseries of War had made all their own Prouinces vnable to relieue them. This message could not but bee welcome to the Egyptian: since it was well knowne, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themselues against him, conspiring to take away his Kingdome. And therefore it might in reason be hoped, that he, or his Councell for him, should offer to supply the Romans with Corne: since this their Macedonian Expedition concerned his Estate no lesse than theirs.

But as the errand was for the most part complementall: so had the Embassadours both leisure and direction from the Senate, to looke vnto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Æmylius the yongest of them should steppe aside, & visite Philip, to try if he could make him leaue the siege of Abydus; which else he was like to carry. Æmylius, comming to Philip, tels him, that his doings are contrary to the League that he had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodians, vpon whom he made warre, were Confederate with Rome: and the towne of Abydus, which he was now besieging, had a kind of dependancie vpon Attalus. Hereto Philip answered, That Attalus and the Rhodians had made warre vpon him: and that he did only requite them with the like. Doe you also (said Æmylius) requite these poore Abydeni with such terrible Warre, for any the like Inuasion by them first made vpon you? The King was angry to heare himselfe thus taken short: and therefore hee roundly made answer to Æmylius; It is your youth, Sir, and your beautie, and (aboue all,) your being a Roman, that maketh you thus presumptuous. But I would wish yee to remember the League that ye haue made with me, and to keepe it: if ye doe otherwise, I will make ye vnderstand, that the Kingdome, and Name of Macedon is in matter of Warre, no lesse noble than the Roman. So he dismissed the Embassador; and had the Towne immediately yeelded to his discretion. The people had entertained a resolution, to haue died euery one of them, and set their Towne on fire; binding themselues hereto by a fearefull oath, when Philip denied to accept them vpon reasonable Conditions. But hauing in desperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, lost the greatest number of their Youth: it was thought meet by the Gouernours and Ancients of the Citie to change this resolution, and take such peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Siluer to Philip: about which whilest they were busie, the memory of their oath wrought so effectually in the yonger sort; that, by exhortation of their Priests, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themselues. Hereof the King had so little compassion, that He said, he would grant the Abydeni three dayes leisure to die: and to that end forbad his men to enter the towne; or hazard themselues in interrupting the violence of those mad fooles.

The Romans decree warre against Philip, and send one of their Consuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poore the Athenians were at this time both in quality and estate.

THis calamity of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romans vnto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it neerely resembled; though Rome was not alike interessed in the quarrell. But to helpe themselues with pretence for the warre, they had found out another Saguntum, euen the Citie of Athens: which if the Macedonian should winne, then rested there no more to doe, than that hee should presently embarke himselfe for Italie; whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum in fiue moneths, but in the short space of fiue dayes sayling. Thus P. Sulpitius the Consul told the multitude, when he exhorted them to make warre vpon Philip; which at his first propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alledged; to shew, what Philip, with the power of a greater kingdome, might dare to vndertake: as also the fortunate Voyage of Scipio into Africk; to shew the difference of making warre abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their owne Country. By such arguments was the Commonalty of Rome induced to beleeue, that this war with the Macedonian was both iust and necessary. So it was decreed: and immediatly the same Consul hasted away towards Macedon, hauing that Prouince allotted vnto him before, & all things in a readinesse, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motiues, than the people must bee acquainted with. Great thankes were giuen to the Athenian Embassadours, of their constancie (as was said) in not changing their faith at such time as they stood in danger of being besieged. And indeed great thankes were due to them, though not vpon the same occasion. For the people of Rome had no cause to thinke it a benefit vnto themselues, that any Greeke Town, refusing to sue vnto the Macedonian for peace, requested their helpe against him. But the Senate intending to take in hand the Conquest of the Easterne parts, had reason to giue thankes vnto those, that ministred the occasion. Since therefore it was an vntrue suggestion, That Philip was making readie for Italy: and since neither Attalus, the Rhodians, nor any other State in those quarters, desired the Romans to giue them protection: these busie-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and consequently with Philip, a matter of May-game, (as was shewed before) sent Embassadors into all parts of the World, euen to Ptolomy of Egypt, and to the Romans, as well as to Attalus and others their neighbors; must be accepted as cause of the warre, and Authors of the benefit thence redounding.

Neuertheleſſe as it loues to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence: the doings of P. Sulpitius the Consul were such, as might haue argued Athens to be the least part of his care. He sailed not about Peloponnesus, but tooke the ready way to Macedon, and landing about the Riuer of Apsus, betweene Dyrrachium & Apollonia, there beganne the Warre. Soone vpon his comming, the Athenian Embassadors were with him, and craued his helpe: whereof they could make no benefit whilest hee was farre from them. They bemoaned themselues as men besieged, and intreated him to deliuer them.

them. For which cause he sent vnto them C. Claudius with twenty gallies, and a competent number of men: but the maine of his forces hee retained with him, for the prosequution of a greater designe. The Athenians were not indeed besieged: onely some Rouers from Chalcis, in the Ile of Eubœa, and some bands of aduenturers out of Corinth, vsed to take their shippes and spoyle their fields, because they had declared themselues against King Philip, that was Lord of these two townes. The robberies done by these Pyrats and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than warr-like Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From such detriment the arriuall of Claudius, and shortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, easily preserued them. As for the Athenians themselues, they that had been wont, in ancient times, to vndertake the conquests of Egypt, Cyprus, and Cicil; to make warr vpon the great Persian King, and to hold so much of Greece in subiection, as made them redoubtable vnto all the rest; had now no more than three ships, and those open ones, not much better than long boates. Yet thought they not themselues a whit the worse men, but stood as highly vpon the glory and vertue of their Ancestors, as if it had been still their owne.

The Towne of Chalcis in Eubœa, taken and sackt by the Romans and their Associates, that lay in Garrison at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by surprize: wasteth the Country about, and makes a iourney into Peloponnesus. Of Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedemon, and his wife. Philip offers to make warre against Nabis for the Achæans. He returneth home through Attica, which he spoyleth againe: and prouides against the Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Diuers Princes ioyne with them. Great labouring to draw the Ætolians into the warre.

Philip returning home from Abydus, heard newes of the Roman Consul his being about Apollonia. But ere he stirred foorth to giue him entertainement, or perhaps before hee had well resolued, whether it were best a while to sit still, and trie what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make opposition, and resist these Inuaders with all his forces: he receiued aduertisement from Chalcis of a grieuous mishap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no such worke at Athens as they had expected, or was answerable to the fame that went abroad, purposed to doe somewhat that might quicken the warre, and make his owne imployment better. Hee grew soone weary of sitting as a Scarre-crow, to saue the Athenians grounds from spoyle; and therefore gladly tooke in hand a businesse of more importance. The towne of Chalcis was very negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiers therein, for that there was no Enemy at hand; and more negligently by the Towne's-men, who reposed themselues vpon their Garrison. Hereof Claudius hauing aduertisement, sailed thither by night, for feare of being descryed: and arriuing there a little before breake of day, tooke it by Scalado. Hee vsed no mercy, but slew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keepe it, (vnlesse he should haue left the heartlesse Athenians to their owne defence) hee set it on fire, consuming the Kings Magazines of Corne, and all prouisions for Warre, which were plenteously filled. Neither were He and his Associates contented with the great abundance of spoyle which they carried about their ships, & with inlarging all those, whom Philip, as in a place of most securitie, kept there imprisoned; but, to shew their despight and hatred vnto the King, they ouerthrew and brake in pieces the Statuaes to him there erected. This done, they hasted away towards Athens: where the newes of their exploit was like to be ioyfully welcomed. The king lay then at Demetrias, about some twenty miles thence; whither when these tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he saw that it was too late to remedie the matter; yet he made all hast to take reuenge. He thought to haue taken the Athenians, with their trusty friends, busie at worke in ransacking the towne, and loading themselues with spoyle: but they were gone before his comming. Fiue thousand light-armed foot hee had with him, and three hundred horse: whereof leauing at Chalcis onely a few to bury the dead, Hee marched from thence away speedily toward Athens; thinking it not vnpossible to take his enemies, in the ioy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-post that stood Scout for the Citie vpon the borders, had not descried him a farre off, and swiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was mid-night when this Poſt came thither: who found all the Towne aſleepe, as feareleſſe of any danger. But the Magiſtrates, hearing his report, cauſed a trumpet out of their Citadell to ſound the Alarme, and with all ſpeede made ready for defence. Within a few houres Philip was there: who ſeeing the many lights, and other ſignes of buſie preparation vſuall in ſuch a caſe, vnderſtood that they had newes of his comming, and therefore willed his men, to repoſe themſelues till it were day. It is like, that the paucitie of his followers did helpe well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compaſſe about by ſea, and had no cauſe of haſte) yet hauing in the towne ſome mercenarie Souldiers, which they kept, of their owne, beſides the great multitude of citizens, they aduentured to iſſue forth at a gate, whereto they ſaw Philip make approach. The king was glad of this; reckoning all thoſe his owne, that were thus hardie. Hee therefore onely willed his men to follow his example; and preſently gaue charge vpon them. In that fight hee gaue ſingular proofe of his valour: and beating downe many of the Enemies with his owne hands, draue them with great ſlaughter backe into the citie. The heat of his courage tranſported him further, than diſcretion would haue allowed, euen to the very gate. But he retired without harme taking; for that they which were vpon the Towers ouer the gate, could not vſe their caſting weapons againſt him, without much indangering their owne people that were thronging before him into the city. There was a Temple of Hercules, a place of exerciſe, with a Groue, and many goodly Monuments beſides, neere adioyning vnto Athens: of which he ſpared none; but ſuffered the rage of his anger to extend, euen vnto the ſepulchres of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and ſome Companies of Attalus his men from Ægina; too late in regard of what was already paſt: but in good time to preuent him of ſatisfying his anger to the full, which as yet he had not done. So he departed from thence to Corinth, and hearing that the Achæans held a Parliament at Argos, Hee came thither to them vnexpected.

The Achæans were deuiſing vpon warre: which they intended to make againſt Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon: who being ſtarted vp in the room of Machanidas, did greater miſchiefe than any that went before him. This Tyrant relyed wholly vpon his mercenaries: and of his ſubiects had no regard. He was a cruell oppreſſor; a greedy extortioner vpon thoſe that liued vnder him: and one that in his naturall condition ſmelt rankly of the Hangman. In theſe qualities, his wife Apega was very fitly matched with him, ſince his dexteritie was no greater in ſpoyling the men, than hers in fleecing their wiues; whom ſhe would neuer ſuffer to bee at quiet, till they had preſented her with all their Iewels and apparell. Her husband was ſo delighted with her propertie, that hee cauſed an Image to be made, liuely repreſenting her; & apparelled it with ſuch coſtly garments as ſhe vſed to weare. But it was indeed an Engine, ſeruing to torment men. Heereof hee made vſe, when he meant to trie the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling vnto him ſome rich man, of whoſe money he was deſirous; hee would bring him into the roome where this Counterfait Apega ſtood, and there vſe all his art of perſwaſion, to get what he deſired, as it were by good will. If he could not ſo ſpeed, but was anſwered with excuſes; then tooke he the refractory denier by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his Wife Apega (who ſate by in a Chaire) could perſwade more effectually. So he ledde him to the Image, that roſe vp and opened the armes, as it were for imbracement. Thoſe armes were full of ſharpe yron nayles, the like whereof was alſo ſticking in the breaſts, though hidden with her clothes: and herewith ſhe griped the poore wretch, to the pleaſure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruell death. Such, and worſe (for it were long to tell all here that is ſpoken of him) was Nabis in his Gouernement. In his dealings abroad hee combined with the Ætolians, as Machanidas and Lycurgus had done before him. By theſe he grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former warre. Of Philopœmens vertue he ſtood in feare, and therefore durſt not prouoke the Achæans, as long as they had ſuch an able Commander. But when Cyclidas, a farre worſe Captaine, was their Prætor; and all, or the greateſt part of their Mercenaries were diſcharged; Philopœmen being alſo gone into Crete, to follow his beloued occupation of Warre; then did Nabis fall vpon their Territory; and waſting all the fields, made them diſtruſt their owne ſafety in the Townes.

Against this Tyrant the Achæans were preparing for warre, when Philip came among them; and had set downe, what proportion of Souldiers euery Citie of their Corporation should furnish out. But Philip willed them, not to trouble themselues with the care of this businesse; forasmuch as he alone would ease them of this warre, and take the burden vpon himselfe. With exceeding ioy and thankes they accepted of this kinde offer. But then he told them, That, whilest he made warre vpon Lacedæmon, He ought not to leaue his owne Townes vnguarded. In which respect he thought they would be pleased, to send a few men to Corinth, & some Companies into the Ile of Eubœa; that so he might securely pursue the warre against Nabis. Immediately they found out his deuice; which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his warre against the Romans: Wherefore their Prætor Cycliades made him answer, That their Lawes forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than those for which it was assembled. So passing the Decree, vpon which they had agreed before, for preparing warre against Nabis, he brake vp the Assembly, with euery mans good liking; whereas in former times, he had beene thought no better than one of the Kings Parasites.

It grieued the King to haue thus failed in his purpose with the Achæans. Neuertheless he gathered vp among them a few Voluntaries; and so returned by Corinth backe into Attica. There he met with Philocles one of his Captaines, that with two thousand men had beene doing what harme he might vnto the Countrie. With this addition of strength, he attempted the Castle of Eleusine, the Hauen of Pyreus, and euen the citie of Athens. But the Romans made such haste after him by Sea, thrusting themselues into euery of these places; that he could no more than wreake his anger vpon those goodly Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time singularly beautified. So hee destroyed all the works of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble; which they had in plenty, of their owne; or, hauing long agoe beene masters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where best choyce was found. Neither did he onely pull all downe: but caused his men to breake the very stones, that they might be vnseruiceable to their reparation. His losse at Chalcis being thus reuenged vpon Athens, Hee went home into Macedon: & there made prouision, both against the Roman Consul that lay about Apollonia; and against the Dardanians, with other his bad neighbors, which were likely to infest him. Among his other cares he forgot not the Ætolians: to whose Parliament, shortly to be held at Naupactus, he sent an Embassage, requesting them to continue in his friendship. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpicius the Roman Consul encamped vpon the Riuer of Apsus. Thence hee sent forth Apustius, his Lieutenant, with part of the Army, to waste the borders of Macedon. Apustius tooke sundry Castles and Townes; vsing such extremity of sword and fire at Antipatria, the first good Towne which he wonne by force, that none durst afterwards make resistance, vnlesse they knew themselues able to hold out. Returning towards the Consul with his spoyle, he was charged in Rere, vpon the passage of a brooke, by Athenagoras a Macedonian captaine: but the Romans had the better, & killing many of these enemies, tooke prisoners many more, to the increase of their booty, with which they arriued in safety at their camp. The successe of this Expedition, though it were not great, yet serued to draw into the Roman friendship, those that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. These were Pleuratus, the son of Scerdilaidas the Illyrian: Aminander King of the Athamanians, and Bato the sonne of Longarus, a Prince of the Dardanians. They offered their assistance vnto the Consul, who thanked them: and said, That he would shortly make vse of Pleuratus and Bato, when hee entred into Macedon: but that the friendship of Aminander, whose Country lay betweene the Ætolians and Thessalie, might be perhaps auaileable with the Ætolians, to stirre them vp against Philip.

So the present care was wholly set vpon the Ætolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embassadours from the Macedonian, Romans, & Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian spake first, and said: That as there was nothing fallen out, which should occasion the breach of peace betweene his master and the Ætolians: so was it to bee hoped, that they would not suffer themselues, without good cause, to be caried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to consider, how the Romans heretofore had made shew, as if their warre in Greece tended only to the defence of the Ætolians, and yet notwithstanding had been angry, that the Ætolians, by making peace with Philip, had no longer need of such their Patronage. What might it be that made them so busie, in obtruding their protection vpon those that needed it not? Surely it was euen the generall hatred, which these Barbarians bore vnto the Greeks. For euen after the same sort had they sent their help to the Mamertines: and afterwards deliuered Syracuse, when it was oppressed by Carthaginian tyrants, but now both Syracuse & Messana, were subiect vnto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the same effect he alleaged many examples; adding, That in like sort it would happen to the Ætolians: who if they drew such masters into Greece, must not looke hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their owne, wherein to consult about Warre and Peace: the Romans would ease them of this care, & send them such a Moderator, as went euery yeere from Rome to Syracuse. Wherefore he concluded, that it was best for them, whilest as yet they might, and whilst one of them as yet could helpe the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, vpon light occasion, they happened to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three yeers agoe made the peace which still continued; although that the very same Romans were then against it, who fought to breake it now. It would haue troubled the Romans, to frame a good answer to these obiections. For the Macedonian had spoken the very truth, in shewing whereunto this their Patronage, which they offered with such importunitie, did tend. Wherfore the Athenians were set on by them to speake next: who had store of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. These affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embassadour, to cal the Romans by the name of Barbarians: knowing in what barbarous manner his owne king had, in few daies past, made Warre vpon the gods themselues, by destroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithall they made a pittifull rehearsall of their owne calamities: and said, that if Philip might haue his will, Ætolia, and all the rest of Greece, should feele the same that Attica had felt; yea that Athens it selfe, together with Minerua, Iupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to haue felt, if the walles and the Roman armes had not defended them.

Then spake the Romans: who excusing, as well as they could, their owne oppression of all those, in whose defence they had heretofore taken Armes, went roundly to the point, in hand. They said, that they had of late made Warre in the Ætolians behalfe, and that the Ætolians had without their consent made peace: whereof since the Ætolians must excuse themselues, by alledging that the Romans, being busied with Carthage, wanted leisure to giue them aide conuenient: so this excuse being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent against their common Enemy, it concerned the Aetolians to take part with them in their war and victory, vnlesse they had rather perish with Philip.

It might easily be perceiued, that they which were so vehement, in offring their help ere it was desired, were themselues carried vnto the warre by more earnest motiues, than a simple desire to helpe those friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may haue been the cause, why Dorymachus the Aetolian Prætor shifted them off a while with a dilatorie answer: though he told his Country-men, That by reseruing themselues, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with those that had the better fortune. His answer was, first, in generall termes; That ouermuch haste was an enemy to good counsaile: for which cause they must further deliberate, ere they concluded. But comming neerer to the matter in hand, Hee passed a Decree, That the Prator might at any time call an Assembly of the States, and therein conclude vpon this businesse; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwise it was vnlawfull to treat of such affaires, excepting two of their great Parliaments, that were held at set times.

§. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Ætolians inuade his dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman Fleet.

Philip was glad to heare, that the Romans had sped no better in their sollicitation of the Ætolians. Hee thought them heereby disappointed in the very beginning, of one great helpe; and meant himselfe to disappoint them of another. His sonne Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keepe the Streights of Pelagonia against the Dardanians;

Dardanians, hauing with him ſome of the Kings Councell, to gouerne both him and his Army. It was iudged, as may ſeeme, that the preſence of the Kings ſonne, how yong ſoeuer, would both encourage his followers, and terrifie the enemies, by making them at leaſt beleeue, that hee was not weakely attended. And this may haue beene the reaſon, why the ſame Perſeus, a few yeeres before this, was in like manner left vpon the borders of Ætolia by his father; whom earneſt buſineſſe called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand: it was thought, that the Macedonian Fleet vnder Heraclides, would ſerue to keepe Attalus, with the Rhodians and Romans, from doing harme by Sea, when the Kings backe was turned; who tooke his iourney Weſtward againſt Sulpicius the Conſul.

The Armies met in the Countrey of the Deſſaretij, a people in the vtmoſt borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the mountaines of Candauia; that running along from Hæmus in the North vntill they ioyne in the South with Pindus, incloſe the Weſterne parts of Macedon. Two or three dayes they lay in ſight the one of the other, without making offer of battaile. The Conſul was the firſt that iſſued foorth of his Campe into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the ſtrength which hee had then about him; and therfore thought it better to ſend foorth ſome of his light-armed Mercenaries, and ſome part of his horſe, to entertaine them with skirmiſh. Theſe were eaſily vanquiſhed by the Romans, and driuen backe into their Campe. Now although it was ſo, that the king was vnwilling to hazzard all at firſt vpon a Caſt, and therefore ſent for Perſeus with his Companies, to increaſe his owne forces: yet being no leſſe vnwilling to loſe too much in reputation; He made ſhew a day after, as if he would haue fought. Hee had found the aduantage of a place fit for ambuſh, wherein hee beſtowed as many as hee thought meet of his Targettiers: and ſo gaue charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captains to prouoke out the Romans to fight; inſtructing both him and the Targettiers, how to behaue themſelues reſpectiuely, as opportunitie ſhould fall out. The Romans had no miſtruſt of any ambuſh, hauing fought vpon the ſame ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might haue ſuſtained ſome notable detriment, if the kings directions had beene well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall backe, they charged him ſo hotly, that they draue him to an haſty flight, and purſued him as hard as they were able. But the Captaines of the Targettiers, not ſtaying to let them runne into the danger, diſcouered themſelues before it was time; and thereby made fruſtrate the worke, to which they were appointed. The Conſul hereby gathered, that the king had ſome deſire to trie the fortune of a battaile: which he therfore preſented the ſecond time; leading forth his Army, and ſetting it in order, with Elephants in the front: a kinde of help which the Romans had neuer vſed before, but had taken theſe of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was ſcarce aboue foureſcore yeeres ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italy, to affright the Romans, who had neuer ſeene any of thoſe beaſts before. But now the ſame Romans (whileſt poſſibly ſome were yet aliue, which had known that Expedition of Pyrrhus) come into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greeks haue none. Philip had patience to let the Conſul braue him at his Trenches: wherein he did wiſely: for the Roman had greater need to fight, than Hee. Sulpicius was vnwilling to loſe time: neither could he, without great danger, lying ſo neere the Enemy, that was ſtrong in Horſe, ſend his men to fetch in corne out of the fields. Wherefore he remoued eight miles off: preſuming that Philip would not aduenture to meet him on euen ground; and ſo the more boldly hee ſuffered his Forragers to ouer-runne the Countrey. The king was nothing ſorry of this; but permitted the Romans to take their good pleaſure: euen till their preſumption, and his owne ſuppoſed feare, ſhould make them careleſſe. When this was come to paſſe, hee tooke all his horſe, and light-armed foot, with which hee occupied a place in the mid-way, betweene the Forragers and their Campe. There hee ſtayed in Couert with part of his forces; to keepe the paſſages that none ſhould eſcape. The reſt he ſent abroad the Countrey, to fall vpon the ſtraglers: willing them to put all to the ſword, and let none run home with newes to the Campe. The ſlaughter was great: and thoſe which eſcaped the hands of them that were ſent abroad to ſcowre the fields, lighted all or moſt of them vpon the king and his companies in their flight: ſo as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Campe had newes of this. But in the end there eſcaped ſome: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went;

went: yet by telling what had happened to themselues, raised a great tumult. Sulpicius hereupon sends foorth all his horse, and bids them helpe their fellowes where they saw it needfull: He himselfe with the Legions followed. The companies of Horse diuided themselues, accordingly as they met with aduertisements vpon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was most of the danger. Such of them as lighted vpon Philips Troupes, that were canuassing the field, tooke their taske where they found it: But the maine bulke of them fell vpon the King himselfe. They had the disaduantage; as comming fewer, and vnprepared, to one that was ready for them. So they were beaten away: as their fellowes also might haue beene, if the King had well bethought himselfe, and giuen ouer in time. But while, not contented with such an harueſt, he was too greedy about a poore gleaning: the Roman Legions appeared in sight: which emboldened their horse to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparant, enforced the Macedonians to looke to their owne safetie. They ran which way they could: and (as men that lie in waite for others, are seldome heedfull of that which may befall themselues) to escape the Enemie, they declined the faireſt way; so as they were plunged in Marishes and Bogges, wherein many of them were lost. The Kings horse was slaine vnder him: and there had hee beene cast away, if a louing subiect of his had not alighted; mounted him vpon his owne horse; and delinered him out of perill, at the expence of his owne life, that running on foot was ouertaken and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improuident rashnes; and the Consul, with as much dulneſse, for his dayes seruice. A little longer stay would haue delinered the king from these enemies without any blow: since when all the fields about them were wasted, they must needes haue retired backe to the Sea. On the other side, it was not thought vnlikely, That if the Romans following the king, had set vpon his Campe, at such time as hee fled thither, halfe amazed with feare of being either slaine or taken, they might haue wonne it. But that Noble Historian, Liuie, (as is commonly his manner) hath iudiciously obserued, That neither the one, nor the other, were much too blame in this dayes worke. For the maine body of the Kings Armie lay safe in his Campe; and could not be so astonished with the losse of two or three hundred Horse, that it should therefore haue abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himselfe, he was aduertised, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardanians, were fallen vpon his Countrey; when they found the passage thereinto open, after Perseus was called away from custody of the Streights. This was it which made him aduenture to doe somewhat betimes; that he might set the Romans going the sooner, and afterwards looke vnto his troublesome neighbours. In consideration of this, Philip was desirous to cleere himselfe of the Romans, as soone as he might. And to that purpose hee sent vnto the Consul; requesting a day of truce for buriall of the dead. But in stead of so doing, he marched away by night, and left fires in his Camp to beguile the enemy, as if he had not stirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not slow to follow him. He ouertook the Macedonians in a place of strength, which they had fenced (for it was a wooddy ground) by cutting downe trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was most open. In making of such places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little vse; being a square battell of pikes, not fit for euery ground. The Archers of Crete were iudged, and were indeed, more seruiceable in that case. But they were few; and their arrows were of small force against the Roman shields. The Macedonians therfore helped them by flinging of stones. But to no purpose. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This victory (such as it was) layd open vnto the Consull some poore Townes thereabout; which partly were taken by strong hand, partly yeelded for feare. But the spoyle of these, and of the fields adioyning, was not sufficient to maintaine his Army; and therefore he returned backe to Apollonia.

The Dardanians, hearing that Philip was come backe, withdrew themselues apace out of the Countrey. The King sent Athenagoras to waite vpon them home; whilest he himselfe went against the Ætolians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Ætolians, who had reserued himselfe and his Nation vnto the euent of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once & again: as also that Pleuratus & the Dardanians were fallen vpon Macedon; grew no lesse busie on the sudden, than before he had beene wise. He perswaded his Nation to take their time: and so, not staying to proclaime warre, ioyned his forces with Aminander the Athamanian; and made inuasion vpon Thessaly. They tooke and cruelly cruelly ſacked a few Townes: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might doe what they liſted. But Philip came vpon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay diſperſed, was like to haue taken their Camp; if Aminander, more warie than the Ætolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retrait through his owne mountainous Countrey.

About the ſame time; the Roman Fleet, aſſiſted by Attalus and the Rhodians, had taken ſome ſmall Ilands in the Ægean Sea. They tooke likewiſe the Towne of Oreum in the Iſle of Eubœa; and ſome other places thereabout. The Townes were giuen vnto Attalus, after the ſame Compact that had formerly beene made with the Ætolians: the goods therein found were giuen vnto the Romans; and the people, for ſlaues. Other attempts on that ſide were hindred; either by foule weather at Sea; or by want of daring, and of meanes.

§. XII.

Villius the Roman Conſul waſtes a yeere to no effect. Warre of the Gaules in Italy. An Embaſſie of the Romans to Carthage, Maſaniſſa, and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdome: and T. Quintius Flaminius is ſent againſt him.

THus the time ranne away: and P. Villius a new Conſul, tooke charge of the warre in Macedon. He was troubled with a Mutinie of his oldeſt Souldiers: whereof two thouſand; hauing ſerued long in Sicil and Africk, thought themſelues much wronged, in that they could not bee ſuffered to looke vnto their owne eſtates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had ſerued at Cannæ: as may ſeeme by their complaint, of hauing beene long abſent from Italy; whither faine they would haue returned, when by their Colonels they were ſhipped for Macedon. How Villius dealt with them, it is vncertaine. For the Hiſtory of his yeere is loſt: whereof the miſſe is not great, ſince he did nothing memorable. Valerius Antias, as we finde in Liuie, hath adorned this Liuius. Villius with a great exploit againſt Philip. Yet ſince Liuie himſelfe, an Hiſtorian to whom few of the beſt are matchable, could finde no ſuch thing recorded in any good Author; we may reaſonably beleeue, that Villius his yeere was idle.

In the beginning of this Macedonian War, the Romans found more trouble than could haue beene expected with the Gaules. Their Colonie of Placentia, a goodly and ſtrong Towne, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Aſdrubal, had beene able to force; was taken by theſe Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like ſort Cremona was attempted; but ſaued her ſelfe, taking warning by her neighbours calamitie. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that ſtaied behinde Aſdrubal, or Mago, in thoſe parts; was now become Captaine of the Gaules, in theſe their enterpriſes. This when the Romans heard, they ſent Embaſſadours to the Carthaginians: giuing them to vnderſtand, That, if they were not wearie of the peace, it behooued them to call home, and deliuer vp, this their Citizen Amilcar, who made war in Italy. Hereunto it was added (perhaps leſt the meſſage might ſeeme otherwiſe to haue ſauoured a little of ſome feare) That of the Fugitiue ſlaues belonging to the Romans, there were ſome reported to walke vp and downe in Carthage: which if it were ſo, then ought they to be reſtored back to their Maſters; as was conditioned in the late Peace. The Embaſſadours that were ſent on this errand, had further charge to treat with Maſaniſſa, as alſo with Vermina the ſonne of Syphax. Vnto Maſaniſſa, beſides matter of complement, they were to ſignifie what pleaſure Hee might doe them, by lending them ſome of his Numidian Horſe, to ſerue in their Warre againſt the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchſafe vnto him the name of King: and promiſed thereafter to deſerue it, by his readineſſe in doing them all good offices. But they were ſomewhat ſcrupulous in the matter: and ſaid, That hauing beene, and being ſtill (as they tooke it) their Enemie, He ought firſt of all to deſire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they vſed not to conferre vpon any, ſaue onely vpon ſuch as had royally deſerued it at their hands. The authoritie to make peace with him, was wholly committed vnto theſe Embaſſadours, vpon ſuch termes as they ſhould thinke fit; without further relation to the Senate and People. For they were then buſied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle anſwer, That they wholly diſclaimed Amilcar: baniſhing him, and confiſcating his goods. As for the Fugitiues: they had reſtored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as farre as was requiſite, requisite, giue satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithall they sent a great proportion of Corn to Rome; and the like vnto the Armie that was in Macedon. King Masanissa would haue lent vnto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian Horse: but they were contented with halfe the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadours, to giue them entertainement, on the borders of his Kingdome; and without any disputation, agreed with them vpon termes of peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian Warre, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gaules: they laide siege vnto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came vpon them, fought a battaile with them, and ouercame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battaile: and the fruit of the victorie was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the worke easie to those, that afterwards should haue the managing of warre among those Gaules. So was there good leisure to thinke vpon the businesse of Macedon: where Philip was carefully prouiding to giue contentment vnto his Subiects, by punishing a bad Counsailour whom they hated; as also to assure vnto himselfe the Achæans, by rendring vnto them some Townes that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdome, not onely by exercising and trayning his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of Epirus. This was in doing, when Villius, hauing vnprofitably laboured to finde way into Macedon, taking a iourney (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came aduertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Consul, and had Macedon allotted him for his Prouince; whose comming was expected; and he very shortly arriued at the Armie.

§. XIII.

The Romans begin to make warre by negotiation. T. Quintius winnes a passage against Philip. Thessaly wasted by Philip, the Romans, and Ætolians. The Acheans forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treatie of peace, that was vaine. Philip deliuers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

THe Romans had not beene wont in former times, to make Warre after such a trifling manner. It was their vse, to giue battaile to the Enemie, as soone as they met with him. If he refused it, they besieged his Townes: and so forced him to trie the fortune of a day, with his disaduantage in reputation, when he had long forborne it (as it would be interpreted) vpon knowledge of his owne weakenesse. But in this their Warre with Philip, they began to learne of the subtle Greekes, the art of Negotiation: wherein hitherto they were not growne so fine, as within a little while they proued. Their Treasury was poore, and stood indebted,* many yeers after this, vnto priuat men, for part of those moneys that had beene borrowed in the second Punicke Warre. This had made the Commonaltie auerse from the Macedonian warre; and had thereby driuen the Senators, greedy of the enterprize, to make vse of their cunning. Yet being weary of the slow pace wherwith their businesse went forward, they determined to increase their Armie, that they might haue the lesse need to relie vpon their Confederates. So they leuied eight thousand Foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Consul into Macedon. Their Nauie, and other meanes could well haue serued, for the setting foorth and transportation of a greater Armie: but by straining themselues to the most of their ability, they should (besides other difficulties incident vnto the sustenance of those that are too many and too farre from home) haue bred some iealousie in their friends of Greece, and thereby haue lost some friends, yea, perhaps haue increased the number of their enemies more than of their owne Souldiers. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himselfe vnto them, by his Embassadours; requesting that either they would vndertake the defence of his Kingdome against Antiochus, who inuaded it; or else that they would not take it vncourteously, that hee quitted the Warre with Philip, and returned home, to looke vnto that which more concerned him. Their answer was remarquable. They said, That it was not their manner to vse the ayde of their friends, longer than their friends had good opportunitie, and could also bee well contented to afford it;

That

That they could not honestly take part with Attalus, their good friend though he were, against Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deale with Antiochus by Embassadours, and (as common friends vnto both of the Kings) doe their best to perswade an attonement betweene them. In such louing fashion did they now carry themselues, towards their good friend the King Antiochus; who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Army from the kingdome of Attalus. But how little they regarded these termes of friendship, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very soone appeare.

T. Quintius hasting away from Rome, came betimes into his Prouince, with the supply decreed vnto him; which consisted, for the most part, of old Souldiers, that had serued in Spaine and Africk. He found Villius the old Consul, (whom at his comming hee presently discharged) & king Philip of Macedon, encamped one against the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the riuer of Apsus or Aous. It was manifest, that either the Romans must fetch a compasse about, and seek their way into Macedon, through the poore Countrey of the Dassaretians; or else winne, by force, that passage which the King defended. In taking the former way; they had already two yeeres together mis-spent their time, and beene forced to returne backe without profit, for want of victualls: whereof they could neither carry with them store sufficient, nor finde it on the way. But if they could once get ouer these Mountains, which diuided the South of Epirus from Thessaly, then should they enter into a plentifull Country; and, which by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a maner) part of his kingdome, whereof it made the South border. Neuertheless, the desire of winning this passage, was greater than the likelihood. For the Riuer of Apsus, running along through that valley which alone was open betweene the Mountaines, made it all a deep Marish and vnpassable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the maine rocke by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius assayled to climbe in the Mountaines: but finding himselfe disappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his enemie, who neglected not the guard of them that was very easie; he was compelled to sit still, without doing any thing for the space of forty daies.

This long time of rest gaue hope vnto Philip, that the war might bee ended by composition, vpon some reasonable termes. He therefore so dealt with some of the Epirots, (among whom hee had many friends) that Hee and the Consull had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Consull would haue him to set all Townes of Greece at libertie; and to make amends for the injuries, which he had done to many people in his late warres. Philip was contented to giue libertie to those whom hee had subdued of late: but vnto such, as had beene long subiect vnto him and his Ancestors, Hee thought it against all reason, that hee should relinquish his clayme and dominion ouer them. He also said, That as farre foorth as it should appeare that hee had done wrong vnto any Towne or people whatsoeuer, He could well be pleased to make such amends, as might seeme conuenient in the iudgement of some free State, that had not beene interessed in those quarrells. But herewithall Quintius was not satisfied. There needed (he said) no iudgement or compromise; forasmuch as it was apparant, that Philip had alwaies been the Inuader; and had not made warre, as one prouoked, in his owne defence. After this altercation, when they should come to particulars: and when the Consul was required to name those Towns, that he would haue to be set at libertie; the first that he named were the Thessalians: These had beene subiects (though conditionall) vnto the Macedonian Kings, euer since the daies of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. VVherefore, as soone as Flaminius had named the Thessalians; the king in a rage demanded what sharper condition Hee would haue laid vpon him, had hee beene but vanquished. And herewithall abruptly he flang away; refusing to heare any more of such discourse.

After this the Consull stroue in vaine two or three dayes together, to haue preuailed against the difficulties of that passage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himselfe, and could not resolue what course to take: there came to him an Heards-man sent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that fauoured the Romans, who hauing long kept beasts in those Mountaines, was throughly acquainted with all by-paths, and therefore vndertooke to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they should haue aduantage of the Enemy. This guide, for feare of treacherous dealing, was fast bound:

bound: and being promiſed a great reward, in caſe hee made good his word, had ſuch Companies as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They trauailed by night (it being then about the full of the Moone) and reſted in the day-time, for feare of being diſcouered. When they had recouered the hill-tops, and were aboue the Macedonians, (though vndiſcouered by them, becauſe at their backs) they raiſed a great ſmoke, whereby they gaue notice of their ſucceſſe vnto the Conſul. Some skirmiſhes, whileſt theſe were on their iourny, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonian, thereby to auert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he ſaw the ſmoke ariſe more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained vnto the place whither they were ſent, hee preſſed as neere as he could vnto the Enemies Campe, and aſſailed them in their ſtrength. He preuailed as little as in former times, vntill the ſhoutings of thoſe that ran downe the hill, and charged Philip on the backe, aſtoniſhed ſo the Macedonians, that they betooke themſelues to flight. The King, vpon firſt apprehenſion of the danger, made all ſpeed away to ſaue himſelfe. Yet anon conſidering, that the difficulty of the paſſage muſt needes hinder the Romans from purſuing him: hee made a ſtand at the end of fiue miles, and gathered there together his broken troups, of whom he found wanting no more than two thouſand men. The greateſt loſſe was of his Campe and prouiſions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation; for that now the Macedonians began to ſtand in feare, leſt being driuen from a place of ſuch aduantage, they ſhould hardly make good their party againſt the Enemy, vpon equall ground. Neither was Philip himſelfe much better perſwaded. Wherefore he cauſed the Theſſalians, as many of them as in his haſtie retrait hee could viſit, to forſake their Townes and Countrie, carying away with them as much as they were able, and ſpoyling all the reſt. But all of them could not be perſwaded, thus to abandon (for the pleaſure of their king) their ancient habitations, and all the ſubſtance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly reſiſted him; which they might the better doe, for that he could not ſtay to vſe any great compulſion. He alſo himſelfe tooke it very grieuouſly, that he was driuen to make ſuch waſte of a moſt pleaſant and fruitfull Countrey, which had euer been well affected vnto him: ſo that a little hinderance did ſerue, to make him breake off his purpoſe, and withdraw himſelfe home into his kingdome of Macedon.

The Ætolians and Athamanians, when this fell out, were euen in a readineſſe to inuade Theſſaly; whereinto the wayes lay more open, out of their ſeuerall Countries. When therefore they heard for certainty, that Philip was beaten by the Romans: they foreſlowed not the occaſion, but made all ſpeed, each of them to lay hold vpon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten ſo much before his coming, that he, in gleaning after their harueſt, could not finde enough to maintaine his Army. Thus were the poore Theſſalians, of whoſe liberty the Romans a few dayes ſince had made ſhew to be very deſirous, waſted by the ſame Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turne themſelues, or whom to auoyde. T. Quintius wonne Phaleria by aſſault: Metropolis and Piera yeelded vnto him. Rhage he beſieged: and hauing made a faire breach, yet was vnable to force it; ſo ſtoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian garriſon therein. Philip alſo at the ſame time, hauing ſomewhat recollected his ſpirits, houered about Tempe with his Army, thruſting men into all places, that were like to be diſtreſſed. So the Conſul, hauing well-neere ſpent his victuals, and ſeeing no hope to preuaile at Rhage; brake vp his ſiege, and departed out of Theſſaly. He had appointed his ſhips of burden to meete him at Anticyra, an Hauen Towne of Phocis, on the Gulph of Corinth: which Country being friend to the Macedonian, he preſently inuaded; not ſo much for hatred vnto the people, as becauſe it lay conueniently ſeated between Theſſaly and other regions, wherein he had buſineſſe, or was ſhortly like to haue. Many Townes in Phocis he wonne by aſſault: many were yeelded vp vnto him for feare; and within ſhort ſpace hee had (in effect) maſtered it all.

In the meane time L. Quintius the Conſuls brother, being then Admirall for the Romans in this warre, ioyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleete. They wonne two Cities in Euboea; and afterward laid ſiege vnto Cenchree, an Hauen and Arcenall of the Corinthians on their Eaſterne Sea. This enterpriſe did ſomewhat helpe forward the Achæans, in their deſire to leaue the part of Philip: ſince it might come to paſſe, that Corinth it ſelfe, ere long time were ſpent; & that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very shortly should be rendred vnto their Nation, by favour of the Romans.

But there were other Motiues, inducing the Achæans to preferre the friendship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had beene long accustomed. For this King had so many wayes offended them in time of peace, that they thought it the best course to rid their hands of him; whilest being intangled in a dangerous warre, hee wanted meanes to hinder the execution of such counsaile, as they should hold the safest: His tyrannous practises to make himselfe their absolute Lord: His poysoning of Aratus their old Gouernour: His false dealing with the Messenians, Epirots, and other people their Confederates, and his owne dependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed; had caused them long since to hold him as a necessarie euill, euen whilest they were vnable to be without his assistance. But since by the vertue of Philopœmen, they were growne somewhat confident in their owne strength, so as without the Macedonians helpe they could as well subsist, as hauing him to friend: then did they only thinke how euill he was; and thereupon reioyce the more, in that hee was become no longer necessary. It angred him to perceiue how they stood affected: and therefore hee sent murderers, to take away the life of * Philopœmen. But failing in this enterprise; and being detected, he did thereby onely set fire to the Wood, which was throughly drie before, and prepared to burne. Philopœmen wrought so with the Achæans, that no discourse was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to withdraw themselues from the Macedonian. Cycliadas, a principall man among them, and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them, for shewing himselfe passionate in the cause of Philip; and Aristænus chosen Prætor, who laboured to ioyne them in societie with the Romans.

These newes were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadours were sent from the Romans, and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians, and Athenians, to treat with the Achæans, making promise, that they should haue Corinth restored vnto them, if they would forsake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Achæans was held at Sycion, to deliberate and resolue in this weighty case. Therein the Romans and their adherents desired the Achæans, to ioyne with them in making warre vpon Philip. Contrariwise, the Embassadors of Philip, whom he had also sent for this busines, admonishing the Achæans of their Alliance with the king, & of their faith due vnto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remaine as Neuters. This moderate request of Philips Embassadour, did no way aduance his Masters cause. Rather it gaue the Achæans to vnderstand, That hee, who could bee satisfied with so little at their hands, knew himselfe vnable to gratifie them in any reciprocall demand. Yet were there many in that great Councell; who remembring the benefites of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the preseruation of the ancient League. But in fine, the sense of late iniuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future; preuailed against the memorie of those old good turnes, which hee, (and Antigonus before him) had partly sold vnto them, and partly had vsed as baites, whereby to allure them into absolute subiection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance; That the Romans were strong, and likely to preuaile in the end. So after much altercation, the Decree passed, That they should thenceforward renounce the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this warre. With Attalus and the Rhodians, they forthwith entred into societie: with the Romans (because no League would bee of force, vntill the Senate and people had approued it) they forbore to decree any societie at the present, vntill the returne of those Embassadours from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Megalopolitans, Dymeans, and Argiues, hauing done their best for the Macedonian, as by many respects they were bound; rose vp out of the Councell, and departed before the passing of the Decree, which they could not resist, nor yet with honesty thereto giue assent. For this their good will, and greater, which they shortly manifested, the Argiues had so little thanke, that all the rest of the Achæans may be the better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soone after this, vpon a solemne day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens discouered it selfe so plainely, in the behalfe of Philip, that they which were his Partisans within the Towne, made no doubt of putting the Citie into his hands, if they might haue any small assistance. Philocles, a Lieutenant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth, which he had manfully defended against the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conspirators drew to Argos; whither comming on a ſudden, and finding the Multitude vnarmed, & done with him, He eaſily compelled the Achæan Garriſon to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth and ſome other Townes, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, ſo they gaue him hope to obtaine ſome good end by Treatie, whileſt as yet with his honour he might ſeeke it: and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Conſul ſhould ſhortly be choſen, who ſhould take the worke out of Titus his hands if it were not concluded the ſooner. Titus had the like reſpect vnto him ſelfe, and therefore thought it beſt, ſince more could not bee done, to prædiſpoſe things vnto a Concluſion, for his owne reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-ſhore, in the Bay then called the Malian, or Lamian Bay, now (as is ſuppoſed) the Gulfe of Zeiton, in the Ægæan Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus, with Aminander the Athamanian, an Embaſſador of Attalus, the Admirall of Rhodes, and ſome Agents for the Ætolians and Achæans. Philip had with him ſome few of his own Captaines, and Cycliadas, lately baniſhed for his ſake out of Achaia. He refuſed to come on ſhore: though fearing (as he ſaid) none but the immortall Gods: yet miſdoubting ſome treachery in the Ætolians. The demands of Titus in behalfe of the Romans, were, That he ſhould ſet all Cities of Greece at libertie, deliuer vp to the Romans and their Confederates, all priſoners which he had of theirs, and Renegadoes; likewiſe whatſoeuer he held of theirs in Illyria: and whatſoeuer about Greece or Aſia he had gotten from Ptolomie then King of Egypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded reſtitution to be made, entire of Ships, Townes, and Temples, by him taken and ſpoyled in the late warre between them. The Rhodians would haue againe the Countrie of Perea, lying ouer against their Iland, as alſo that he ſhould withdraw his Garriſons, out of diuers Townes about the Helleſpont, and other Hauens of their friends. The Achæans deſired reſtitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might not vniuſtly, quarrell with him; the other had beene long his owne by their conſent. The Ætolians took vpon them angerly, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, euen out of the whole Countrie, leauing it free; and withall to deliuer vp vnto them, whatſoeuer he held that had at any time been theirs. Neither were they herewithall content: but inſolently declaimed againſt him, for that which he had lately done in Theſſaly; corrupting (as they ſaid) the towards of the Victors, by deſtroying, when hee was vanquiſhed, thoſe Townes which elſe they might haue gotten. To anſwer theſe malapert Ætolians, Philip commanded his Gallie to be rowed neere the ſhore. But they began to plie him afreſh; telling him, that hee muſt obey his betters, vnleſſe hee were able to defend himſelfe by force of Armes. He anſwered them, (as he was much giuen to gybing with ſundry ſcoffes; and eſpecially with one, which made the Roman Conſul vnderſtand, what manner of companions theſe Ætolians were. For hee ſaid, That he had often deale with them; as likewiſe the beſt of the Greeks; deſiring them to abrogate a wicked Law, which permitted them to take ſpoyle from ſpoyle: yet could he get no better an anſwer, than that they would ſooner take Aſtolia out of Vitolia. Titus wondred what might be the meaning of this ſtrange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable cuſtome, as often as warre happened betweene their friends, to hold vp the quarrell by ſending voluntaries to ſerue on both ſides; that ſhould ſpoyle both the one and the other. As for the libertie of Greece, He ſaid it was ſtrange that the Ætolians ſhould bee ſo carefull thereof, ſince diuers Tribes of their owne, which hee then named, were indeed no Grecians: wherefore hee would faine know, whether the Romans would giue him leaue to make ſlaues of thoſe Ætolians, which were no Greeks. Titus hereat ſmiled, and was no whit offended, to heare the Aetolians well racked vp; touching whom hee began to vnderſtand, how odious they were in all the Countrie. As for that generall demand of ſetting all Greece at libertie, Philip acknowledged, that it might well beſeeme the greatneſſe of the Romans; though hee would alſo conſider, what might beſeeme his owne dignitie. But that the Aetolians, Rhodians, and other petite Eſtates, ſhould thus preſume, vnder countenance of the Romans, to take vpon them, as if by their great might hee ſhould bee thereto compelled: it was, hee ſaid, a ſtrange and ridiculous inſolence. The Achæans hee charged with much ingratitude, reciting againſt them ſome Decrees of their owne, wherein they had lo-aden both Antigonus and him, with more than humane honours. Nruthleſſe he ſaid, that he would render Argos vnto them; but, as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate with Titus himſelfe.

Thus

Thus he addressed himselfe wholly to the Roman Generall, vnto whom if he could giue satisfaction, he cared little for all the rest. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late war, (hee said) was onely defensiue; they hauing beene the offerers: or if he gaue them any occasion, it was onely in helping Prusias, his sonne-in-law; neither did he see why they should rather seeke amends at his hands, than he at theirs. For whereas they complayned, that, spoyling a Temple of Venus, he had cut downe the Groue, and pleasant walkes thereabouts: what could he doe more, than send Gardners thither with young plants; if one King of another would stand to aske such recompence? Thus he iested the matter out; but offered neuertheleſſe, in honour of the Romans, to giue back the Region of Perœa to the Rhodians; as likewise to Attalus, the Ships and Prisoners of his, whereof he had then possession. Thus ended that dayes conference, because it was late: Philip requiring a nights leisure to thinke vpon the Articles, which were many, and hee ill prouided of Counsaile, wherewith to aduise about them. For your being so ill prouided of Counsaile, said Titus, you may euen thanke your selfe; as hauing murdered all your friends, that were wont to aduise you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, vntill it was late at night; excusing his long stay by the weightinesse of the things propounded, whereon he could not suddenly tell how to resolue. But it was beleeued, that hee thereby sought to abridge the Ætolians of leisure to raile at him. And this was the more likely, for that he desired conference in priuate with the Roman Generall. The summe of his discourse, as Titus afterward related it, was, That he would giue the Achæans both Argos and Corinth; as also that he would render vnto Attalus and the Rhodians, what he had promised the day before; likewise to the Ætolians, that hee would grant some part of their demands; and to the Romans, whatsoeuer they did challenge. This when Titus his associates heard, they exclaimed against it, saying, That if the king were suffered to retaine any thing in Greece, he would shortly get possession of all which he now rendred vp. The noise that they made came to Philips eare: who thereupon desired a third day of meeting; and protested, that if he could not perswade them, he would suffer himselfe to bee perswaded by them. So the third day they met early in the morning: at what time the king intreated them all, that they would with syncere affection hearken vnto good offers of peace; and immediately conclude it, if they could like well of those Conditions, which he had already tendred; or otherwise, that they would make truce with him for the present, and let him send Embassadours to Rome, where he would referre himselfe to the courtesie of the Senate.

This was euen as Quintius would haue it: who stood in doubt, lest a new Consull might happen to defraud him of the honour, which he expected by ending of the warre. So he easily preuailed with the rest, to assent hereunto: forasmuch as it was Winter, a time vnfit for seruice in the warre; and since, without authoritie of the Senate, he should be vnable to proceed resoluedly either in warre or peace. Further hee willed them to send their seuerall Embassadours to Rome, which intimating vnto the Senate what each of them required, should easily hinder Philip, from obtaining any thing to their preiudice. Among the rest he perswaded King Amiuander, to make a iourney to Rome in person: knowing well, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of so many Embassadours, would serue to make his owne actions more glorious in the Citie. All this tended to procure, that his own Command of the Armie in Greece might be prorogued. And to the same end had he dealt with some of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already (though as yet he knew not so much) obtained it for him, partly by their authoritie, partly by good reasons which they alleaged vnto the Senate.

The Embassadour of the Greekes, when they had audience at Rome, spake bitterly against the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more desirous of victorie, than of satisfaction. They magnified the honourable purpose of the Romans, in vndertaking to set Greece at libertie. But this (they said) could neuer bee effected; vnlesse especiall care were taken, that the King should be dispossessed of Corinth, Chalcis, & Demetrias. In this point they were so vehement, producing a Map of the Country, and making demonstration how those places held all the rest in seruitude, that the Senate agreed to haue it euen so as they desired. When therfore the Embassadors of Philip were brought in, and began to haue made a long Oration; they were briefly cut of in the middest of their Preface, with this one demand: whether their Master would yeeld vp Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. Hereto they made answer, That concerning those places, the King had giuen them no direction or Commission what to say, or doe. This was enough. The Senate would no longer hearken to Philips desire of peace; wherein they said hee did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embassadours haue truely said, That neither the Aetolians, Achæans, nor any of their fellowes, had in the late Treaty required by name, that Chalcis & Demetrias should be yeelded vp. For which of them indeed could make any claime to either of these Townes? As for Corinth, whereto the Achæans had some right; (though their right were no better, than that, hauing stolne it from One Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away by bargaine vnto an Other.) Philip had already condescended to giue it backe vnto them. And this perhaps would haue beene alleaged, euen against the Greekes, in excuse of the King, by some of T. Quintius his friends; that so he might haue had the honour to conclude the warre, if a successour had beene decreed vnto him. But since he was appointed to continue Generall: neither his friends at Rome, nor he himselfe, after the returne of the Embassadours into Greece, cared to giue eare vnto any talke of peace.

Philip, seeing that his Achæans had forsaken him, and ioyned with their common Enemies; thought euen to deale with them in the like manner, by reconciling himselfe vnto Nabis, whom they hated most. There were not many yeeres past, since the Lacedæmonians vnder Cleomenes, with little other helpe than their owne strength, had beene almost strong enough both for the Macedonians & Achæans together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force consisted, in a manner, wholly in his Mercenaries: for he was a Tyrant, though stiling himselfe King. Yet he sorely vexed the Achæans: and therfore seemed to Philip one likely to stand him in great stead, if he could be wonne. To this purpose it was thought meet, that the Towne of Argos, which could not otherwise be easily defended, should be consigned ouer into his hands; in hope, that such a benefit would serue to tye him fast vnto the Macedonian. Philocles the kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deale with Nabis, added further, That it was his Masters purpose to make a streight alliance with the Lacedæmonian, by giuing some daughters of his owne in marriage vnto Nabis his sons. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made some scruple in accepting the Towne of Argos; vnlesse by decree of the Citizens themselues he might be called into it. Hereabout Philocles dealt with the Argiues: but found them so auerse, that, in open assembly of the people, they detested the very name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought hee had thereby a good occasion to robbe and fleece them. So hee willed Philocles, without more adoe, to make ouer the Towne which he was ready to receiue. Philocles accordingly did let him with his Army into it by night; and gaue him possession of the strongest places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argiues: who for very loue had forsaken the Achæans, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himselfe Master of all the Gates. A few of the principall men, vnderstanding how things went, fled out of the Citie at the first tumult. Wherefore they were all banished, and their goods confiscated. The rest of the chiefe Citizens that staied behinde, were commanded to bring foorth, out of hand, all their Gold and Siluer. Also a great imposition of money was laid vpon all those, that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were dismissed without more adoe. But if any stood long vpon the matter: or played the theeues, in purloyning their owne goods; they were put to the whip, and, besides losse of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular Lawes: namely such, as might serue to make him gracious with the rascall multitude: abrogating all debts, and diuiding the Lands of the rich among the poore. By such art of oppressing the great ones, it hath beene an old custome of Tyrants, to assure themselues of the Vulgar for a time.

As soone as Nabis had gotten Argos, He sent the newes to T. Quintius; and offered to ioyne with him against Philip. Titus was glad of it: so as he tooke the paines to crosse ouer the Streights into Peloponnesus, there to meet with Nabis. They had soone agreed (though King Attalus, who was present with the Consul, made some cauil touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent vnto the Romans fiue hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete: as also he agreed with the Achæans, vpon a Truce for foure moneths, reseruing the finall conclusion of peace betweene them vntill the Warre of Philip should be ended; which after this continued not long.

XLIII.

The battaile at Cynoscephalæ, wherein Philip was vanquished by T. Quintius.

Titus Quintius, as soone as he vnderstood that hee was appointed to haue Command of the Armie, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleasure of the Senate; made all things readie for diligent pursuite of the Warre. The like did Philip: who hauing failed in his negotiation of peace, and no lesse failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that Warre, meant afterwards wholly to relie vpon himselfe.

Titus had in his Armie about sixe and twentie thousand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the others strength, or what his Enemie intended to doe. Onely Titus heard that Philip was in Thessaly, and thereupon addressed himselfe to seeke him out. They had like to haue met vnawares, neere vnto the Citie of Phetz: where the vant-curriers on both sides discouered each other; and sent word thereof vnto their seuerall Captaines. But neither of them were ouer bastie, to commit all to hazzard vpon so short warning. The day following each of them sent out three hundred horse, with as many light armed Foot, to make a better discouerie. These met, and fought a long while: returning finally backe into their seuerall Campes, with little aduantage vnto either side. The Country about Phetz was thicke set with Trees; and otherwise full of Gardens and mud-walles, which made it vnproper for seruice of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King dislodged, intending to remoue backe into Scotussa in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully serued with all necessaries. Titus conceiued aright his meaning; and therfore purposed also to march thitherwards; not onely to waste the Country. There lay betweene them a great ledge of hills, which hindered the one from knowing what course the other tooke. Neuerthelesse they encamped not farre asunder, both the first and the second night; though neither of them vnderstood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempestuous, and forced each of them to take vp his lodging where hee found it, by chance. Then sent they fourth discouerers againe, in greater number than before. These meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at first the Macedonians had the worse. But Philip anon sent in such strong supply, that if the resistance of the Aetolians had not beene desperate, the Romans their followers had beene driuen backe into their Campe. Yet, all resistance notwithstanding, the Macedonians preuailed: so that Titus himselfe was faine to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little discouraged, by the defeat of all their Horse, to succour those which were in flight.

It was altogether besides the Kings purpose, to put the fortune of a battaile in trust that day, with so much of his Estate as might therevpon depend. But the newes came to him thicke and tumultuously, how the enemies fled, and how the day was his owne, if hee could vse occasion, the like whereof he should not often finde. This caused him to alter his purpose; insomuch as he embattailed his men, and climbed vp those hills, which, for that the knops thereon had some resemblance vnto Dogs heads, were called, by a word signifying as much, Cynoscephalæ. As soone as he was on the hil-top, it did him good to heare, that they of his owne light armature were busie in fight, almost at the very Campe of the Enemies, whom they had repelled so farre. Hee had also libertie to choose his ground, as might serue best his aduantage, forasmuch as the Romans were quite driuen from all parts of the Hill. But of this commoditie he could make no great vse: the roughnesse of the place among those Dogs heads, as they were called, seruing nothing at all for his Phalanx. Nuertheless hee found conuenient roome, wherein to marshall the one part of his Armie, and gaue order vnto his Captaines, to follow with the rest (so farre as they might). While he was doing this: Hee perceiued that his Horsemen and light armature began to shrinke, as being fiercely vpon the Romans Legions, by force whereof they were driuen to retyre. He sees forward to helpe them: and they no lesse hastily draw vnto him for succour, hauing the Romans not farre behinde them. The Legions began to climbe the Hill; Philip commanded those of his Phalanx to charge their pikes, and aduance them. Here Titus found all extreme difficult, piece of worke. For this Phalanx, being a great square battaile of armed pikes, like in all points to those which are now vsed in our moderne Warres: and being in like manner vsed, as are ours; was not to be resisted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it selfe held together vndissolued. The Macedonians were embattailed in very close order: so that two of them stood opposite to one of the Romans; as also the pikes of the first ranke, had their points aduanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no maruaile, if the Romans gaue back: euery one of them being troubled (as it were) with tenne enemies at once; and not able to come neerer to the next of them, than the length of a doozen foot or thereabout. Titus finding this, and not knowing how to remedie it; was greatly troubled: for that still the Phalanx bare downe all which came in the way. But in the meane while hee obserued, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able through the much vnevennesse of the ground, to put themselues in order: so as either they kept their places on the Hil-tops; or else (which was worse) vpon desire either of beholding the pastime, or of seeming to be partakers in the worke, ran foolishly along by the side of their fellowes, which were occupied in fight.

Of this their disorder Hee made great and present vse. Hee caused the right wing of his Battaile to march vp the hill, against these ill-ordered troupes: his Elephants leading the way, to increase the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to dispute what should be done in such a case, than well aduised what to doe; as hauing no one man appointed, to command that part in chiefe. Indeed if they should haue done their best, it could not haue serued; since the ground whereon they stood, made their weapons vnusefull. For let it be supposed, that Philip hauing sixe and twenty thousand in his Armie (as hee is said to haue beene equall to the Enemie in number) had foure thousand Horse, foure thousand Targettiers, and foure thousand light-armed: so shall there remaine foureteene thousand Pikes; whereof he himselfe had embattailed the one halfe in the Phalanx; the other halfe in the left wing, are they whom Quintius is readie now to charge. The Phalanx hauing vsually sixteene in File, must, when it consisted of seuen thousand, haue well neere foure hundred and fortie in ranke: but foure hundred would serue, to make a Front long enough; the other fortie or seuen and thirtie Files might bee cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Polybius doth, to euery man of them three foote of ground: this Front must haue occupied twelue hundred Foote, or two hundred and fortie paces; that is, very neere a quarter of a myle in length. Such a space of open Champaine, free from incumbrance of Trees, Ditches, Hillockes, or the like impediments, that must of necessitie dis-ioyne this close battayle of the Phalanx, was not euery where to bee found. Here at Cynoscephalæ Philip had so much roome, as would only suffice for the one halfe of his men; the rest were faine to stand still and looke about them, being hindered from putting themselues in order, by the roughnesse of the Dogges heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindered from comming vp vnto them; not found any difficulty in mastring those enemies, whose feete were in a manner bound by the discommodity of the place. The very first impression of the Elephants, caused them to giue backe; and the comming on of the Legions, to betake themselues to flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonell, seeing the victory on that part assured, left the prosequution of it vnto others: and being followed by twenty Ensignes or Manples, that is, (as they might fall out) by some two thousand men, tooke in hand a notable piece of worke; and mainely helpfull to making of the victory compleate. He considered that Philip, in pursuing the right wing of the Romans, was runne on so farre as that himselfe with his fellowes, in mounting the hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten aboue the Kings head. Wherefore hee turned to the left hand: and making downe the hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell vpon it in the Rere. The hindermost ranks of the Phalanx, all of them indeed saue the first fiue, were accustomed, when the battells came to ioyning, to carry their pikes vpright; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thrust on their fore-men: and so were they doing at the present. This was another great inconuenience in the Macedonian Phalanx. That it serued neither for offence nor defence, except onely in front. For though it were so, that Alexander, when hee was to fight with Darius in Mesopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in such order, that all the foure sides of it were in so many fronts looking sundrie wayes, wayes, because he expected that he should be encompassed round: yet is it to be vnderstood, that herein he altered the vsuall forme; as also at the same time hee embattailed his men in loose order, that so with ease they might turne their weapons, which way need should require. Likewise it is to be considered, That Alexanders men being thus disposed, were fit onely to keepe their owne ground; not being able to follow vpon the Enemy, vnlesse their hindmost rankes could haue marched backwards. But in this present case of Philip, there was no such prouision for resistance. Therefore his men, being otherwise vnable to helpe themselues, threw downe their weapons, and fled. The king himselfe had thought vntill now, that the fortune of the battaile was euery where alike, and the day his owne. But hearing the noyse behind him, and turning a little aside with a troupe of Horse, to see how all went; when hee beheld his men casting downe their weapons, and the Romans at his backe on the higher ground; He presently betook himselfe to flight. Neither staid he afterwards in any place (except only a small while about Tempe, there to collect such as were dispersed in this ouerthrow) vntill he was gotten into his owne Kingdome of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Armie in this battaile, about seuen hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thousand were slaine; and fiue thousand taken prisoners.

§. XV.

T. Quintius falleth out with the Ætolians, and grants truce vnto Philip, with conditions, vpon which the peace is ratified, Liberty proclaimed vnto the Greekes. The Romans quarrell with Antiochus.

THe Aetolians wonderfully vaunted themselues; and desired to haue it noysed through all Greece, that the victory at Cynoscephalæ was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeed the most of the bootie; by sacking the Macedonian Campe, whilest the Romans were busied in the chase. Titus therefore being offended both at their vain-glory, and at their rauenous condition; purposed to teach them better manners, by regarding them as slightly, as they thought highly of themselues. He also well perceiued, That by vsing them with any extraordinary fauour, he should greatly offend the rest of his Confederates in Greece; who detested the Aetolians much more vehemently, than euer they had done the Macedonians. But this displeasure brake not forth yet a while.

After the battaile Titus made hast vnto Larissa, a citie of Thessalie: which he presently tooke. Before his comming, Philip had sent thither one of his Courtiers to burne all his letters, and passages whatsoeuer in writing, betwixt him and others: of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much aduersitie, he forgot not to prouide for the safety of his friends. Yet by his thus doing, they of Larissa might well perceiue, that he gaue them as already lost. Wherefore we finde not that they, or any of their Neighbors, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the same time, the town of Leucas bordering vpon Acarnania, was taken by the Roman Fleet: and very soone after, all the Acarnanians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Aetolians euer true to Philip, gaue vp themselues vnto the Romans, hearing of the victory at Cynoscephalæ. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the conquest of Perea, a Region of the Continent ouer against the Iland; whereof they had demanded restitution, in the late Treaty of Peace. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greeks: forasmuch as they awaited not the good leisure of the Romans; but with an Army of their own, & some helpe which they borrowed of the Achæans & other their friends gaue battell to Dinocrates the kings Lieutenant, wherein they had the victory, & consequently recouered the whole Prouince. It angred Philip worse than all this, that the Dardanians gathered courage out of his affliction, to inuade his kingdome, wasting and spoyling as if all had been abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Armie in all hast of fiue thousand foot and fiue hundred horse: wherewith comming vpon them, he draue them, with little or no losse of his owne, and great slaughter of theirs, hastily out of the kingdome. Which done, He returned to Thessalonica.

In this one enterprise He had successe answerable to his desire: but feeling what bad fortune accompanied his affaires, in all other parts at the same time, he thought it wisedome to yeeld vnto necessity; and therefore sent in all haste Limnæus and Demosthenes, with with Cydonia he banished Adiran, in whom he reposed much confidence, and sent Ambassadors vnto Titus. These had conference a long while in priuate, with Titus and some of his Romane Colonels, by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wise dismissed. It seemes that they had Commission, to referre all vnto his owne discretion, as Philip himselfe in few daies after did. There was granted vnto him a truce for fifteene dayes, in which time, the king himselfe might come and speake with the Romane Generall. In the mean season many suspicious rumours went of Titus, as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the king, to betray the Greekes his Confederats. Of these bruits the Ætolians were chiefe authours, who being wont to regard neither friendship nor honestie, where profite led them a wrong way, iudged alike of all men else. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had sent letters vnto his Associates, willing them to haue their Agents readie by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the Treaty should bee held. There when they were all assembled, they entred into consultation before the kings arriuall, what should be most expedient for the common benefit of them all, & for euery state in particular. The yong king Amynander besought them all, & especially the Romans, that they would thinke vpon him, and considering his weakenesse which he confessed, make such prouision, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreake his anger vpon him who was not able to resist. Then spake Alexander one of the Ætolians: who commending Titus forsomuch as he had thus assembled the Confederates to aduise vpon their own good, and had willed them to deliuer their minds freely, added, That in the name of the purpose which he had in hand, he was vtterly preciued: for that by making peace with Philip, hee could neither assure the Romans of their quiet, nor haue recks of his bribery. There was (he said) none other end to be hoped of the warre, which could agree either with the purpose of the Senate & people of Rome, or with their promises made by Titus himselfe vnto the Greekes, than the chasing of Philip quite out of his kingdome. And to this effect he made a long discourse. But Titus answered, That this Ætolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleasure of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the laudable customes which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to seeke the vtter destruction of any king or Nation, at such time as they first made warre with them, vntill by some rebellion they found it a matter of necessity, to take such a rigorous course. And hereof he alledged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That victory, to generous minds, was onely an inducement to moderation. As concerning the publike benefit of Greece, it was (he said) expedient, that the kingdome of Macedon should be greatly weakened and brought low, not that it should be vtterly destroyed: for a much greater euill was feared as a like, to the Thracians, Gaules, and a multitude of other sauage Nations, which would ouer-flow the whole continent of Greece, if this kingdome were not interposed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yeeld vnto those demands, to which he had before proffered himself in the former Treaty, there was no reason to denie him peace. As for the Ætolians, if they thought otherwise, it should be at their owne pleasure, to take counsell apart for the rest as they thought good. Then began Phæneas, another of the Aetolians, to say, that all was come to nothing, for that euen long, Philip would trouble all the Greeks, and effect that he had done in Illyria before. But Titus interrupted him, & bad him leaue his babbling, saying, That himselfe would take such order, as that Philip were he neuer so desirous, should thence forth haue it in his power to molest the Greekes, no more than he had done before the warre. [illegible] the good leisure of the Romans, they awaited not the good leisure of the Greekes.

The next day King Philip came thither, whom Titus vsed friendly: and suffering him to repose himself that night, held Counsell the day following; wherein the King yeelded to all that had been required at his hands, offering yet further to stand to the good pleasure of the state, if they would haue more added to the Conditions. Phæneas the Aetolian, insulting ouer him, said it was to bee hoped, that he would then at length giue vp to the Aetolians, a hundy of cowhes, which he there named for scorne, as if he had spoke to some beggar. But he answered him in the like sort, that they might take them all. But Titus interposing himself, said, That it should bee otherwise. These were Thessalian townes, and should be all free made of them, only excepted, which not long agoe had refused to commit themselues to the faith of the Romans, & therefore should now be giuen to the Aetolians. Hereat Philip [illegible] that it was too great an iniury, that he should be defrauded of the Townes that had sometime belonged vnto their Common-weale. Rather he willed Titus to consider, that by an ancient Couenant betweene them and the Romans, all the Townes taken ought to be their owne, and the Romans to haue nothing saue the pillage and captiues. It is true, that there had beene such a condition in the former warre: but it ceased to be of any validitie, as soone as the Ætolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gaue them to vnderstand; asking them whether they thought it reasonable, that all the towns in Greece, which had let in the Romans by composition, should be deliuered into subiection of the Ætolians. The rest of the Confederates were very much delighted, with these angry passages between the Roman and the Ætolians: neither had they great reason to feare any hard measure; since Titus was so earnest in behalf of those Thessalians, to giue them liberty, though they had stood out against him, euen till very feare made them open their gates. Wherefore they opposed not themselues; but gaue their consent willingly vnto a Truce for foure Moneths.

The chiefe cause that mooued Titus to grant peace so readily to the Macedonian, besides that laudable custome by him before alleaged; was, the fame of Antiochus his comming with an Armie from Syria, and drawing neere toward Europe. Hee had also perhaps yet a greater motiue; euen the consideration that his successor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the warre should happen to be protracted. And he was in the right. For when his letters, together with Embassadors from the Macedonian, and sundry States of Greece, came vnto Rome, new Consuls were chosen: who, (especially the one of them) stood very earnestly against the peace; alleaging friuolous matter of their owne suspition, in hope to get the honour of concluding the warre. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, betweene the Embassadours of Philip, offring to stand to whatsoeuer was demanded, and the letters of Titus pressing them to accept this offer, on the one side, and the importunitie of the Consul on the other; who said, that all these goodly shewes were fraudulent, and that the king would rebell, as soone as the Armie was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Assembly of the People; by whose soueraigne authority it was concluded, that Peace should be granted vnto the king. So tenne Embassadors were sent from Rome ouer into Greece: in which number were they, that had beene Consuls before Titus; and it was ordained by their aduice, that Titus should goe through with the businesse of Peace. These would very faine haue retained those three important Cities, of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, vntill the state of Greece were somewhat better setled. But finally Titus preuailed so, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendred vnto the Achæans; and all the other Greek townes which Philip held, as well in Asia as in Greece, restored vnto libertie.

The Conditions of the Peace granted vnto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next* Isthmian Games, He should withdraw his garrisons out of all the Greeke townes which he held, and consigne them ouer to the Romans: That he should deliuer vp vnto them all Captiues that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's: Likewise all his shippes of warre, reseruing to himselfe onely fiue of the lesser sort, and one of extraordinary greatnesse, wherein sixteene men laboured at euery oare: Further, that he should pay a thousand talents, the one halfe in hand, the other in ten yeeres following, by euen portions. Hereto * Liuie addes, That he was forbidden to make warre out of Macedon, without permission of the Senate. But I finde not that he obserued this Article, or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Fourehundred talents he had already deliuerd to Titus, together with his yonger son Demetrius, to remaine as hostage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, at such time as he lately sent his Embassadors to Rome: when it was promised, that the money, and his sonne, should be restored backe vnto him, if the Senate were not pleased with the agreement. Whether this money were reckoned as part of the thousand talents, I cannot finde: and it seemeth otherwise, forasmuch as yong Demetrius, who, together with those foure hundred talents, was giuen for hostage, remained still in custody of the Romans, as a part of the bargaine which Titus formerly had made. Letters also were then sent by Titus vnto Prusias king of Bythinia: giuing him to vnderstand what agreement was made with Philip in behalfe of the Greeks; and how the Senate held it reasonable, that the Cians, most miserably spoyled and oppressed by Philip, to gratifie this Bithynian his son-in-law, should be restored to liberty, & permitted to enioy the same benefit of the Romans, which other of their nation did. What effect these letters wrought, it was not greatly materiall; since the Romans were shortly busied with Antiochus, in such wise that they had not leisure to examine the conformity of Prusias to their will.

All Greece reioyced at the good bargain which Titus had made with Philip. Only the Aetolians found themselues agreeued that they were vtterly neglected; which was to the rest no small part of their contentment. The Bœotians continued to fauour the Macedonian; and thereby occasioned much trouble vnto themselues. There were some among them well-affected to the Romans: who seeing how things were like to goe, made their complaint vnto Titus; saying, that they were no better than lost, for the good will which they had borne vnto him; vnlesse at this time, when he lay close by them with his Armie, their Prætor, which was head of the opposite Faction, might be made away. Titus refused to haue a hand in the execution, yet neuertheless did animate them in their purpose. So they committed the fact, and hoped to haue kept themselues vndiscouered. But when the murder came out, and somewhat was confessed by those which were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently against the Romans; in such wise, that howsoeuer they durst not take Armes against them, yet such of them as they found straggling from their Campe, they murdered in all parts of the Country. This was detected within a while, and many of the dead bodies found. Hereupon Titus requires of the Bœotians, to haue the murderers deliuered into his hands; and for fiue hundred souldiers, which he had lost by them, to haue paid vnto him fiue hundred Talents. Instead of making any such amends, they paid him with excuses; which hee would not take as good satisfaction. He sends Embassadours to the Achæans and Athenians, informing them what had hapned: and requested them not to take it amisse, though he dealt with these their friends as they had deserued. Herewithall he falls to wasting their Country; and besiegeth two such townes of theirs, as did seeme to be most culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embassadors of the Achæans and Athenians, (especially of the Achæans, who offered, if he needed them, to helpe him in this warre; yet besought him rather to grant peace vnto the Bœotians) preuailed so far with him; that he was pacified with thirty Talents, and the punishment of such as were knowne offenders.

In like sort, though not so violently, were many States of Greece distracted: some among them reioycing that they were free from the Macedonian, others greatly doubting that the Roman would proue a worse neighbour. The Aetolian would haue been glad of any Commotion; and therefore published rumours abroad, That it was the purpose of the Romans, to keepe in their owne hands all those places, wherein Philip lately had his Garrisons. Little did they, or the rest of the Greekes, conceiue, that this Macedonian Warre serued as an introduction to the Warre to bee made in Asia against King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to bee reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to stay the progresse of bad rumours, when the Isthmian games were held, which in time of peace were neuer without great solemnity and concourse: Titus in that great assembly of all Greece, caused proclamation to be made by sound of Trumpet to this effect, That the Senate and people of Rome, & Titus Quintius Flaminius the General, hauing vanquished king Philip and the Macedonians, did will to be at libertie, free from Impositions, free from Garrisons, and liuing at their own Lawes, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Eubœans, Achæans of Phthiotis, Magnetians, Thessalians, & Perrhæbians. The suddennesse of this Proclamation astonished men: so as though they applauded it with a great shout; yet presently they cried out to heare it againe, as if they durst scarce credit their owne eares. The Greekes were Crafts-masters in the Art of giuing thankes; which they rendred now to T. Quintius with so great affection, as that they had well-neer smothered him, by thronging officiously about him.

This good will of the Greeks, was like to be much more auaileable vnto the Romans in their warre against Antiochus, than could haue beene the possession of a few Townes, yea or of all those Prouinces which were named in the Proclamation. Vpon confidence hereof, no sooner were the Isthmian games at an end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councell, gaue audience to Hegesianax and Lysias, king Antiochus his Embassadours: whom they willed to signifie vnto their Lord, That he should doe well to abstaine from the free Cities in Asia, and not vexe them with warre: as also to restore whatsoeuer he had occupied, belonging to the kings, Ptolomie or Philip. Moreouer they willed him by these his Embassadors, that he should not passe ouer his Army into Europe;

addition, That some body should visit him in person ere it were long, to take with him further order in the points. This done, they fell to accomplishing their promises vnto the Greeks, to the rest they gaue what they had promised. But the Phocians and Locrians they gaue vnto the Etolians, whom they thought it no wisedome to offend or vermish, being shortly to take a greater worke in hand. The Achæans of Phthiotis they annexed vnto the Thessalians, all saue the town of Thebes in Phthiotis, the same which had beene abandoned by T. Quintius to the Etolians in the last Treaty with Philip. The Etolians contended very earnestly about Pharsalus and Leucas. But they were put off with a dilatory answer, and reiected vnto the Senate: for howsoeuer somewhat the Councell might fauour them, yet was it not meet that they should haue their will, as it were in despight of Titus. So the Achæans were restored Corinth, Triphylia, and Heræa. So the Corinthians were made free indeed (though the Romans yet a while kept the Acrocorinthus) for that all which were partakers of the Achæan Common-wealth, enioyed their liberty in as absolute manner, as they could desire. To Pleuratus the Illyrian were giuen one or two places taken by the Romans from Philip: and vpon Nabis were bestowed those Castles, which he had gotten from Philip during his warre, to reigne in them & the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Lacedæmonians. The Rhodians had beene their owne Caruers. Attalus was dead a little before the victory, and therefore lost his share. Yet many that were with Titus in Councell, would haue giuen the Townes of Oreum and Eretria, in the Ile of Eubœa, to his sonne and successour king Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that these as well as the rest of the Eubœans, should be suffered to enioy their liberties. Orestis, a little Prouince of the kingdome of Macedon bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, had yeelded vnto the Romans long ere this, and since continued true to them: for which cause it was also set at liberty, and made a free estate by it selfe.

These businesses being dispatcht, it remained, that all care should be vsed, not how to auoid the warre with King Antiochus, but how to accomplish it with most ease and prosperity. Wherefore Embassadors were sent both to Antiochus himselfe, to picke matter of quarrel, and about vnto others, to præ-dispose them vnto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of Warre against this king the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadors and Agents dealt and sped abroad; I referre vnto another place.

CHAP. V.

What Kings of the races of Seleucus and Ptolomie, reigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochus the Great.

Seleucus Nicator, the first of his race, king of Asia and Syria, dyed in the end of the hundred twenty and fourth Olympiad. He was treacherously slaine by Ptolomie Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos, hauing (as is said) beene warned before by an Oracle, to beware of Argos, as the fatall place of his death. But I neuer haue read that any mans life hath beene preserued, or any mischance auoyded, by the predictions of such Diuellish Oracles.

Rather I beleeue, That many such predictions of the Heathen Gods, haue been ante-dated by their Priests or by others, which deuised them after the event of the thing.

Antiochus Soter, the sonne and heire of this Seleucus, was dearely beloued of his Father, who surrendred vnto him his owne wife Stratonice, when hee vnderstood how much the young Prince was inamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolomy Ceraunus had great cause to feare, that the death of Seleucus would not be vnreuenged by this his Successor.

But

But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts, or perhaps only with faire words, containing himselfe within Asia, and letting Ceraunus enioy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe with the bloud of Seleucus. It is said of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queene Stratonica in his Fathers life; yet out of modesty he forbore to imbrace her, till his Father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous loue was partly, if not chiefly, the cause of his not prosecuting that reuenge; whereunto Nature should haue vrged him. Afterwards hee had warres with Antigonus Gonatas, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia. Also Lutarius and Leonorius, Kings or Captaines of the Gaules, were set vpon him by the same Nicomedes. With these hee fought a great battaile; wherein though otherwise the Enemies had all aduantage against him, yet by the terrour of his Elephants, which affrighted both their Horses and them, he won the Victory. He tooke in hand an enterprise against Ptolomie Philadelphus: but finding ill successe in the beginning, he soon gaue it ouer. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berosus the Chaldæan dedicated his Historie of Assyria; the same, which hath since been excellently falsified by the Frier Annius. Hee left behinde him one sonne, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married vnto the king of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twentie and ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth yeer of the kingdome of the Greekes, when he had reigned nineteene yeeres.

Genebrard l. 2. Iust. Martin Paran.

Antiochus, surnamed Theos, or the god, had this vaine and impious title giuen to him by flattery of the Milesians; whom he deliuered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. Hee held long and difficult, but fruitlesse, warre with Ptolomie Philadelphus King of Egypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Berenice the daughter of Ptolomie.

Of these two Kings, and of this Lady Berenice, S. Hierome and other Interpreters haue vnderstood that Prophecie of Daniel: The Kings daughter of the South, shall come to the king of the North, to make an agreement; and that which followeth.

Ptolomie Philadelphus was a great louer of Peace and Learning; and (setting apart his incestuous marriage with his owne sister Arsinoe) a very excellent Prince: howsoeuer, the worthiest of all that race. It was He, that built and furnished with Bookes, that famous Librarie in Alexandria; which to adorne, and to honour the more, He sent vnto Eleazar then high Priest of the Iewes, for the Bookes of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King vnto the Iewes, had formerly beene very great: for he had set at libertie as many of them, as his Father held in slauery throughout all Egypt; and hee had sent vnto the * Temple of God in Ierusalem very rich Presents. Wherefore Eleazar yeelding to the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew coppie: which Ptolomie caused to be translated into Greek, by seuenty two of the most graue & learned persons that could be found among all the Tribes. In this number of the 72. Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seuentie, Iesus the sonne of Syrach, is thought by Genebrard to haue beene one: who that he liued in this Age, it seemes to me very sufficiently proued by Iansenius, in his Preface vnto Ecclesiasticus. The whole passage of this businesse between Philadelphus and the High Priest, was written (as [h] Iosephus affirmes) by Aristæus that was employed therein. Fortie yeeres Ptolomie Philadelphus was king; reckoning the time wherein he ioyntly reigned with his Father. He was exceedingly beloued of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his end he grew more voluptuous, than he had beene in his former yeers: in which time he boasted, that he alone had found out the way how to liue for euer. If this had bin referred vnto his honourable deeds, it might haue stood with reason: otherwise, the Gowt, with which he was often troubled, was enough to teach him his owne errour. Hee was the first of the Kings, deriued from Alexanders Successors, that entred into League with the Romans: as also of his Off-spring was the last among those Royall Families, which by them was rooted vp.

Concerning that Booke which now goes vnder the name of Aristæus; many learned men, & among the rest Lodouicus Viues, hold suspition that it is counterfeit, and the inuention of some late Author. Surely if it were to be suspected in the time of Viues; it may be now much more iustly suspected: since a new Edition of it is come foorth, purged from faults (as the Papists terme those bookes, wherein they haue changed what they please) and set foorth by Middendorpius at Colen. An. Dom. 1578.

Antiochus Theos had another wife, called Laodice, at such time as he married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptolomie. After his second marriage, he vsed his first wife with no better regard, than if she had beene his Concubine. Laodice dared him for this: yet aduentured not to seeke reuenge, vntill her owne sonne Seleucus Callinicus was of ability to be king. This was two or three yeeres after the death of Ptolomie Philadelphus: at what time she poysoned her husband Theos; and by permission of Seleucus her son, murdered

...with a fauour that she had borne to ... reports, that ... loued her self together with the young Prince her childe, whilest the Sanctuary at Daphne: and that onely Syria, Cilicia, & Asia prepared to succour her by their bro... Ptolomie Euergetes, king of Egypt, came to rescue her with an Armie, though too late, for she was slaine before. With such cruelties Seleucus Callinicus succeeding vnto his Father, that had fifteene yeeres been king, began his reigne. His subiects were highly offended at his wicked nature, which they discouered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Estate would haue beene much endangered, if Ptolomie Euergetes, who came against him, had not beene drawne backe into his owne Countrie, by some Commotions there in hand. For they were more than ready to beare armes against Ptolomie, in defence of their owne king: but rather they sided with the Egyptian, who tooke Laodice the kings mother, and rewarded her with death as she had well deserued. Wherefore Seleucus being freed from this inuasion by occasion of those domestical troubles which recalled Euergetes into Egypt, went about a dangerous peece of worke, euen to make warre vpon his owne subiects, because of their bad affection towards him, when as he had him selfe better taught, by well deseruing to haue changed their hatred into loue. A great Fleet he prepared in furnishing and manning whereof he was at such charges, that he scarce left himselfe any other hope, if that should miscarrie. Herein he embarked himselfe, and putting to Sea, did meete with such a tempest, as ouerwhelmed all saue himselfe and a very few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamity, hauing left him nothing else in a manner than his naked body, turned nere hand to his great good, as soone after it seemed. For when his Subiects vnderstood in what sort the gods (as they conceiued) had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his Estate, and, presuming that hee would thenceforth become a new man, offered vnto him their seruice with great alacritie. This reuiued him, and filled him with such spirit, as thinking himselfe well enough able to deale with the Egyptian, he made ready a mighty Armie for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land than it had beene at Sea. Hee was vanquished by Ptolomie in a great battaile: whence hee escaped hardly; no better attended, than after his late shipwracke. Hasting therefore backe to Antioch, and fearing that the enemie would soone be at his heeles; He wrote vnto his brother Antiochus Hierax, who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed, and promising, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Asia. Antiochus was then but fourteene yeeres old, but extreamely ambitious; and therefore glad of such an occasion to make himselfe great. Hee leuied a mighty Armie of the Gaules; wherewith he set forward to helpe his brother, or rather to get what he could for himselfe. Hereof Ptolemie being aduertised: and hauing no deffie to put himselfe in danger more than he needed, tooke Truce with Seleucus for tenne yeeres. No sooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Egyptian war, but his brother Antiochus came vpon him, and needs would fight with him, as knowing himselfe to haue the better Armie. So Seleucus was vanquished againe, and saued himselfe, with few about him, that he was verily supposed to haue perished in the battaile. Thus did Gods iustice take reuenge of those murders by which the Crowne was purchased; and heeled (as might haue beene thought) on the head of this bloody King. Antiochus was very glad to heare of his brothers death, as if thereby hee had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gaules his Mercenaries, were gladder than He. For when hee led them against Eumenes King of Pergamus, being in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reigne, those perfidious Barbarians tooke counsaile against him, and deuised how to strippe him of all that hee had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of the Royall house to make head against them, it would be in their power, to doe what should be best pleasing to themselues. In the lower Asia. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus, and enforced him to ransome himselfe with money, as if he had beene their lawfull Prisoner. Neither were they so contented; but made him enter into such Composition with them, as turned but little to his honour. In the meane while Seleucus had gathered a new Armie, and prepared once more to trie his fortune against his brother. Eumenes hearing of this, thought the season fit for himselfe, to make his profit of their discord; Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten: which is no great marueile, since he had great reason to stand in no lesse feare of the Gaules his own Souldiers, than of the enemy with whom he had to deale. After this, Seleucus wonne much in Asia, whilest Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battell, fought betweene the brethren, Seleucus had the vpper hand: and Antiochus Hierax or the Hawke, (which surname was giuen him, because he sought his prey, and euery one, without care whether he were prouoked or not) soared away as farre as hee could, both from his brother, and from his owne Gaules. Hauing fetcht a great compasse through Mesopotamia and Armenia, he fell at length in Cappadocia, where his father in law King Ariarathes tooke him vp. He was entertained very louingly in outward shew, but with a meaning to betray him. This he soone perceiued: and therefore betooke him to his wings againe, though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length he resolued to bestow himselfe vpon Ptolomie, his owne conscience telling him, what euill he had meant vnto Seleucus his brother; and therefore what like good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. In Infidelitie can finde no sure harbour. Ptolomie well vnderstood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hawke. Wherefore he layd him vp in close prison: whence though by meanes of an harlot, he got out; yet flying from his keepers, hee fell into the hands of theeues, by whom he was murthered. Neere about the same time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against him, during his wars with his brother. He therefore made a iourney against Arsaces founder of the Parthian kingdome: wherein his euill fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered so closely to him, that he was taken prisoner. Arsaces deale friendly with him, and dismissed him, hauing euery way giuen him royall entertainment: but in returning home, he bracke his necke by a fall from his horse, and so ended his vnhappy reigne of twenty yeeres. He had to wife Laodice the sister of Andromachus, one of his most trusty Captaines: which was father vnto that Achæus, who making his aduantage of this affinitie, became shortly after (as he stiled himselfe) a king, though rather indeede, a great troubler of the world in those parts. By Laodice he had two sonnes; Seleucus the third, surnamed Ceraunus, and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Ceraunus reigned onely three yeeres, in which time he made warre vpon Attalus the first, that was King of Pergamus. Being weake of body through sicknesse, and in want of money, He could not keepe his men of warre in good order: and finally hee was slaine by treason of Nicanor and Apaturius a Gaule. His death was reuenged by Achæus, who slue the Traitours, and tooke charge of the Armie: which he ruled very wisely, and faithfully a while; Antiochus, the brother of Seleucus, being then a Childe.

§. II.

The beginning of the Great Antiochus his reigne. Of Ptolemy Euergetes, and Philopator Kings of Egypt. Warre betweene Antiochus and Philopator. The rebellion of Molo in expedition of Antiochus against him. The vncontinuance of Antiochus his Egyptian warre: with the passages betweene the two Kings: the victory of Ptolemie, and Peace concluded. Of Achæus, and his rebellion; his greatnesse, and his fall. Antiochus his expedition against the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the Kings reigning in India, after the death of the Great Alexander.

Antiochus was scarcely fifteene yeeres old, when hee began his reigne, which lasted fiue and thirty yeeres. In his Minoritie, He was wholly gouerned by one Hermias, an ambitious man, and one which maligned all vertue, that he found in any of the Kings faithfull seruants. This vilde qualitie in a Counsailour of such great place, how harmefull it was vnto his Lord, and finally vnto himselfe, the successe of things will shortly discouer.

Soone after the beginning of Antiochus his reigne, Ptolomie Euergetes King of Egypt died, and left his heire Ptolomie Philopator, a young boy likewise, as hath else-where been remembred. This was that Euergetes, who relieued Aratus and the Achæans: who afterwards tooke part with Cleomenes, and louingly entertained him, when hee was chased out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatas. He annexed vnto his Dominion the Kingdome of Cyrene, by taking to wife Berenice, the daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolemies; and the last good King of the race. The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was giuen to him by the Egyptians; not so much for the great spoyles which he brought home, after his victories in Syria, as for that he accounted some of those those Images or Idols, which Cambyses, when he conquered Egypt, had caried into Persia. He was ready to haue made warre vpon the Iewes, for that Onias their high Priest, out of meere couetousnesse of money refused to pay vnto him his yeerly tribute of 20 talents: but he was pacified by the wisdome of Iosephus a Iew, to whom afterwards he let in farme the Tributes and Customes that belonged vnto him, in those parts of Syria which he held. For Cœlesyria, with Palestina and all those parts of the Countrey that lay neerest vnto Egypt, were held by the Egyptian; either as hauing falne to the share of Ptolemie the first, at such time as the great Antigonus was vanquished and slaine in the battell at Ipsus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the troublesome and vnhappy reigne of Seleucus Callinicus. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that lasted for many succeeding ages betweene the Ptolemies and the Seleucida, were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecie before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. This Ptolemie Euergetes reigned sixe and twenty yeeres; and dyed towards the end of the hundred thirty and ninth Olympiad. It may seeme by that which we finde in the Prologue vnto Iesus the sonne of Sirach his booke, that he should haue reigned a much longer time. For Siracides there saith that he came into Egypt in the eight and thirtieth yeere, when Euergetes was king. It may therefore be, That either this king reigned long together with his father: or that those eight and thirty yeeres, were the yeeres of Iesus his owne age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Iewes did other whiles reckon) from some notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes, Hermias the Counsailer, and in a manner the Protectour of King Antiochus, incited his Lord vnto warre against the Egyptian; for the recouerie of Cœlesyria and the Countries adioyning. This counsaile was very vnseasonably giuen, when Molo, the kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out into rebellion, and sought to make himselfe absolute Lord of that rich Countrey. Neuertheless Hermias, being more froward than wise, maintained stiffely, that it was most expedient, and agreeable with the kings honour, to send forth against a rebellious Captaine, other Captaines that were faithfull; whilst He in person made warre vpon one, that was like himselfe, a king. No man durst gaine-say the resolution of Hermias; who therefore sent Xenætas an Achæan, with such forces as he thought expedient, against the Rebell; whilst in the meane season an Armie was preparing for the kings expedition into Cœlesyria. The king hauing marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and so ouer the Deserts into the Vallie of Massyas, betweene the Mountaines of Libanus and Anti-libanus, found his way there stopped by Theodotus an Ætolian, that serued vnder Ptolemie. So he consumed the time there a while to none effect: and then came newes, that Xenætas, his Captain, was destroyed with his whole Armie; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Countrey, as farre as vnto Babylon.

Xenætas, whileſt he was yet on his iourney, and drew neere to the Riuer of Tygris; receiued many aduertisements by such as fled ouer vnto him from the Enemie, That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wils, drawne by their Commander to beare armes against their king. This report was not altogether false; but Molo himselfe stood in some doubt lest his followers would leaue him in time of necessity. Xenætas therefore making shew, as if he had prepared to passe the Riuer by Boats in face of his Enemie; left in the night time such as he thought meete to defend his Campe; and with all the floure of his Armie went ouer Tygris, in a place tenne miles lower than Molo his Campe. Molo heard of this, and sent forth his horse to giue impediment: but hearing that Xenætas could not so be stopped, Hee himselfe dislodged, and tooke his iourney towards Media; leauing all his baggage behinde him in his Campe. Whether he did this, as distrusting the faith of his owne souldiers: or whether thereby to deceiue his enemie; the great follie of Xenætas made his stratagem prosperous. For Xenætas, hauing borne himselfe proudly before, vpon the countenance of Hermias, by whom he was aduanced vnto this charge; did now presume, that all should giue way to his authority, without putting him to much trouble of vsing the sword. Wherefore he suffered his men to feast, with the prouisions which they found ready in the forsaken Campe: or rather he commanded them so to doe, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish vp themselues against the iourny, which he intended to take next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the same purpose he hasted himselfe, in transporting the remainder of his Armie, which hee had left on the other side of Tygris. But Molo went no further that day, than he could eaſily returne the ſame night. Wherefore vnderſtanding what good rule the Kings men kept: he made ſuch haſte backe vnto them, that he came vpon them early in the morning; whileſt they were yet heauy with the wine and other good cheere, that they had ſpent at ſupper. So Xenetas and a very few with him, died fighting in defence of the Campe: the reſt were ſlaughtered, without making reſiſtance; and many of them, ere they were perfectly awake. Likewiſe the Campe on the other ſide of Tygris, was eaſily taken by Molo: the Captaines flying thence, to ſaue their owne liues. In the heat of this victorie, the Rebell marched vnto Seleucia, which he preſently tooke: and, maſtering within a little while the Prouince of Babylonia, and all the Countrie downe to the Red-Sea, or Bay of Perſia, Hee haſted vnto Suſa; where at his firſt comming, he won the City: but failing to take the Caſtle that was exceeding ſtrong, returned backe to Seleucia, there to giue order concerning this buſineſſe.

The report of theſe things comming to Antiochus, whileſt he lay (as is ſaid before) in the Vale of Marſyas; filled him with great ſorrow, and his Campe with trouble. He tooke counſaile what to doe in this needfull caſe; and was well aduiſed by Epigenes the beſt man of warre he had about him, to let alone this enterpriſe of Cœloſyria; and bend his forces thither, where more need required them. This counſaile was put in execution with all conuenient haſte. Yet was Epigenes diſmiſſed by the way, and ſoone after ſlaine, by the practice of Hermias; who could not endure to heare good counſaile giuen, contrary to his owne good liking and allowance. In the iourney againſt Molo, the name and preſence of the King was more auaileable, than any oddes which he had of the Rebell in ſtrength. Molo diſtruſted his owne followers: and thought, that neither his late good ſucceſſe, nor any other conſideration, would ſerue to hold them from returning to the kings obedience; if once they beheld his perſon. Wherefore he thought it ſafeſt for him to aſſaile the Kings Campe in the night time. But going in hand with this, Hee was diſcouered by ſome that fled ouer from him to the King. This cauſed him to returne backe to his Campe: which, by ſome error, tooke alarme at his returne; and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in ſight. The King was thus forward in giuing battaile to Molo, vpon confidence which he had that many would reuolt vnto him. Neither was he deceiued in this his beliefe. For not a few men, or Enſignes: but all the left wing of the enemie, which was oppoſite vnto the King, changed ſide forthwith as ſoone as euer they had ſight of the kings perſon; and were ready to doe him ſeruice againſt Molo. This was enough to haue wonne the Victorie: but Molo ſhortned the worke, by killing himſelfe; as did alſo diuers of his friends, who for feare of torments preuented the Hang-man with their owne ſwords.

After this Victorie came ioyfull newes, that the Queene Laodice, daughter of Mithridates king of Pontus, which was married vnto Antiochus a while before, had brought foorth a ſonne. Fortune ſeemed bountifull vnto the King: and therfore he purpoſed to make what vſe he could, of her friendly diſpoſition while it laſted: Being now in the Eaſterne parts of his kingdome, He iudged it conuenient to viſit his Frontiers, were it only to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered vpon him. Hereunto his Counſailer Hermias gaue aſſent: not ſo much reſpecting the Kings honour, as conſidering what good might thereby happen to himſelfe. For if it ſhould come to paſſe, that the King were taken out of the world by any caſualtie: then made he no doubt of becomming Protector to the yong Prince; and thereby of lengthening his owne Gouernement. Antiochus therefore went againſt Artabazanes, who reigned among the Atropatians; hauing the greateſt part of his kingdome, ſituate betweene the Caſpian & Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very old and feareful; and therefore yeelded vnto whatſoeuer conditions it pleaſed Antiochus to lay vpon him. So in this iourney Antiochus got honour, ſuch as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Vpon the way, a Phyſician of his brake with him as concerning Hermias, informing him truely how odious he was to the people; and how dangerous he would be ſhortly vnto the kings owne life. Antiochus beleeued this, hauing long ſuſpected the ſame Hermias; but not daring for feare of him to vtter his ſuſpicions. It was therefore agreed, that he ſhould be made away on the ſudden: which was done, he being trained foorth by a ſleight, a good way out of the Campe, and there killed without warning or diſputation. The King needed not to haue vſed ſo much art, in ridding his hands of a man ſo much deteſted. For howſoeuer he ſeemed gracious whilſt he was aliue: yet they that for feare had beene moſt obſequious to him, whilest he were in case to do them hurt, was as ready as the foremost, to speake of him as he had deserued, when once they were secure of him: Yea, his wife and children lying then at Apamea, were stoned to death by the wiues and children of the Citizens; whose indignation brake forth the more outragiously, the longer that they had beene concealed.

About these times, Achæus (of whom we spake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to perish in some of these Expeditions which he tooke in hand; was bold to set a Diademe vpon his owne head, and take vpon him as a king. His purpose was to haue inuaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the enterprise; and studied to set some handsome colour on his former presumption. It is very strange, that Antiochus neither went against Achæus; nor yet dissembled the notice which he had taken, of these his traiterous purposes: but wrote vnto him, signifying that he knew all; and vpbraiding him with such infidelity, as any offender might know to be vnpardonable. By these meanes he emboldned the Traytor: who being already detected, might better hope to maintaine his former actions by strong hand, than to excuse them, or get pardon by submission. Antiochus had at that time a vehement desire to recouer Cœlosyria, or what else he could, of the Dominions of Ptolemie Philopater in those parts. Hee began with Seleucia a very strong City neere to the mouth of the Riuer Orontes; which ere long hee wonne, partly by force, partly by corrupting with brybes the Captaines that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, where to Antigonus the great, who founded it, gaue the name of Antigonia: but Seleucus getting it shortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolemie Euergetes hauing lately won it, might if it had so pleased him, haue changed the name into Ptolemais. Such is the vanity of men, that hope to purchase an endlesse memoriall vnto their names, by workes proceeding rather from their greatnesse, than from their vertue; which therefore no longer are their own, than the same greatnesse hath continuance. Theodotus the Ætolian, he that before had opposed himselfe to Antiochus, and defended Cœlosyria in the behalfe of Ptolemie, was now grown sorry, that he had vsed so much faith & diligence, in seruice of an vnthankful and luxurious Prince. Wherefore as a Mercenarie, he began to haue regard to his owne profit: which thinking to finde greater, by applying himselfe vnto him that was (questionlesse) the more worthy of these two kings; He offered to deliuer vp vnto Antiochus the Cities of Tyrus & Ptolemais. Whilest he was deuising about this treason, and had already sent messengers to king Antiochus: his practice was detected & he besieged in Ptolemais by one of Ptolemies Captaines, that was more faithfull than himselfe. But Antiochus hasting to his rescue, vanquished this Captaine who met him on the way: and afterwards got possession, not onely of Tyrus and Ptolemais, with a good fleete of the Egyptian kings that was in those Hauens: but of so many other Townes in that Countrie, as emboldned him to thinke vpon making a iourney into Egypt it selfe. Agathocles and Socibius bore all the sway in Egypt at that time: Ptolemie himselfe being loth to haue his pleasures interrupted, with businesse of so small importance, as the safety of his kingdome. Wherefore these two agreed together, to make prouision as hastily, and yet as secretly as might be, for the war: and neuertheless, at the the same time, to presse Antiochus with daily Embassadours to some good agreement. There came in the heate of this businesse, Embassadours from Rhodes, Byzantium, & Cyzicus, as likewise from the Ætolians; according to the vsuall courtesie of the Greekes, desiring to take vp the quarrell.

These were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocles and Socibius: who intreated them to deale effectually with Antiochus. But whilest this treaty lasted, great preparations were made at Alexandria for the warre: wherein these two Counsaillors perswaded themselues reasonably, that the victory would be their own, if they could get, for mony, a sufficient number of the greeks to take their parts. Antiochus heard only what was done at Memphis, and how desirous the Gouernours of Egypt were to be at quiet: whereunto he gaue the readier beliefe, not onely for that he knew the disposition of Ptolemie, but because the Rhodians, & other Embassadours, comming from Memphis, discoursed vnto him all after one manner; as being all deceiued by the cunning of Agathocles & his fellow: Antiochus therfore hauing wearied himselfe, at the long siege of a Towne called Dura, which he could not winne: & being desirous to refresh himselfe & his Armie in Seleucia, during the winter which then came on, granted to the Egyptian a truce for foure moneths, with promiſe that hee would be ready to hearken vnto equall Conditions, when they ſhould be offered. It was not his meaning to be ſo courteous, as hee would faine haue ſeemed, but onely to lull his enemies aſleepe, whileſt he tooke time to refreſh himſelfe; and to bring Achæus to ſome good order, whoſe treaſon daily grew more open and violent. The ſame negligence which he thought the Egyptian would haue vſed, He vſed himſelfe; as preſuming that when time of the yeere better ſerued, little force would be needfull; for that the Townes would voluntarily yeeld vnto him, ſince Ptolemie prouided not for their defence. Neuertheleſſe, he gaue audience to the Embaſſadors, and had often conference with thoſe that were ſent out of Egypt: pleaſing himſelfe well, to diſpute about the iuſtice of his quarrell, which he purpoſed ſhortly to make good by the ſword, whether it were iuſt or no. He ſaid, that it was agreed betweene Seleucus his Anceſtor, and Ptolemie the ſonne of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could winne it from Antigonus, ſhould bee giuen in poſſeſſion to Seleucus: and that this bargaine was afterwards ratified, by generall conſent of all the Confederates, after the battaile at Ipſus. But Ptolemies men would acknowledge no ſuch bargaine. They ſaid, that Ptolemie the ſonne of Lagi, had wonne Cœloſyria, and the Prouinces adioyning for himſelfe: as alſo that he had ſufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him forces to recouer his Prouince of Babylon, and the Countries about the Riuer of Euphrates. Thus whileſt neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were, in the end of their diſputation, as farre from concluding as at the beginning. Ptolemie demanded reſtitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his owne: Alſo Ptolemie would needs haue Achæus comprehended in the League betweene them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to heare of this, exclaiming againſt it as a ſhamefull thing, that one King ſhould offer to deale ſo with another, as to take his Rebell into protection, and ſeek to ioyn him in Confederacie with his own Soueraigne Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field again: contrary to his expectation he was informed, That Ptolemie, with a very puiſſant Armie, was comming vp againſt him out of Egypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemie, he was encountred on the way by thoſe Captaines of Ptolemie, that had reſiſted him the yeere before. They held againſt him the paſſages of Libanus, whence neuertheleſſe hee draue them: and, proceeding onward in his iourney, wonne ſo many places, that he greatly increaſed his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with diuers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew neere together: many Captaines of Ptolemie forſooke his pay, and fled ouer to Antiochus. This notwithſtanding, the Egyptian had the courage to meet his enemy in the field. The battell was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Egyptians or Aſiatiques were the better Souldiers (for that the ſtrength of both Armies conſiſted in Mercenaries, chiefly of the Greeks, Thracians, and Gaules) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolemie, with Arſinoe his Siſter and Wife, rode vp and downe encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other ſide: each of them rehearſing the braue deeds of his Anceſtors; as not hauing of their owne, whereby to value themſelues. Antiochus had the more Elephants: as alſo his, being of Aſia, had they been fewer would haue beaten thoſe of Africke. Wherfore by the aduantage of thoſe beaſts, Hee draue the Enemies before him, in that part of the battaile wherein he fought himſelfe. But Ptolemie had the better men: by whoſe valour he brake the Groſſe of his Enemies battaile, and won the victory; whileſt Antiochus was heedleſly following vpon thoſe, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field aboue ſeuenty thouſand foot, and ſixe thouſand horſe; whereof though he loſt ſcarceten thouſand foot, and not foure hundred horſe; yet the fame of his ouerthrow tooke from him all thoſe places which he had lately won. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: He began to ſtand in feare, leſt Ptolemie and Achæus, ſetting vpon him both at once, ſhould put him in danger of his whole Eſtate. This cauſed him to ſend Embaſſadors to the Egyptian to treat of peace: which was readily granted; it being much againſt the nature of Ptolemie to vexe himſelfe thus with the tedious buſineſſe of warre. So Ptolemie, hauing ſtaied three moneths in Syria, returned home into Egypt clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his ſubiects, and of all thoſe that were acquainted with his voluptuous and ſlothfull condition.

Achæus was not compriſed in the league betweene theſe two Kings: or if hee had beene

beene included therein; yet would not the Egyptian haue taken the paines, of making a second expedition for his sake. The best was, that he thought himselfe strong enough, if fortune were not too much against him, to deale with Antiochus. Neither was he confident without great reason: For besides his many victories, whereby hee had gotten all that belonged vnto Antiochus on this side of Taurus, Hee had also good successe against Attalus King of Pergamus: that was an able man of warre, and commanded a strong Armie. Neither was hee, as Molo the Rebell had beene, one of meane regard otherwise, and carried beyond himselfe by apprehending the vantage of some opportunitie: but Cousin german to the King, as hath beene shewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a younger daughter of the same Mithridates King of Pontus, which was also called Laodice, as was her sister the Queene, Antiochus his wife. These things had added maiestie vnto him; and had made his followers greatly to respect him, euen as one to whom a Kingdome was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, That King Ptolemie of Egypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquished in the battraile at Raphia; and had thereby lost all his gettings in Syria. But all these hopes and likely-hoods came to nothing: For the King of Pontus, if hee would meddle in that quarrell betweene sonnes-in-law, had no reason to take part against the more honourable. As for the Egyptian: He was not only slothfull; but hindred by a rebellion of his owne subiects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Egypt, of whom Ptolemie, contrarie to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to serue in the late expedition; beganne to entertaine a good opinion of their owne valour, thinking it not inferiour to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refused to suffer as much as formerly they had don: since they lesse esteemed, than thy had done, the force of the Kings Mercenarie Greekes; which had hitherto kept them in streight subiection. Thus brake out a warre betweene the king and his subiects: wherin though the ill-guided force of the multitude was finally broken; yet king Ptolemie thereby wasted much of his strength, and much of his time, that might haue beene spent, as he thought, much better in reuelling; or, as others thought, in succouring Achæus. As for Antiochus, Hee had no sooner made his peace with the Egyptian, than he turned all his care to the preparation of warre against Achæus. To this purpose he entred into League with Attalus; that so he might distract the forces of his Rebell, and finde him worke on all sides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were such, that within a while he had pent vp Achæus into the Citie of Sardes; where he held him about two yeeres besieged. The Citie was very strong, and well victualled: so as there appeared not, when the second yeere came, any greater likelyhood of taking it, than in the first yeeres siege. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found meanes how to enter the Towne. The Castle it selfe was vpon a very high Rocke, and in a manner impregnable, as also the Towne-wall adioyning to the Castle, in that part which was called the Sawe, was in like manner situate vpon steepe Rockes, and almost inaccessible; that hung ouer a deepe bottome, whereinto the dead carkases of Horses, and other beasts, yea, and sometimes of men, vsed to be throwne. Now it was obserued by Lagoras, that the Rauens and other birds of prey, which hanted that place by reason of their food which was there neuer wanting, vsed to flie vp vnto the top of the Rocks, and to pitch vpon the walles, where they rested without any disturbance. Obseruing this often, he reasoned with himselfe, and concluded, that those parts of the Wall were left vnguarded, as being thought vnapprochable. Hereof he informed the king: who approued his iudgement, & gaue vnto him the leading of such men, as hee desired for the accomplishing of the enterpize. The successe was agreeable to that which Lagoras had afore conceiued: and though with much labour, yet without resistance, he scaled those rocks, and (whilest a generall assault was made) entred the towne in that part; which was at other times vnguarded, then vnthought vpon. In the same place had the Persians, vnder Cyrus, gotten into Sardes; when Cræsus thought himselfe secure on that side. But the Citizens tooke not warning, by the example of a losse manie ages past; and therefore out of memorie. Achæus held still the Castle; which not onely seemed by nature impregnable, but was verie well stored with all necessaries; & manned with a sufficient number, of such as were to him well assured. Antiochus therefore was constrayned to waste much time about it; hauing none other hope to preuaile, than by famishing the inclosed. Besides the vsuall tediousnesse of expectation, his businesse called him thence away into the higher Asia, where the Bactrians ctrians, and Parthians with the Hyrcanians, had erected kingdoms taken out of his Dominions, vpon which they still incroched. But hee thought it not safe, to let Achæus breake loose againe. On the other side there were some Agents of Ptolemie the Egyptian, and good friends vnto Achæus; that made it their whole studie, how to deliuer this besieged Prince. If they could rescue his person, they cared for no more: but presumed that when he should appeare in the Countreyes vnder Taurus, he would soone haue an Armie at commaund, and bee strong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to worke as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretan, that was acquainted well with all the wayes in the Countrey, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult passages among those Rockes, whereon the Castle of Sardes stood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he should receiue at the hands of Ptolemie, as well as of Antiochus, to doe his best for performance of their desire. He vndertooke the businesse: and gaue such likely reasons of bringing all to effect, that they wrote vnto Achæus, by one Arianus, a trustie messenger, whom Bolis found meanes to conueigh into the Castle. The faith of these Negotiators Achæus held most assured. They also wrote vnto him in priuie Characters, or Chiphers, wherewith none saue he and they were acquainted: whereby he knew, that it was no fained deuice of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the messenger; hee was a trustie fellow, and one whom Achæus found, by examination, heartily affected vnto their side. But the Contents of the Epistle, which were, That he should be confident in the faith of Bolis, and of one Cambylus whom Bolis had wonne vnto the businesse, did somewhat trouble him. They were men to him vnknowne: and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus; vnder whom he had the command of those Cretans, which held one of the Forts that blocked vp the Castle of Sardes. Neuertheless other way to escape he saw none, than by putting himselfe to some aduenture. When the messenger had therefore passed to and fro: it was at length concluded, That Bolis himselfe should come speake with Achæus, & conduct him foorth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the rest, saue onely by Bolis and Cambylus; which were Cretans, and (as all their Countrimen, * some few excepted, haue beene, and still are) false knaues. These two held a consultation together, that was, as [k] Polybius obserues it, rightly Cretical: neither concerning the safety of him whose deliuery they vndertoke, nor touching the discharge of their owne faith; but onely how to get most with least adoe and danger to themselues. Briefly they concluded, That first of all they would equally share betweene them ten Talents, which they had already receiued in hand: and then, That they would reueale the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliuer Achæus vnto him, if they might be well rewarded both with present money, and with promise of consideration answerable to the greatnesse of such a seruice, when it should be dispatched. Antiochus hearing this promise of Cambylus, was no lesse glad, than were the friends of Achæus well pleased with the comfortable promises of Bolis. At length when all things were in readinesse on both sides, and that Bolis with Arianus was to get vp into the Castle, and conueigh Achæus thence: Hee first went with Cambylus to speake with the King, who gaue him very priuate audience; and confirmed vnto him by word of mouth the assurance of his liberall promises. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honest man, and of one that was faithfull vnto Ptolemie whom he had long serued; He accompanied Arianus vp into the Castle. At his comming thither, Hee was louingly entertained; yet questioned at large by Achæus, touching all the weight of the businesse in hand. But hee discoursed so well, and with such grauity; that there appeared no reason of distrusting either his faith or iudgement. Hee was an olde Souldiour, had long beene a Captaine vnder Ptolemie, and did not thrust himselfe into this businesse; but was inuited by honourable and faithfull men. Hee had also taken a safe course, in winning (as it seemed) that other countrieman of his, who kept a Fort that stood in their way; and thereby had already sundry times giuen safe passage and repassage vnto Arianus. But against all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an aduenture stirred vp some diffidence. Achæus therefore dealt wisely, and sayde, That he would yet stay in the Castle a little longer: but that hee meant to send away with Bolis three or foure of his frends; from whom when he receiued better aduertisement, concerning the likelyhood of the enterprise, then would he issue forth himselfe. Hereby he tooke order, not to comit himselfe wholly vnto the faith of a man vnknowne. But as Polybius well notes, he did not consider that he

* Among these few I doe not except one, calling himselfe Ludæmon. Iohn Andrew a Cretan; who in one of his late shameless Libels, wherein he traduceth our King, Religion, and Country, with all the good & worthy men of whom he could learne the names, hath, by inserting my name twice, belied me; in calling me a Puritan, and one that haue beene dangerous vnto my Soueraigne. It is an honour to be ill spoken of by so diligent a supporter of Treasons, and Architect of Lies: in regard whereof I may not denie him the comendation of Creticisme no lesse voluminous, than he in multiplicity of name is beyond any the Cretians in elder times, that were alwaies Lyers, euill beasts, and slow bellies.

he playd the Cretian with a man of Crete: which is to say, That he had to do with one, whose knauery could not be auoided by circumspection. Bolis and Cambilus had layd their plots thus, That if Achæus came forth alone, then should he easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Arianes be appointed to lead the way, as one that of late had trodden it oft; & Bolis following behinde, should haue an eye vpon Achæus to preuent him not onely from escaping in the tumult, but from breaking his owne necke, or otherwise killing himselfe: to the end, that being taken aliue, Hee might be to Antiochus the more welcome Present. And in such order came they now forth: Arianes going before as Guide; the rest following, as the way serued, and Bolis in the Rere. Achæus made none acquainted with his purpose, till the very instant of his departure. Then signified he the matter to his Wife Laodice; and comforting her with hope as well as he could, appointed foure of his speciall friends to beare him company. They were all disguised: and one of them alone tooke vpon him to haue knowledge of the Greek tongue, speaking & answering as need should require, for all as if the rest had beene Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily deuising vpon his businesse, and much perplexed. For (saith Polybius) Though he were of Crete, and prone to surmise any thing to the mischiefe of another: yet could hee not see in the darke, nor know which of them was Achæus, or whether Achæus himselfe were there. The way was very vneasie, and in some places dangerous, especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were faine to stay in diuers places: and helpe one another vp or downe. But vpon euery occasion they were all of them very officious towards Achæus; lending him their hands, and taking such care of him, as easily gaue Bolis to vnderstand, that he was the man: and so by their vnseasonable duty, they vndid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in wait, Bolis whisteled, & presently clasped Achæus about the middle, holding him fast that he could not stirre. So they were all taken by the Ambush, and carried forthwith to Antiochus: who late vp watching in his Pauilion, expecting the euent. The sight of Achæus, brought in bound vnto him, did so astonish the king, that he was vnable to speake a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was he before informed of the plot, which might haue kept him from admiration: as also the next morning betimes, assembling his friends together, He condemned Achæus to a cruell death; which argues, that hee was not moued with pitty towards this vnhappy man. Wherefore it was the generall regard of calamities, incident vnto great fortunes, that wrung from him these teares: as also the rarity of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it be so, that such a course as this of his, in employing two mischieuous knaues against one Traitour, doth not rarely succeed well; according to that Spanish Prouerbe; A vn traydor dos alleuosos. The death of Achæus brought such astonishment vpon those which held the Castle, that after a while they gaue vp the place and themselues vnto the King; whereby he got entire possession of all to him belonging in the lesser Asia.

Some yeeres passed after this, ere Antiochus was ready for his Expedition against the Parthians and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings, and commonly subiect vnto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Prouinces, after the death of Alexander, the Gouernement ouer them was committed by Antipater to one Philip, a man of small regard, shortly they fell to Eumenes; then to Antigonus; and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus: vnder whose posterity they continued vntill the Reigne of Seleucus Callinicus, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian kings. The lustfull insolencie of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquished and thought to be slaine by the Gaules, did stirre vp Arsaces, a Nobleman of the Countrey, to seeke reuenge of iniuries done, and animate them to rebell. So he slue the kings Lieutenant, made himselfe king of the Parthians and Lord of Hyrcania, fought prosperously with those that disturbed him in his beginnings; and tooke Seleucus Callinicus prisoner in battaile, whom hee royally entertained, and dismissed. Hereby he wonne reputation as a lawfull king: and by good gouernement of his Country, procured vnto himselfe such loue of his Subiects, that his name was continued vnto his successors; like as that of the Ptolemies in Egypt, & that of the Cæsars afterwards in Rome. Much about the same time the Bactrians rebelled: though these at length, and all belonging vnto the Seleucidæ beyond Euphrates, increased the Parthians dominion. Now Antiochus went against them with so strong an army, that they durst not meete him in plaine field; but kept themselues in woods, or places of strength, and defended the Streights and passages of Mountaines. The resistance they made auailed them not. For Antiochus had with him so great a multitude, and so well forted, as he needed not to turne out of the way, from those that lay fortified against him, in Woods & Streights betweene their mountaines; it being easie to spare out of so great a number, as many as fetching a compasse about, might eyther get aboue the enemies heads, or come behinde, and charge them on the backe. Thus did hee often employ against them his light armature: wherewith he caused them to dislodge, and giue way vnto his Phalanx; vpon which they durst not aduenture themselues in open ground. Arsaces, the second of the name, (for his father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though hee was confident in the fidelity of his owne subiects; yet feared to encounter with so mighty an inuader. His hope was, that the bad wayes, and Deserts, would haue caused Antiochus, when he was at Ecbatane in Media, to giue ouer the iourney, without proceeding much further. This not so falling out: Hee caused the Wells and Springs in the Wildernesse, through which his enemy must passe, to bee dammed vp and spoiled. By which meanes, and the resistance before spoken of, when he could not preuaile, He withdrew himselfe out of the way; suffering the Enemie to take his pleasure for a time, in wasting the Countrey: wherein without some victorie obtained, he could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, That Arsaces was nothing strongly prouided for the war. Wherefore hee marched through the heart of Parthia: and then forward into Hyrcania where hee wanne Tambrace, the chiefe City of that Prouince. This indignitie, and many other losses, caused Arsaces at length, when he had gathered an Armie that seemed strong enough, to aduenture a battaile. The issue thereof was such as gaue to neither of the kings hope of accomplishing his desires, without exceeding difficultie. Wherefore Asaces craued Peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amisse, to make him a friend, whom he could not make a subiect.

The next expedition of Antiochus, was against Euthydemus King of the Bactrians; one that indeede had not rebelled against him or his Ancestors: but hauing gotten the kingdome from those that had rebelled, kept it to himselfe. With Euthydemus hee fought a battaile by the Riuer Arius, where he had the victory. But the victory was not so greatly to his honour; as was the testimonie which he gaue of his owne priuate valour, in obtaining it. Hee was thought that day to haue demeaned him more couragiously, than did any one man in all his Armie. His horse was slaine vnder him; and he himselfe receiued a wound in his mouth, whereby he lost some of his teeth. As for Euthydemus, He withdrew himselfe backe vnto the furthermost parts of his kingdome, and afterwards protracted the warre, seeking how to end it by composition. So Embassadors passed betweene the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrey of his was vniustly vsurped from him: Euthydemus answering, That he had wonne it from the children of the Vsurpers: and further, That the Bactrians, a wilde Nation, could hardly be retained in order, saue by a King of their owne; for that they bordered vpon the Scythians, with whom if they should ioyne, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Prouinces that lay behinde them. These allegations, together with his owne wearinesse, pacified Antiochus, and made him willing to grant Peace, vpon reasonable Conditions. Demetrius, the sonne of Euthydemus, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his father, as Embassadour in this Treaty of Peace, was not a little auaileable vnto a good conclusion: for Antiochus liked him so well, that he promised to giue him in marriage, one of his owne daughters, and therewithall permitted Euthydemus to retaine the kingdome, causing him neuertheless to deliuer vp all his Elephants, as also to binde himselfe by oath, to such Couenants as he thought requisite.

So Antiochus leauing the Bactrian in quiet, made a iourney ouer Caucasus, and came to the borders of India, where he renewed with Sophagasenus, king of the Indians, the society that had beene betweene their Ancestors. The Indians had remained subiect vnto the Macedonians, for a little while, after Alexanders death. Eumenes in his warre against Antigonus, raised part of his forces out of their Countrey. But when Antigonus (after his victory) turned Westward, and was ouer-busied in a great ciuil warre: then did one Sandrocottus, an Indian, stirre vp his Countrey-men to Rebellion, making himselfe their Captaine, and taking vpon him, as Protector of their libertie. This Office fice and Title he soone changed, though not without some contention, into the Name and Maiestie of a king. Finally hee got vnto himselfe (hauing an Armie of sixe hundred thousand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had beene Alexanders. In this Estate he had well confirmed himselfe, ere Seleucus Nicator could finde leisure to call him to account. Neither did He faint, or humble himselfe, at the comming of Seleucus: but met him in the field, as ready to defend his owne; so strongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented, to make both peace and affinity with him, taking onely a reward of fifty Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian kingdomes, was continued by some Offices of loue betweene their children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whose number of Elephants were increased thereupon, by the Indian king, to an hundred and fiftie: as also he was promised, to haue some treasure sent after him; which he left one to receiue. Thus parted these two great kings. Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards, in many generations, any businesse worthy of remembrance with the Westerne Countreyes. The posteritie of Sandrocottus, is thought to haue retained that kingdome vnto the dayes of Augustus Cæsar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, sent Embassadours with Presents, and an Epistle written in Greeke: wherein, among other things, He said, That He had command ouer sixe hundred kings. There is also found, scattered in sundrie Authors, the mention of some which held that kingdome, in diuers Ages, euen vnto the time of Constantine the Great: being all peradventure of the same race. But Antiochus, who in this Treatie with Sophagasenus carried himselfe as the worthier person, receiuing Presents; and after marching home through Drangiana and Carmania, with such reputation, that all the Potentates not onely in the higher Asia, but on the hither side of Taurus, humbled themselues vnto him, and called him The Great: saw an end of his owne Greatnesse within few yeeres ensuing, by presuming to stand vpon points with the Romans; whose Greatnesse was the same indeed, that his was onely in seeming.

§. III.

The lewd reigne of Ptolemie Philopator in Egypt: with the tragicall end of his fauorites; where he was dead. Antiochus prepares to marre on the young childe Ptolemie Epiphanes, the sonne of Philopator. His irresolution in preparing for diuers warres at once. His voyage towards the Hellespont. Hee seekes to hold amitie with the Romans, who make friendly shew to him; intending neuertheless to haue warre with him. His doings against the Hellespont, which the Romans made the first ground of their quarrell to him.

THis expedition being finished, Antiochus had leisure to repose himselfe a while; and studie which way to conuert the terrour of his puissance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three yeeres Ptolemie Philopator died: leauing his son Ptolemie Epiphanes, a young Boy, his successor in the kingdome, vnlikely by him to bee well defended, against a neighbour so mighty and ambitious. This Ptolemie surnamed Philopator, that is to say, a louer of his Father, is thought to haue had that surname giuen him in meere derision; as hauing made away both his Father and Mother. His young yeeres, being newly past, his childhood when he began to reigne, may seeme to discharge him of so horrible a crime, as his Fathers death: yet the beastlinesse of all his following life, makes him not vnlike to haue done any mischiefe, whereof hee could bee accused. Hauing woone the battaile at Raphiah, He gaue himselfe ouer to sensuality; and was wholly gouerned by a Strumpet called Agathoclea. At her instigation Hee murdered his owne wife and sister; which had aduentured her selfe with him, in that onely dangerous Action by him vndertaken and performed with honour. The Lieutenant shipes off his Prouinces, with all Commands in his Armie, & Offices whatsoeuer, were wholly referred vnto the disposition of this Agathoclea, and her brother Agathocles, and Oenanthe a filthy Bawd that was mother vnto them both. So these three gouerned the Realme at their pleasure, to the great griefe of all the Countrey, till Philopator died: who hauing reigned seuenteene yeeres, left none other sonne than Ptolemie Epiphanes, a childe of fiue yeeres old, begotten on Arsinoe that was his sister and wife. After the kings death, Agathoclea began to take vpon him, as Protector of young Epiphanes, and Gouernour of the Land. He assembled the Macedons (which were the Kings ordinary forces in pay, not all borne in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Egypt with Ptolemie the first, and would not be accounted Egyptians; as neither would the Kings themselues) and bringing forth vnto them his sister Agathocles, with the yong King in her armes, began a solemne Oration. He told them, That the deceased father of this their king, had committed the childe into the armes of his sister, but vnto the faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole state of the kingdome did now relye. He besought them therefore that they would be faithfull, and, as great need was, defend their king against the treason of one Tlepolemus, an ambitious man, who traiterously went about to set the Diademe vpon his own head, being a meere stranger to the Royall blood. Herewithall he produced before them a witnesse, that should iustifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he deliuered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, and counterfeiting teares: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spake; but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a shamelesse dissembler he was, to take so much vpon him, as if he knew not how greatly he was hated. And so brake vp the Assembly: He that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agathocles therefore, whom the old kings fauour had made mighty, but neither wise nor well qualified, thought to goe to worke, as had formerly been his manner, by vsing his authority, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. He haled out of a Temple the mother-in-law of Tlepolemus, and cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumors, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilest they were committed in the old kings name) to meete in knots together and vtter one to another their mindes, wherein they had conceiued extreame hate against these three pernicious misgouernours of the old king. Besides their consideration of the present iniurie done to Tlepolemus, they were some-what also moued with feare of harme, which, in way of requitall, Tlepolemus was likely to doe vnto the Citie. For He was, though a man most vnapt for Gouernment, as afterwards he proued, yet no bad Souldier, and well beloued of the Armie. It was also then in his power, to stop the prouision of victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motiues wrought with the people: so by the remedy which Agathocles vsed, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred vnto vprore. He secretly apprehended one of their number, whom hee suspected of conspiracie against him, & deliuered him vnto a follower of his own, to be examined by torture. This poore Souldier was carried into an inner roome of the Palace, and there stripped out of all his apparrell to be tormented. But whilest the whippes were brought forth, and all things euen in a readinesse for that purpose, there was brought vnto the minister of Agathocles, a sad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the roome, leauing Moeragenes the Souldier alone by himselfe, and the doores open. He perceiuing this, naked as he was conueighed himselfe out of the Palace, and got vnto the Macedonians, of whom he found some in a Temple thereby at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priuiledges, as are the Turkes Ianizars. Being assured therefore that one of their fellowes had thus beene vsed; they fell to Armes in a great rage, and began to force the Palace: crying out, That they would see the king, and not leaue him in possession of such a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the Citie, with lowd clamours, made no lesse adoe than the Souldiours, though to lesse effect. So the old Bawd Oenanthe fled into a Temple: her sonne and Daughter stayed in the Court, vntill the king was taken from them, and they, by his permission which he easily gaue, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, deliuered vp to the furie of the people. Agathocles himselfe was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His sister was dragged naked vp and downe the streets, as was also his mother, with all to them belonging: the enraged multitude committed vpon them a barbarous execution of iustice, biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in pieces.

These troubles in Egypt, serued well to stirre vp King Antiochus, who had very good leisure, though he wanted all pretence, to make warre vpon young Ptolemie. Philip of Macedon had the same desire to get what part he could of the childes estate. But it happened well, that Ptolemie Philopater in the Punicke Warre, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices vnto the Romans. Vnto them therefore the Egyptians addressed themselues, and craued helpe against these two kings: who though they secretly maligned one the other, yet had entred into couenant to deuide betweene them all all that belonged vnto this Orphan, whose Father had beene Confederate with them both. So * M. Lepidus was sent from Rome, to protect from all violence the king of Egypt, especially against Antiochus. As for the Macedonian; He was very soone found buried, with warre at his owne doores. Also Scopas the Ætolian, being a Pensioner to the Egyptian, was sent into Greece to raise an Armie of Mercenaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I doe not finde: and therefore thinke it not improbable, that he was sent thither onely one of the three Embassadors, ° in the beginning of the Warre with Philip, as hath beene shewed before. As for Scopas; He shortly after went vp into Syria with his Armie; where winning many places, among the rest of his Acts, he subdued the Iewes; who seeme to haue yeelded themselues a little before vnto Antiochus, at such time as they saw him prepare for his Warre, and despaired of receiuing helpe from Egypt. But it was not long, ere all these victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the very next yeere following, which was (according to Eusebius) the same yeere that Philip was beaten at Cynoscephalæ; Antiochus vanquished Scopas in battaile, and recouered all that had bin lost. Among the rest, the Iewes with great willingnesse returned vnder his obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entreated.

The Land of Egypt this great King did forbeare to inuade; and gaue it out, that hee meant to bestow a daughter of his owne in marriage vpon Ptolomie: either, hoping, as may seem, that the Countrie would willingly submit it selfe vnto him, if this yong child should happen to miscarry; or else that greater purchase might be made in the Western parts of Asia, whilest Philip was held ouer-laboured by the Romans. It appeares that he was very much distracted; hunting (as we say) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels betweene Attalus, Philip, and the Greekes, promised to affoord him great aduantage, if he should bring his Armie to the Hellespont. On the other side, the state of Egypt being such as hath beene declared, seemed easily to be swallowed vp at once. One while therefore he tooke what he could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Iewes among the rest, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Egyptian) to yeeld him obedience. Another while, letting Egypt alone, He was about to make inuasion vpon Attalus his kingdome; yet suffered himselfe easily to be perswaded by the Roman Embassadours, and desisted from that enterprise. Hauing thus farre gratified the Romans; He sends Embassadors to the Senate, to conclude a perfect amity betweene him and them. It is not lightly to be ouerpassed, That these his Embassadors were louingly entertained at Rome; and dismissed, with a Decree and answer of the Senate, altogether to the honour of king Antiochus. But this answer of the Romans was not sincere; being rather framed according to regard of the kings good liking, than of their owne intent. They had not yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly bee troubled with two great warres at once. Wherefore, not standing much vpon the nice examination of what belonged vnto their honour, they were content to giue good words for the present. In the meane time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria, and shortly prepares to winne some Townes elsewhere, belonging vnto Ptolomie; yet withall hee sends an Armie Westward, intending to make what profit he can of the distractions in Greece. Likewise it is considerable, as an argument of his much irresolution, How notwithstanding his attempts vpon both of their kingdomes, hee offered one of his daughters to Ptolomie, and another to Eumenes the sonne of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus: seeking each of their friendshippes, at one and the same time, when hee sought to make each of them a spoyle. Thus was hee acting and deliberating at once; being carried with an inexplicable desire of repugnancies, which is a disease of great, and ouer-swelling fortunes. Howsoeuer it was, Hee sent an Armie to Sardes by Land, vnder two of his owne sonnes: willing them there to stay for him; whilest he himselfe with a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other vessels, intended to passe along by the Coasts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in such places as held for the Egyptian. It was a notable Act of the Rhodians, that, whilest the warre of Philip lay yet vpon their hands, they aduentured vpon this great Antiochus. They sent vnto him a proud Embassage: whereby they gaue him to vnderstand, That if he passed forward beyond a certaine Promontorie in Cilicia, they would meet him and fight with him; not for any quarrell of theirs vnto him; but because he should not ioyne with Philip their enemy, and helpe him against the Romans. It was insolently done of them, neither seemed it otherwise, to prescribe such limits vnto the King: yet he tempered himselfe, and without any shew of indignation gaue a gentle answer; partly himselfe to their Embassadours; partly vnto their whole Citie, by Embassadors which he thither sent. He shewed his desire, to renew the ancient Confederacies between his Ancestors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, lest his comming should tend vnto any hurt, either of them, or of their confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would molest: they were (he said) his very good friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better proofe, than the entertainement and answer by them newly giuen to his Embassadors.

The Rhodians appeare to haue been a cunning people, and such as could foresee what weather was like to happen. This answer of the King, and the relation of what had passed between his Embassadors and the Senate, moued them not a whit; when they were informed shortly after, that the Macedonian warre was ended at the battaile of Cynoscephalæ. They knew that Antiochus his turne would be next; and prepared to be forward on the stronger side. Wherefore they would not be contented to sit still; vnlesse the Townes on the South Coast of Asia, belonging to Ptolomie their friend and Confederate, were suffered to be at quiet. Herein also they did well; for that they had euer beene greatly beholding to all the race of the Ptolomies. They therefore, in this time of necessity, gaue what aide they could vnto all the subiects of the Egyptian in those parts. In like manner did king Eumenes, the sonne of Attalus, prognosticate as concerning the warre that followed, between Antiochus and the Romans. For when king Antiochus made a friendly offer, to bestow one of his daughters vpon him in marriage: He excused himselfe, and would not haue her. Attalus and Philetærus, his brethren, wondred at this. But he told them, that the Romans would surely make war vpon Antiochus; and therein finally preuaile. Wherefore he said, That by abstaining from this affinitie, it should be in his power to ioyne with the Romans, and strengthen himselfe greatly with their friendship. Contrariwise, if he leaned to Antiochus: as hee must be partaker in his ouerthrow; so was he sure to be oppressed by him, as by an ouer-mighty neighbour, if he happened to win the victory.

Antiochus himselfe wintered about Ephesus: where he took such order as he thought conuenient, for the reducing of Smyrna and Lampsacus to obedience; that had vsurped their liberty, and obstinately stroue to maintaine it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring he sailed vnto the Hellespont: where hauing won some Townes that Philip had gotten not long before this, he passed ouer into Europe side; and in short space mastered the Chersonesus. Thence went he to Lysimachia: which the Thracians had gotten & destroyed, when Philip withdrew his garrison thence, to imploy it in the Roman war. The Ætolians obiected as a crime vnto Philip, in the conference before T. Quintius, that he had oppressed Lysimachia, by thrusting thereinto a garrison. Hereupon Philip made answer, that his garrison did not oppresse the town, but saue it from the Barbarians: who tooke and sackt it, as soone as the Macedonians were gone. That this answer was good & substantiall, though it were not acceptable as such; might appeare by the miserable case, in which Antiochus found Lysimachia at his comming thither. For the town was vttery razed by the Barbarians; and the people carried away into slauery. Wherfore the king tooke order to haue it re-edified: as also to redeeme those that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens, as were dispersed in the Country thereabout. Likewise he was carefull to allure thither, by hopefull promises, new inhabitants, and to repleniſh the Citie with the wonted frequencie. Now to the end that men should not be terrified from comming thither to dwell, by any feare of the neighbour Thracians: he tooke a iourney in hand against those barbarous people, with the one halfe of his Army; leauing the other halfe to repair the Citie. These paines he tooke; partly in regard of the conuenient situation, & former glory of Lysimachia; partly for that he thought it highly redounding vnto his owne honour, to recouer & establish the dominion in those parts which his fore-father Seleucus Nicator had won from Lysimachus, and thereby made his kingdome of greater extent, than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he shall dearely pay: and as after that victory against Lysimachus, the death of king Seleucus followed shortly; so shall a deadly wound of the kingdome founded by Seleucus ensue very speedily, after the reconqueſt of the same Countrie, which was the last of Seleucus his purchases.

§. IIII.

The Romans hold friendly correspondence with Antiochus, during their warre with Philip: after which they quarrell with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chased by his enemies, and by the Romans: His flight vnto the King Antiochus. The Ætolians murmure against the Romans in Greece. The warre of the Romans and Achæans, with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. Quintius his Triumph. Peace denied to Antiochus by the Romans.

FOr the Romans, though they were vnable to smother their desire of warre with Antiochus, whereof notice was already taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much against their will to keepe the rumour on foot, which they meant shortly to make good, of this intended warre, so long as they wanted matter of quarrell; wherof they were furnished, by this enterprise of the Kings about Lysimachia. It was not long, since King Attalus, a friend and helper of the Romans in their warre with Philip, could obtaine of them none other helpe against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speak for him; because the one of these kings was held no lesse a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards passe between them any other offices, than very friendly. Antiochus at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his Inuasion from the kingdome of Pergamus: also very shortly after he sent Embassadors to them, to make a perfect League of amitie betweene them. This was whilest as yet they were busied with Philip, and therefore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptation: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Clients vnto the Romans; then was all this good correspondence changed, into termes of worse, but more plaine meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten Counsailors sent from Rome, requited (as hath bin *shewed before) with a commination of war, this kings gratulation of their victory; as also his long-professed amitie, and desire to continue in the same.

These ten Counsailors were able to informe T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seemes that he was not ignorant before; since, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable vnto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they diuided themselues to make progresse through diuers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them should visit King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion serued, vse diligence to make a partie strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome vnmindfull of the businesse: wherein lest T. Quintius, with his ten Assistants, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was sent from Rome, of purpose to deale with the king about those controuersies, that were between him and Ptolomie. What other priuate instructions Cornelius had; we may coniecture by the mannaging of this his Embassage. For coming to Selymbria: and there vnderstanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, hauing bin sent by Titus, were at Lysimachia, He hastened thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counsailors) from Bargillæ, to be present at the Conference. Hegesianax and Lysias were also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptorie Conditions, which the Embassadors present shall expound vnto their Master. After a few daies Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainement between him and these Romans, was in appearance full of loue. But when they came to treat of the businesse in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly deliuered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliuer backe vnto Ptolomie those Townes of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Heereunto he added, and that very earnestly, That hee must also giue vp the Townes of late belonging vnto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more absurd, than such folly in the Romans, as to let Antiochus enioy the profit of that warre, wherin they had laboured so much, and hee done nothing? Further he warned the king, that he should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally He demanded of him, vpon what reason he was come ouer with so great an Armie into Europe; for that other cause of his iourney there was none probable, than a purpose to make warre vpon the Romans? To this the King made answer, That hee wondred why the Romans should so trouble themselues, with thinking

vpon the matters of Asia: wherewith hee prayed them to let him alone; euen as Hee, without such curiositie, suffered them to doe in Italie what they thought good. As for his comming ouer into Europe: they saw well enough what businesse had drawne him thither; namely, the warre against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, & the recouery of Townes to him belonging, in Thrace & Chersonesus. Now concerning his title vnto that countrie, He deriued it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victory against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controuersie betweene him and the other Kings, had beene still of old belonging to the Macedonians or Egyptians; but had beene seized on by them, or by others from whom they receiued them, at such time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countries, were hindred by multiplicitie of businesse, from looking vnto all that was their own. Finally he willed them, neither to stand in fear of him, as if he intended ought against them from Lysimachia; since it was his purpose to bestow this citie vpon one of his sons, that should reigne therein: nor yet to be grieued with his proceedings in Asia; either against the free cities, or against the king of Egypt; since it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding vnto himselfe, and to ioyne ere long with Ptolomie, not onely in friendship, but in a bond of neere affinitie. Cornelius hauing heard this, and being perhaps vnable to refute it; would needs heare further, what the Embassadours of Smyrna and of Lampsacus, whom he had there with him, could say for themselues. The Embassadors of Lampsacus being called in, beganne a tale; wherein they seemed to accuse the king before the Romans, as it were before competent Iudges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace, forasmuch as hee had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators betweene Him and them.

Thus the Treatie held some few dayes, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, hauing not laid their complaints in such sort, as they might be a conuenient foundation of the warre by them intended: nor yet hauing purpose to depart well satisfied, & thereby to corroborate the present peace, were doubtful how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boistrous Gallo-Greeks, pretend onely the goodnesse of their swords; nor yet ouer-modestly, to retaine among the Greeks an opinion of their iustice, forbeare the occasion of making themselues great. The king on the other side was wearie of these tedious guests; that would take none answer, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came newes, without any certaine author, That Ptolomie was dead. Hereof neither the king, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to hasten into Egypt: Antiochus, to take possession of the Kingdome, and L. Cornelius, to preuent him therof, and set the Countrie in good order. Cornelius was sent from Rome Embassadour, both to Antiochus and to Ptolomie: which gaue him occasion to take leaue, & prepare for his Egyptian voyage. Both He, and his fellow Embassadors, had good leaue to depart all together: and the king foorthwith made ready, to be in Egypt with the first. To his sonne Seleucus he committed his Armie, and left him to ouersee the building of Lysimachia: but all his Sea-forces Hee tooke along with him, and sailed vnto Ephesus. Thence hee sent Embassadours to T. Quintius: whom he requested to deale with him in this matter of peace, after such sort as might stand with honestie and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his voyage, he was perfectly informed that Ptolomie was aliue. This made him beare another way from Egypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a grieuous shipwracke, made him without any further attempt on the way, glad to haue safely recouered his Port of Seleucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintred: secure, as might appeare, of the Roman warre.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treaty at Lysimachia, (at least-wise not long before or after it) one of their Embassadours that had beene sent vnto the Macedonian, gaue him counsaile, as in a point highly tending to his good; not to rest contented with the Peace which was ganted vnto him by the Romans, but to desire society with them, whereby they should be bound to haue the same friends and enemies. And this he aduised him to doe quickly, before the Warre brake out with Antiochus; lest otherwise he might seeme, to haue awaited some fit occasion of taking Armes againe. They who dealt thus plainely, did not meane to be satisfied with weake excuses. In like manner some of the Greekes were sollicited; and particularly the Ætolians,

That

That conſtantly & faithfully they ſhould abide in the friendſhip of the people of Rome. It was needleſſe to ſay plainly whereto this entreatie tended: the froward anſwer made by the Ætolians, declares them to haue well vnderſtood the purpoſe. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the Victory, as they had beene during the Warre. They that ſo complained were the moſt moderate of them. Others cryed out that they had been wronged, and defrauded of what was promiſed vnto them: vpbraiding withall the Romans, as men to them beholding; not only for their Victory ouer Philip, but euen for helping them to ſet foot in Greece, which elſe they neuer could haue done. Hereto the Roman gaue gentle anſwers: telling them that there was no more to doe, than to ſend Embaſſadors to the Senate, and vtter their griefes; and then ſhould all be well.

Such care tooke the Romans in Greece, for their Warre intended againſt Antiochus. The fame hereof arriuing at Carthage, gaue matter vnto the enemies of Hannibal, wherwith both to picke a thanke of the Roman Senate, and to chaſe out of their citie this honourable man, whom they ſo greatly hated. He had of late exerciſed his vertue againſt them in the Ciuill adminiſtration; and giuen them an ouerthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Iudges at that time bore all the ſway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and hauing ſubiect vnto them, the liues, goods, and fame of all the reſt. Neither did they vſe this their power with moderation: but conſpired in ſuch wiſe together, that who ſo offended any one of them, ſhould haue them all to be his enemies; which being once knowne, He was ſure to be ſoone accuſed and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the citie, Hannibal was choſen Prætor. By vertue of which Office, though he was ſuperiour vnto them during that yeere: yet had it not been their manner to beare much regard vnto ſuch an annuall Magiſtrate, as at the yeeres end muſt bee accountable to them, if ought were laid vnto his charge. Hannibal therefore ſending for one of the Quæſtors, or officers of the Treaſurie, to come and ſpeake with him: the proud Quæſtor ſet lightly thereby, and would not come. For he was of the aduerſe Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place were to be choſen into the Order of Iudges: in contemplation whereof, he was filled already with the ſpirit of future Greatneſſe. But hee had not to doe with ſuch a tame Prætor, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal ſent for him by a Purſiuant; and hauing thus apprehended him, brought him into iudgement before a publique aſſembly of the people. There he not onely ſhewed, what the vndutifull ſtubborneneſſe of this Quæſtor had beene; but how vnſufferable the inſolencie of all the Iudges at the preſent was: whoſe vnbridled power made them to regard neither Lawes nor Magiſtrates. To this Oration when hee perceiued that all the Citizens were attentiue and fauourable; Hee foorthwith propounded a Law, which paſſed with the generall good liking; That the Iudges ſhould be choſen from yeere to yeere, and no one man bee continued in that Office two yeeres together. If this Law had beene paſſed, before he paſſed ouer Iberus: it would not perhaps haue beene in the power of Hanno, to haue brought him vnto neceſſity of reforming another grieuance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were faine to leuie by Taxation laid vpon the whole Commonaltie, as wanting money in their publique Treaſurie, wherewith to defray either that, or diuers other needfull charges. Hannibal conſidering this, beganne to examine the publique Reuenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treaſurie, by wayes and meanes whatſoeuer; and in what ſort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinary charges of the Common-wealth did not exhauſt the Treaſurie: but that wicked Magiſtrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greateſt part of the monies to their owne vſe, were thereby faine to loade the people with needleſſe burdens. Hereof hee made ſuch plaine demonſtration, that theſe Robbers of the common Treaſure were compelled to reſtore, with ſhame, what they had gotten by knauerie: and ſo the Carthaginians were freed from the neceſſitie of making ſuch poore ſhifts, as formerly they had vſed, when they knew not the value of their owne Eſtate. But as the vertue of Hannibal, was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: ſo they of the Roman Faction, which had, ſince the making of the peace vntill now, little regarded him, beganne to rage extreamely; as being by him ſtript of their ill-gotten goods, and ill-employed authoritie, both at once; euen when they thought themſelues to haue been in full poſſeſſion of the vanquiſhed Carthage. Wherefore they ſent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew strong againe, and Hannibal would shortly be in armes. Questionlesse, if oppressing the Citie by iniustice, and robbing the Treasurie, were the onely way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: these Enemies to the Barchines might well crie out, That hauing done their best already to keepe all in quiet, they saw none other likelihood than of Warre. But hauing none other matter to alledge, than their owne inuentions: they said, That Hannibal was like vnto a wilde beast, which would neuer be tamed: That secret messages past betweene him, and King Antiochus: and that he was wont to complaine of idlenesse, as if it were harmefull to Carthage; with what else to like effect they could imagine. These accusations they directed not vnto the Senate: but addressing their letters craftily, euery one to the best of his owne friends at Rome, and such as were Senators; they wrought so well, that neither publike notice of their Conspiracie was taken at Carthage; nor the authoritie of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpose. Onely P. Scipio is said to haue admonished the Fathers, that they should not thus dishonourably subscribe, and become Seconds to the accusers of Hannibal: as if they would oppresse, by suborning or countenancing false witnesses against him, the man, against whom in warre they had not of long time preuailed, nor vsed their Victory in such base manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not all so great-minded as Scipio: they wished for some such aduantage against Hannibal; and were glad to haue found it. Three Embassadours they sent ouer to Carthage, C. Seruilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius Marcellus: whose very names import sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These hauing past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their comming; and, being by them instructed how to carry themselues, gaue out, That they were sent to end some controuersies, betweene the Carthaginians and Masanissa. But Hannibal had kept such good espiall vpon the Romans, that he knew their meaning well enough: against which he was neuer vnprepared. It were enough to say, That he escaped them by flight: but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particularities. Hauing openly shewed himselfe, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly, He went forth of the Towne when it began to waxe darke, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though such as he might well trust. He had appointed Horses to be in a readinesse at a certaine place: whence riding all night, He came to a Tower of his owne by the Sea-side. There had hee a Ship furnished with all things needfull; as hauing long expected the necessitie of some such iourney. So Hee bade Africke farewell; lamenting the misfortune of his Countrey, more than his owne. Passing ouer to the Ile of Cercina; hee found there in the Hauen some Merchants shippes of Carthage. They saluted him respectiuely: and the chiefe among them began to enquire, whither hee was bound. Hee said, Hee went Embassadour to Tyre: and that he entended there in the Iland to make a sacrifice; whereto Hee inuited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Ships. It was hote weather: and therefore Hee would needes hold his Feast vpon the shore; where, because there wanted couert, Hee made them bring thither all their sailes and yards to be vsed in stead of Tents. They did so; and feasted with him till it was late at night: at which time he left them there asleepe: and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, He was sure not to be pursued. For the Merchants did neither make haste to send any newes of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embassadour: neither could they, without some losse of time, such of them as made most speed homeward, get away from Cercina, being busied awhile in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the misse of so great a person was diuersly construed. Some ghessed aright, That he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came newes where he had beene seene: and then the Roman Embassadours, hauing none other errand thither, accused him (with an euill grace) as a troubler of the Peace; wherby they onely discouered the mischiefe by them intended against him, and the malice of their Senate; missing the while their purpose, and causing men to vnderstand, that He fled not thus without great reason.

Hannibal comming to Tyre, the Mother-Citie of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reason of affinitie betweene their Cities, thought themselues to haue interest. Thence went hee to Antioch; and, finding the King departed, visited his Son in Daphne: who friendly welcommed med him, and sent him vnto his Father at Ephesus, that exceedingly reioyced at his comming.

As Antiochus had cause to be glad, in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore sorrie; otherwise than as they had much disgraced themselues, by discouerie of their impotent malice, in chasing him thus out of his Countrie: For it would not proue alike easie vnto this great Commander, to make stout Souldiers of base Asiatiques; as it had bin by his trayning and discipline, to make very seruiceable and skilfull men of Warre of the Spaniards, Africans, Gaules, and other Nations, that were hardie, though vnexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinary, could alter the nature of cowardly people: yet was it therewithall considerable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the baseneſſe of his Flatterers, and a thousand other such vexations, would bee farre more powerfull in making vnprofitable the vertue of Hannibal; now a desolate and banished man; than had bin the villanie of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in those actions wherein he had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would onely help to ennoble the Roman Victory: or if it further serued to hearten Antiochus, and make him lesse carefull to auoid the war; then should it further serue, to iustifie the Romans in their quarrell. And it seemes indeed that it was no little part of their care, to get a faire pretence of making warre. For Antiochus, as is said before, hauing newly sent Embassadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, that hee had any meaning to take Armes; vnlesse by meere violence he were thereto enforced. Onely the Ætolians were greatly suspected, as a turbulent people, desirous of innouation, and therefore practising with this Great King; whom they wished to see among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appease them; they had of late beene answered with gentle words by one of the ten Counsailours, That the Senate would grant them whatsoeuer with reason they should aske. But this promise was too large, and vnaduised. For when their Embassadours came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing; but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who fauoured them least. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themselues: otherwise than by speaking such words, as might hasten the Romans out of Greece for very shame; who had no desire to be thence gone.

The daily talke at Rome was of war with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leaue the Countrie. For the Ætolians were wont to vpbraid the rest of the Greeks with the vain libertie which the Romans had proclaimed, saying, That these their Deliuerers had laid heauyer fetters vpon them, than formerly they did weare; but yet brighter and fairer, than those of the Macedonian: likewise, that it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the legs of the Greeks their chaine, and tie it about their necks. There was indeed no cause of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip made no delay, in accomplishment of that which was laid vpon him: all the Townes of Greece were at libertie, and the whole Countrie at peace, both with the Romans, and within it selfe. As for Antiochus; Hee made it his daily suit, That the Peace betweene him and Rome, such as it was, might bee confirmed, and strengthened by a League of more assurance. Neuertheleſſe, T. Quintius would needs feare that Antiochus meant forthwith to seize vpon Greece, as soone as hee and his Armie were thence departed. And in this regard, Hee retained still in his owne hands Chalcis, Demetrias, and the Acrocorinthus: by benefit of which Townes, he might the better withstand the dangerous Inuasion like to be made by Antiochus. Suteable vnto the doings of Quintius were the reports of the ten Embassadours, that had beene sent ouer to assist him; when they returned backe into the Citie. Antiochus, they said, would questionlesse fall vpon Greece: wherin he should find not onely the Ætolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, ready to giue him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to doe somewhat against these their suspected enemies: especially against Nabis, who could worst make resistance; whilest Antiochus was farre away in Syria, and not intentiue to his busineſſe. These reports went not onely current through the Citie, among the Vulgar; but found such credit with the chiefe of the Senate, that in the following yeere, against which time it was expected that Antiochus should be ready to take his great enterprise in hand; P. Cornelius Scipio the African, desired, and obtained, a second Consulship, with intention to be Generall in the Warre, against the King and his

Hannibal. For the preſent, the buſineſſe with Nabis was referred vnto Titus; to deale with him as hee thought good. This would bee a faire colour of his longer tarriance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof alſo hee knew that many of the Greekes would not be ſorry; though for his owne part, he wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendſhip with him, two or three yeeres before this, as is already ſhewed, whileſt he had warre with Philip: and had further beene contented for the Romans ſake to be at peace with the Achæans; neither ſince that time had he done any thing, whereby he ſhould draw vpon himſelfe this Warre. Hee was indeed a deteſtable Tyrant, and hated of the Achæans; as one, that beſides his owne wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great miſchiefe. Titus therefore had a plauſible Theme, wheron to diſcourſe before the Embaſſages of all the Confederate Cities; Which he cauſed to meet for that purpoſe at Corinth. He told them, That in the war with Philip, not only the Greekes, but the Romans themſelues, had each their motiues apart (which he there briefly rehearſed) that ſhould ſtirre them vp, and cauſe them to be earneſt. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other intereſt, than onely the making perfect of their honour, in ſetting all Greece at liberty: which noble Action was in ſome ſort maimed, or incompleat, whileſt the noble City of Argos was left in ſubiection to a Tyrant, that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged vnto them, the Greekes, duely to conſider, whether they thought the deliuerance of Argos a matter worthy to bee vndertaken; or whether otherwiſe to auoid all further trouble, they could be well contented to leaue it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this worke in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greekes themſelues. The Athenian Embaſſador made anſwer hereunto very eloquently, and as pleaſing as hee could deuiſe. Hee gaue thankes to the Romans for what was paſt; extolled their vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their Propoſition: wherein vnrequeſted they freely made offer to continue that bounty, which at the vehement requeſt of their poore Aſſociates, they had already of late extended vnto the Greekes. To this Hee added, That great pittie it was to heare, ſuch notable vertue & high deſerts ill ſpoken of by ſome: which tooke vpon them, out of their owne imagination, to foretell what harme theſe their Benefactors meant to doe hereafter: when as Thankefulneſſe rather would haue required an acknowledgement of the benefits and pleaſures already receiued. Euery one found the meaning of this laſt clauſe, which was directly againſt the Ætolians. Wherefore Alexander the Ætolian roſe vp, and told the Athenians their owne: putting them in minde of their ancient glorie, in thoſe times when their City had beene the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recouery of the liberty generall: from which honour they were now ſo farre falne, that they became Paraſites vnto thoſe whom they thought moſt mighty; and by their baſe aſſentation, would leade all the reſt into ſeruitude. Then ſpake He againſt the Achæans, Cliants that had beene a long time vnto the Macedonian; and ſouldiers of Philip, vntill they ranne away from his aduerſitie. Theſe, He ſaid, had gotten Corinth, and muſt now haue warre be made for their ſakes, to the end that they might alſo bee Lords of Argos: whereas the Ætolians, that had firſt made warre with Philip, and alwayes beene friends vnto the Romans, were now defrauded of ſome places, anciently to them belonging. Neither did he thus containe himſelfe, but obiected vnto the Romans, fraudulent dealing: foraſmuch as they kept their Garriſons in Demetrias, Chalcis, and the Acrocorinth; hauing beene alwayes wont to profeſſe, That Greece could neuer be at libertie, whileſt thoſe places were not free. Alſo now at laſt, what elſe did they ſeeke by this diſcourſe of warre with Nabis, than buſineſſes wherewith to finde themſelues occupied, that ſo they might haue ſome ſeeming cauſe of abiding longer in the Country? But they ſhould doe well, if they meant as they ſpake, to carry their Legions home out of Greece: which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis, the Aetolians themſelues did promiſe, & would vndertake, That they would either cauſe him to yeeld to reaſon, and relinquiſh Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garriſon; or elſe compell him by force of Armes, to ſubmit himſelfe to the good pleaſure of all Greece, that was now at vnitie. Theſe words had beene reaſonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparant, that no regard of the common liberty wrought ſo much with theſe Ætolians; as did their owne rauenous deſire of oppreſſing others, and getting vnto themſelues, that worſe would vſe it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had had loſt. Neither could they well diſſemble this; making it no ſmall part of their grieuance, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had beene couenanted, That the Romans ſhould enioy the ſpoyle of all; but leaue the Townes and Lands in poſſeſſion of the Ætolians. This, and the remembrance of a thouſand miſchiefes by them done in former times, made the whole aſſembly, eſpecially the Achæans, crie out vpon them: entreating the Romans to take ſuch order before they went, that not onely Nabis might be compelled to doe right; but the Ætolian theeues bee enforced to keepe home, and leaue their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleaſure of Titus: who ſaw, that by diſcountenancing the Ætolians, He was become the more gracious with all the reſt. But whether it pleaſed him ſo well that Antiochus his Embaſſadors did preſently after lie hard vpon him, to draw the peace to ſome good concluſion, it may bee greatly doubted. Hee caſt them off with a ſlight anſwer: telling them, That the ten Embaſſadors or Counſailours which had beene ſent vnto him from Rome, to bee his aſſiſtants in theſe matters of weight, were now returned home; and that, without them, it was not in his power to conclude vpon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedæmonian warre; it was very ſoone ended. For Titus vſed the helpe of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation againſt Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if hee ſhould haue had to doe with Philip. Beſides the Roman forces, King Eumenes with a Nauie, and the Rhodian Fleet, were inuited to the ſeruice: as alſo Philip of Macedon ſent aid by Land; doing therein poorely, whether it were to get fauor of the Romans, or whether to make one among the number, in ſeeking reuenge vpon Nabis, that had done him iniurie. But the moſt forward in this Expedition were the Achæans, who ſet out ten thouſand Foot, and a thouſand Horſe. As for the Ætolians: rather to hold good faſhion, and ſound their diſpoſitions, than in hope to ſpeed, their helpe was required; whereof they excuſed themſelues as well as they thought beſt. Thus are the Achæans now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; hauing remoued the Ætolians from that degree of fauour: like as they themſelues hereafter (though not in all haſte) ſhall be ſupplanted of the ſame Lacedæmonians, againſt whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argiues, more bold than wiſe, began a conſpiracie againſt the Lacedæmonians that held their Towne, meaning to open their gates vnto the Roman. But ere Titus drew neere, they were all detected and ſlaine: excepting a very few, that eſcaped out of the Towne. The fame of this Commotion, cauſed the Armie to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no ſtir within the Walls: the execution done vpon the firſt mouers, hauing terrified all the reſt of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to aſſaile Nabis in the head of his ſtrength at Lacedæmon, than to conſume time about other places; eſpecially at Argos: for the freedome whereof ſince the Warre was made, pitie it were, that the calamities of the warre ſhould thereon fall moſt heauily.

Nabis had in readineſſe an Army of fifteene thouſand, wherewith to defend himſelfe againſt theſe Inuaders. Fiue thouſand of them were Mercenaries: the reſt, of his owne Countrie; but ſuch as were of all others the worſt, as manumiſed ſlaues, malefactors and baſe peaſants, vnto whom his Tyranny was beneficiall. Of the good and worthy Citizens he ſtood in doubt; and ſince he could not hope to win their loue, his meaning was to hold them quiet by feare. He called them all to an aſſembly: and compaſſing them round in with his Armie, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themſelues; they might, hee ſaid, hope the better to withſtand the common Enemie. But foraſmuch as turbulent heads were inuited by light occaſions, to raiſe tumults, and worke dangerous treaſon: it ſeemed vnto him the ſafeſt, and (withall) the mildeſt courſe, to arreſt before-hand, and put in ward, all thoſe whom he found moſt reaſon to ſuſpect. So ſhould he keep them innocent perforce; and thereby preſerue not only the City and his owne perſon from danger, but them alſo for the puniſhment, which elſe they might haue incurred. Hereupon hee cites and apprehends about foureſcore of them; whom hee leades away to priſon, and the next night putteth them all to death. Thus was hee ſure that they neither ſhould offend, nor yet breake looſe. As for the death of them, if it ſhould happen to be noyſed abroad; what could it elſe doe than terrifie the people; who muſt thereby vnderſtand, that it was a mortall crime to bee ſuſpected? And to the ſame purpoſe his cruelty extended it ſelfe vnto

ſome poore wretches: whom he accuſed of a meaning to flie to the Enemie. Theſe were openly whipt through all the ſtreets, and ſlaine. Hauing thus affrighted the Citizens: He turned the more freely all his thoughts toward the Enemie, that came on apace. He welcommed them with a ſallie: wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiers of the Towne had the better at firſt; but were at length repelled with loſſe. Titus abode not many daies before Sparta: but ouer-ranne the Countrey; hoping belike to prouoke the Tyrant forth to battaile. The Roman Fleet at the ſame time, with king Eumenes and the Rhodians, laid ſiege vnto Gyttheum, the onely or principall Town that Nabis had. Likely they were to haue taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by treaſon. There were two Gouernours within the Towne equall in authoritie: whereof the one, either for feare, or deſire of reward, had a purpoſe to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being ſomewhat more faithfull, ſlue the Traitor; after whoſe death, he himſelfe alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintius with part of his Armie came thither to Gyttheum: this Captaine of the Towne had not the heart to abide the vttermoſt, and await what either Time or his Maſter might doe for him, but was contented to giue vp the place; yet vpon Condition, to depart in ſafety to Sparta with his Garriſon. Pythagoras, the ſonne-in-law of Nabis, and brother vnto his wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Gouernment, with a thouſand Souldiours Mercenaries, and two thouſand Argiues: it being (as may ſeeme) the Tyrants purpoſe, to relieue Gyttheum: which he thought would haue held longer out. But when they heard that it was loſt, then began they to thinke vpon finiſhing the warre, by ſome reaſonable Compoſition. Pythagoras therefore was ſent his Embaſſadour to Titus: requeſting onely that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and ſpeak with him. This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant ſpake very reaſonably for himſelfe: prouing, that he ſuffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments; whereof the ſumme was, That whatſoeuer they now did, or could obiect vnto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon hee inferred, That neither for his keeping the Towne of Argos, nor for any other cauſe by them alleaged, they ought to make warre vpon him; ſince Argos, and all other their allegations whatſoeuer, had not hindered them, in time of their more need of him, from entring into that League with him; which was neuer broken on his part, nor ought to bee on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith ſatisfied. He charged him with Tyrannie; and gaue inſtance, as eaſily he might, of diuers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points, foraſmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guiltie, before they made Peace and Confederacie with him; it was expedient, that ſome other cauſe of this Inuaſion ſhould be alleaged. Wherefore he ſaid further, That this Tyrant had occupied Meſſene, a Towne Confederate with the Romans: That he had bargained to ioyne with Philip; when he was their enemie, not onely in League, but alſo in affinity: and that his Fleet had robbed many of their ſhips, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Pyracie, ſince in the Articles by Titus propounded vnto Nabis, there was no reſtitution mentioned, other than of ſhips, by him taken from the Greeks his neighbours, with whom hee had long held warre: it may ſeeme to haue beene obiected, onely by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of thoſe complaints, that were otherwiſe very friuolous. As for Meſſene, and the bargaine of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made betweene the Romans and this Tyrant; and therefore not to haue beene mentioned. All this it ſeemes that Ariſtænus, the Prætor of the Achæans, very well perceiued: who therfore doubting leſt the Romans, (that were wont to talke ſo much of their own iuſtice, honour, and faithfull dealing) ſhould now relent, and forbeare to moleſt him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had neuer done them wrong; framed his diſcourſe to another end. He entreated Nabis to conſider well of his owne eſtate; & to ſettle his fortunes, whileſt he might do it without hazzard: alledging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to ſurrender their Eſtates, and liued in great ſecuritie, honour, and happineſſe, as priuate men. Thus they diſcourſed vntill night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquiſh Argos; and requeſted them, to deliuer vnto him in writing their other demands, that hee might take counſaile with his friends. The iſſue of all was, That, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates muſt bee, for maintenance of an Armie to lie in Leaguer all that Winter (as there was no hope of making ſhort worke) before the City of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, vpon ſuch Conditions as Titus ſhould thinke meet. Beſides the reſtitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending; Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and ſome of them very grieuous. He would not ſuffer the Lacedæmonian to haue ought to doe in the Ile of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies; nor warre, either in that Iland or elſe-where; not to build any Towne or Caſtle vpon his owne Lands; not to keepe any other ſhipping, than two ſmall Barkes; beſides many other troubleſome iniunctions; with impoſition of an hundred talents in ſiluer to be paid out of hand, and fiftie talents yeerely, for eight yeeres next enſuing. For obſeruance of theſe Couenants hee demanded fiue hoſtages, ſuch as he himſelfe ſhould name; and one of them to bee the Tyrants owne ſonne. If it had beene the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the warre from Nabis, becauſe it was not grounded vpon iuſtice: then had it beene enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which he himſelfe did offer, though it were for feare, to deliuer vp. But if it were thought reaſonable, to diſpenſe a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which therby might redound vnto the ſtate of their beſt friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyrannie: then ſhould this enterpriſe, when once it was taken in hand, haue bin proſecuted vnto the very vtmoſt. As for this middle courſe which the Romans held: as it was not honourable vnto them, to enrich themſelues by the ſpoyle of one that had not offended them: nor pleaſing to the Achæans, who iudged it euer after a great blemiſh to the noble acts of Titus: ſo did it miniſter vnto the Ætolians, and to ſuch as curiouſly pried into the faults of thoſe which tooke vpon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren Subiect of malicious diſcourſe. For ſince Philip, a King, and deſcended of many famous Kings, might not be ſuffered by theſe Maſterly Romans, to hold any one of thoſe Countries or Towns in Greece, that had belonged vnto his Anceſtors: it was thought very ſtrange, that Lacedæmon; once the moſt famous Citie among all the Greekes, was by the ſame Romans left in poſſeſſion of a Tyrant, that had vſurped it but yeſterday: and Hee therein rooted by their authoritie, as their friend and Confederate. Nabis on the other ſide thought himſelfe vnmercifully dealt withall, by the ſelfe-ſame Romans, whoſe amity he had preferred in time of a doubtfull warre, before the loue and affinitie of the Macedonian king, that had committed the Citie of Argos into his hands. But falſly had he dealt with the Macedonian: and falſly was hee dealt with by thoſe, to whom he did betake himſelfe. Among theſe Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleaſed him; ſaue onely that for the baniſhed Lacedæmonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Campe; hauing among them Ageſipolis the naturall King of Sparta, that being a young childe was driuen out by Lycurgus, the firſt of the Tyrants) there was made no prouiſion, to haue them reſtored vnto their Citie and Eſtates; but onely leaue required for as many of their wiues, as would be ſo contented, to liue abroad with them in baniſhment. Wherefore he forbore to giue conſent vnto theſe demands: and ſuſtained an aſſault or two; hoping belike that the enemies would ſoone bee wearie. But his fearfull nature ſhortly ouercame the reſolution, which the ſenſe of theſe iniuries had put into him. So yeelding vnto all that had beene propounded, Hee deliuered the hoſtages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, He thought the Romans farre more wicked than himſelfe; and was ready vpon the firſt aduantage, to doe them all the miſchiefe that he could.

The Argiues had heard news that Lacedæmon was euen at point of being taken. This erected them, and gaue them heart to thinke vpon their owne good. So they aduentured to ſet vpon the Garriſon; which was much weakened, by the remoeue of the three thouſand carried thence by Pythagoras to helpe the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed vnto their libertie no more, than that all of them ioyntly ſhould ſet their hands to the getting of it; which no ſooner they did than they obtained it. Preſently after this came T. Quintius to Argos, where hee was ioyfully welcommed. Hee was deſeruedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had layed hold without ſtaying for him: and that he might the better entitle himſelfe thereto, he cauſed the liberty of the Argiues to be proclaimed at the Nemæan games; as ratifying it by his authority. The Citie was annexed againe to the Councell of Achaia; whereby the Achæans were not more ſtrengthened, than the Argiues themſelues were ſecured from danger of relapſe, into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little businesse or none wherewith to set on worke his Army in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therfore in appearance wholly disposed vnto quiet; Scipio the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not haue his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The vnsyncere meaning of Antiochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Ætolians, were held as considerations worthy of regard: yet not sufficient causes of making War. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Ætolians, and of throughly perswading all the Greeks (which was not to bee neglected, by those that meant to assure vnto themselues the Patronage of Greece) that the good of the Countrie, was their sole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leauing the Nation vnto it selfe, till occasion should be ripe, and call them ouer againe. Wherefore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any neere distance appearing; hee called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where he meant to bid them farewell. There hee recounted vnto them all that had passed since his comming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsell; touching the moderate vse of their libertie, and the care which they ought to haue of liuing peaceably, and without faction. Lastly he gaue vp Acrocorinthus to the Achæans; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, & promising to do the like (which very soone he did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might be knowne, what lyers the Ætolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retaine those places. With ioyfull acclamations did the Greekes testifie their good liking of that which Titus had said and done: as also (at his request) they agreed, to ransome and enlarge all Romans, that had beene sold into their Countrey by Hannibal.

Thus Titus crowned his actions in Greece with an happy end: and by leauing the Countrie before his departure was vrged, left therein behinde him the memory of his vertue and benefits, vntainted by iealousie & suspition of any euill meaning. At his comming to the City, He had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodliest of all that Rome had vntill that day beheld. Three daies together the shew of his pomp continued: as being set out with the spoyles of a Countrie, more aboundant in things worthy of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made Warre. All sorts of Armes, with Statues and curious pieces of Brasse or Marble, taken from the Enemie, were carried in the first dayes Pageant. The second day, was brought in, all the treasure of Gold and Siluer: some in the rude Masse vnwrought, some, in diuers sorts of Coine; and some, in Vessels of sundry kindes, that were the more highly prized by the workemanship. Among these were tenne shields, all of Siluer; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himselfe entred the Citie in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and foureteen Crownes of Gold, bestowed vpon him by diuers Cities. There were also led the beasts for Sacrifice; the Prisoners, and the hostages: among which, Demetrius the sonne of King Philip, and Armenes the sonne of Nabis, were principall. After him followed his Army; and (which added much grace, and good liking, to the shew) the Roman Captiues, by his procurement redeemed from slauerie in Greece.

Not long after this Triumph; He procured audience of the Senate for many Embassages, that were come out of Greece and Asia. They had all very fauourable answers, excepting those of king Antiochus: whom the Senate would not heare, but referred ouer to T. Quintius, and the ten that had bin his Counsailors; because their businesse was said to be somewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embassadors wondred. They said vnto Titus & his Associates, That they could not discern wherein consisted any perplexity of their message. For all Treaties of peace and friendship, were either betweene the Victor and the vanquished; between those, that hauing warred together, were vpon equall termes of aduantage; or betweene those that had liued alwayes in good agreement, without any quarrell. Vnto the Victor, they said, that the vanquished must yeeld; and patiently endure the imposition of some Couenants, that else might seeme vnreasonble. Where Warre had beene made, and no aduantage gotten: there was it vsuall to demand, and make restitution of things and places claimed, gotten, or lost; accordingly as both parts could could agree. But betweene thoſe which had neuer fallen out, there ought no Conditions of eſtabliſhing friendſhip to bee propoſed: ſince it was reaſonable, that each part ſhould hold their owne; and neither carry it ſelfe as ſuperiour vnto the other, in preſcribing ought that might be troubleſome. Now of this laſt kinde, was the league & friendſhip that had beene ſo long in concluſion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being ſo: they held it ſtrange, that the Romans ſhould thus inſiſt on points no way concerning them, and take vpon them to preſcribe vnto the King, what Cities of Aſia hee ſhould ſet at libertie; from what Cities they would giue him leaue to exact his wonted Tributes; either putting, or not putting, his Garriſons into them, as the Senate ſhould thinke fit. Hereto Quintius anſwered, that ſince they went ſo diſtinctly to worke, Hee would alſo doe the like. Wherefore he propounded vnto them two Conditions, and gaue them their choyce whether to accept: Eyther that it ſhould be lawfull for the Romans, to take part in Aſia with any that would ſeeke their friendſhip; Or if King Antiochus miſliked this, and would haue them forbeare to meddle in Aſia, that then he ſhould abandon whatſoeuer he had gotten in Europe. This was plaine dealing, but no reaſonable nor pertinent anſwer, to that which the Kings Embaſſadours had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abſtaine from Aſia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately wonne in Europe: then did not the affaires of Smyrna, Lampſacus, or any other Aſiatiques, whom they were pleaſed to reckon as their Confederates, binde them in honour to make warre with a King that ſought their loue, and had neuer done them iniury: But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great ſhame be ſo baſe, as to deliuer vp vnto them the Citie of Lyſimachia, whereon of late he had beene at ſo much coſt; in building it vp euen from the foundation, and repeopling it with Inhabitants, that had all beene diſperſed, or captiue to the Barbarians. And ſo much the Embaſſadors with great indignation alledged: ſaying, That Antiochus deſired friendſhip of the Romans; but ſo, as it might ſtand with his honour. Now in point of honour, the Romans tooke vpon them as if their cauſe were farre the ſuperiour. For it was, they ſaid, their purpoſe, to ſet at liberty thoſe Towns, which the King would oppreſſe and hold in ſubiection: eſpecially ſince thoſe Townes were of Greekiſh bloud and language; and fell in that regard vnder the patronage, which Rome had affoorded vnto all Greece beſides. By this colour they might ſoon haue left Antiochus king of not many ſubiects on the hither ſide of Euphrates. Neither did they forbeare to ſay, That, vnleſſe hee would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not onely to protect thoſe which relied vpon them in Aſia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might bee vnderſtood) with ſuch as were his ſubiects. Wherefore they vrged his Embaſſadours to come to a point, and tell them plainely which of theſe two Conditions their King would accept. For lacke of a pleaſing anſwer, which the Embaſſadours could not hereto make; little wanted of giuing preſently defiance to the King. But they ſuffered themſelues to be entreated, and were contented once againe to ſend ouer P. Villius, and others that had bin already with the King at Lyſimachia; by whom they might receiue a finall anſwer, whether theſe demands made by Quintius and his Aſſociates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this reſpite of time, and the fruitleſſe Treaties enſuing, Antiochus got the leiſure of two yeeres, or thereabouts, to prepare for warre; finding in the Romans all that while, no diſpoſition to let him liue in peace.

§. V.

Of the long Warres which the Romans had with the Gaules, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Porcius Cato. Iniuries done by Maſaniſſa to the Carthaginians, that ſue to the Romans for iuſtice in vaine.

THe Inſubrians, Bojians, & other of the Ciſalpine Gauls, together with the Ligurians; made often, and (in a manner) continuall warre vpon the Romans in Italy, euen from ſuch time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, vntill ſuch time as they themſelues were vtterly ſubdued: which was not, before the Romans were almoſt at the very height of their Empire. Theſe Nations, hauing ſerued vnder Mago for wages, and afterwards hauing gotten Amilcar a Carthaginian, to bee Leader vnto them all, as hath beene already ſhewed; by this their fellowſhip in Armes, grew to bee such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldome afterwards either the Gaules or Ligurians did stir alone, but that their companions, hearing it, were ready to second them. How the Romans first prevailed, and got large possessions in Gallia Cisalpina, now called Lumbardie; it hath bin long since rehearsed between the first and second Punick Wars. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Countrie, by meanes of Hannibal his passage there-through. Neither is it likely that the re-conquest would haue beene more difficult or tedious vnto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed vnto this warre, had not been distracted by the Ligurians; that alwayes made them to proceed warily, hauing an eye to the danger at their backes. The Ligurians were a stout nation, light and swift of bodie, well practised in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any ouerthrow, but forthwith ready to fight againe. Their Countrie was mountainous, rough, wooddie, and full of straight and dangerous passages. Few good Townes they had; but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neither bee taken nor besieged. They were also very poore; and had little or nothing that might giue contentment, vnto a victorious Armie that should spoyle their Land. In these respects, they serued excellently well, to traine vp the Roman Souldiers to hardnesse & military patience: teaching them (besides other exercises of warre) to endure much, and liue contented with a little. Their quarrell to Rome, grew partly from their loue vnto the Gauls, their neighbours and companions; partly from their delight in robbing & spoyling the Territorie of their borderers, that were subiect vnto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the Warre which they had begun, seemes to haue bin grounded vpon the Condition of all Saluages; To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Iudgement: and to acknowledge no such vertue in Leagues, or formall conclusions of Peace, as ought to hinder them from vsing their aduantage, or taking reuenge of iniuries when they returne to minde. This qualitie is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Warres betweene them and any of their neighbours, doe vse commonly this answer, It hath still beene the custome for vs and them, to fight one against the other.

Ch. 2. §. 8. of this booke.

Diuers ouerthrowes, though none that were great, these Ligurians gaue vnto the Romans: but many more, and greater, they receiued. Often they sought peace, when they found themselues in distresse; and brake it againe as often, when they thought it profitable so to doe. The best was, that as their Countrie was a good place of exercise vnto the Romans, so out of their own Countrie they did little harme: not sending any great Armies farre from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make warre, saue on their owne ground.

The Countrey of Spaine, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italy that became subiect vnto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Prouinces, which was wholly & throughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers vnto an Oxe-hide: & the Romans found in it the property of that Oxe-hide, which Calanus the Indian shewed vnto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For, treading vpon any side of it, the further parts would rise from the ground. And thus was it with Spaine. Seldome did it happen, that those parts from which the Roman Armies lay furthest, were not vp in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hardie Nation, and easily stirred vp to armes; but had not much knowledge in the Art of warre, nor any good Captaines. They wanted also (which was their principall hinderance) good intelligence among themselues: and being diuided into many small Signiories, that had little other communion than of language, they seldome or neuer prouided in generall for the common good of their Countrie; but made it their chiefe care, each of them to looke vnto their owne Territorie. Such priuate respects made them often to fall asunder, when many had vnited themselues together, for chasing out of the Romans. And these were the causes of their often ouerthrowes: as desire of liberty, rather than complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cause of their often taking armes.

The Carthaginians had beene accustomed, to make euacuation of this Cholericke Spanish humour; by employing as Mercenaries in their warres abroad, those that were most likely to be vnquiet at home. They had also taken Souldiers from one part of the Countrey, and vsed them in another: finding meanes to pay them all, out of the profits which which they raiſed vpon the whole Countrie; as being far better husbands, and of more dexteritie than were the Romans, in that kinde. But contrariwiſe the Romans, vſing the ſeruice of their owne Legions, and of their ſure friends the Latines, had little buſineſſe for the Spaniards; and therefore were faine to haue much buſineſſe with them. Spaine was too far diſtant, and withal too great, for them to ſend ouer Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the courſe that they tooke in Italy. Wherefore it remained, that they ſhould alwaies maintaine ſuch Armies in the Countrie, as might ſerue to hold it in obedience perforce; and ſuch heedfull Captaines, as might be ſtill ready to oppoſe the Barbarians in their firſt Commotion. This they did: and thereby held the Countrie; though ſeldome in peace.

Very ſoone after the departure of Scipio, there was raiſed warre in Spaine againſt the Romans, euen vpon the ſame generall ground, that was the foundation of all the Spaniſh Warres following. It was thought vnreaſonable, that the Spaniards ſhould one while helpe the Carthaginians againſt the Romans, and another while the Romans againſt the Carthaginians; baſely forgetting to help themſelues againſt thoſe that were ſtrangers, yet vſurped the Dominion ouer them. But the forces which Scipio had left behinde him in that Countrie, being well acquainted with the manner of Warre in thoſe parts, ſuppreſſed this Rebellion by many victories: and, together with ſubiection, brought peace vpon the Countrie; which laſted fiue yeeres. This victory of the Romans, though it happily ended the Warre: yet left it ſtill remaining the cauſe of the Warre; which after fiue yeeres brake out againe. The Spaniards fought a battaile with the Roman Proconſull, whom they ſlew; and had a great Victorie, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happy ſucceſſe of their Warres in Greece, made the Romans thinke it enough to ſend thither two Prætors, and with each of them ſome two Legions. Theſe did ſomewhat: yet not ſo much, but that M. Porcius Cato, who was Conſull the yeere following, and ſent into that Prouince; found at his comming little leſſe to doe, than the reconquering of all Spaine. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one minde: ſome were faithfull to Rome; and ſome were idle beholders of the paines that others tooke. Yet when Cato had wonne a great victorie vpon the chiefeſt of them; they roſe againſt him in many parts of the Countrey, and put him vnto much new trouble. Whileſt he was about to make a iourney againſt thoſe that were as yet vnſubdued: ſome of the lately vanquiſhed, were euen ready to rebell. Hee therefore diſarmed them: which they tooke ſo heauily, that many of them ſlew themſelues for very griefe. Hearing of this; and well vnderſtanding, that ſuch deſperation might worke dangerous effects; Hee called vnto him the principall among them: and commending vnto them peace and quietneſſe, which they neuer had diſturbed but vnto their owne great loſſe, He prayed them to deuiſe what courſe might be taken, for holding them aſſured vnto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would giue counſaile in a matter of this nature. Hauing therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their inuention barren in this kinde of Subiect; Hee gaue expreſſe charge, That vpon a day appointed they ſhould throw downe the walls of all their Townes. Afterwards he carried the Warre about from place to place; and with ſingular induſtry finiſhed it in ſhort time. Neither thought he it any diſgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Army of the Celtiberians, againſt other of their Countrimen: excuſing the indignity, ſuch as it ſeemed, with a ieſt, That if he were vanquiſhed and ſlaine, then ſhould he need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victory, hee could pay them with the Enemies money. Finally, He brought the warre to ſo good end, that in long time after, though Spaine were often troubleſome, yet was it in no danger of being loſt. He increaſed alſo the publike Reuenues in that Prouince, by cauſing ſome Mynes of Iron and Siluer to be wrought, that had before laine vnregarded. Herein hee did benefit the Common-wealth, by a vertue much agreeable to his owne peculiar diſpoſition.

For this M. Cato was not onely very notable in the Art of war, which might well be then termed the Occupation of the Romans; but ſo well furniſhed with all other vſefull qualities, that very little was wanting in him, which might ſeeme requiſite to the accompliſhment of a perfect man. He was very skilfull in the Roman Lawes, a man of great Eloquence, & not vnprofitable in any buſineſſe either priuate or publike. Many bookes he wrote: whereof the principall were, of the Roman antiquities, & of husbandry. In matter of husbandrie he was notable, and thereby most increased his substance; being of meane birth, and the first of his House. Strong of bodie he was, and exceeding temperate: so as he liued in perfect health to very old age. But that which most commended him vnto the better sort of the Romans, was his great syncerities of life, abstinence from bribes, and fashioning himselfe to the ancient laudable Customes of the Citie. Herein hee had merited singular commendations, if the vehemencie of his nature had not caused him to maligne the vertue of that Noble Scipio the African, and some other worthy men; that were no lesse honest than himselfe, though farre lesse riged, and more gallant in behauiour. Otherwise, Hee was a very good Citizen, and one of such temper, that he could fashion himselfe to all occasions; as if he were neuer out of his Element. He loued businesse so well, or rather hated vice so earnestly; that euen vnto the end of his life, He was exercised in defending himselfe, or accusing others. For at the age of fourescore & sixe yeers, He pleaded in his owne defence: and foure yeeres after, he accused Sergius Galba vnto the People. So began the Nobility of Cato his familie; which ended in his great grand-childe M. Cato the Vtican: one, that being of like vertue and feruencie, had all his good purposes dasht, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of such Nobilitie and Greatnesse as this his Ancestor had continually vexed.

The Spanish warres, after Cato his departure out of the Countrie, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many; and the Countrie seldome free from insurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Prætors therefore, of which two euery yeere were sent ouer Commanders into Spaine (that was diuided into Gouernments) did rarely faile of such worke, as might affoord the honour of Triumph. One slew thirteene thousand Spaniards in a battell: another tooke fiftie Townes; and a third enforced many States of the Countrie to sue for Peace. Thus euery one of them, or most of them, did some laudable seruice; and yet so, that commonly there were of men, townes, and people, new that rebelled, in stead of the old that were slaine, taken, or reclaimed. At the causes hereof, I haue already poinred; and therefore thinke it enough to say, That the businesse in Spaine required not the imployment of a Roman Consul, from such time as Cato thence departed, vntill the Numantian Warre broke out, which was very long after.

In all other Countries to the West of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but so had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine House promised all felicitie which Rome could grant, vnto themselues & their obedient Citie: Masanissa fell to disputing with the sword, about the title to the best part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitfull Region about the lesser Syrtis: wherein among other Cities was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent vnto Carthage for Tribute. This Countrie the Numidian challenged; & by winning some part of it, seemed to better his claime vnto the whole. Hee had a great aduantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any warre, without leaue obtained from their Masters the Romans. They had none other way of redresse, than by sending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And surely they wanted not good matter to alledge, if the Iudges had beene vnpartiall. For besides that Scipio, in limiting out to them their bounds, had left them the possession of this Countrey: Masanissa himselfe, now very lately pursuing a Rebell that fled out of his Kingdome, desired leaue of the Carthaginians, for himselfe to passe through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwise beene questionable) that the Countrey was theirs. This notwithstanding, Masanissa had where-with to iustifie his proceedings, especially vnto the Roman Senate. He gaue the Fathers to vnderstand by his Embassadours, what faithlesse people the Carthaginians were, and how ill-affected to the State of Rome. There had lately been sent vnto them from Hannibal, one that should perswade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined vpon some suspicion of his errand; yet neither arresting him nor his ship, had thereby affoorded him meanes to escape. Hence the Numidian concluded, That certainely it was their purpose to rebell; and therefore good policie to keepe them downe.

As for the Countrie of Emporia: it had alwayes, he said, beene theirs that were able to hold it by strong hand: and so belonged sometime vnto the Numidian kings; though now of late it was in possession of the Carthaginians. But if truth were knowne, the Citizens of Carthage had not any very warrantable title vnto any more ground, than that whereon their Citie ſtood; or ſcarcely to ſo much. For they were no better than ſtrangers in Africk, that had gotten leaue there to build vpon ſo much ground, as they could encompaſſe with an Oxe-hide cut into ſmall thongs. Whatſoeuer they held without ſuch a compaſſe, was purchaſed by fraud, and wrongfull encroachments. This conſidered, Maſaniſſa requeſted of the Senate, That they would not adiudge vnto ſuch vſurpers, the Countrie ſometimes appertaining to the Anceſtors of him their aſſured friend. The Romans hauing heard theſe allegations on both ſides, found the matter ſo doubtfull, that they could not on the ſudden tell what to determine. Wherefore becauſe they would doe nothing raſhly; they ſent ouer three Embaſſadours, of whom P. Scipio the African was one and the chiefe, to decide the controuerſie: yet ſecretly giuing them inſtructions, to leaue all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embaſſadours followed their directions, and left all doubtfull. So was it likely, that Maſaniſſa with a ſtrong Armie ſhould quickly preuaile, againſt thoſe that could no more than talke of their right, and exclaime againſt the wrong. By ſuch Arts were the Carthaginians held, not onely from ſtirring in fauour of King Antiochus, if they had thereto any diſpoſition; but were prepared by little and little vnto their finall deſtruction: that came vpon them, when the Romans had leiſure to expreſſe the vtmoſt of their hatred.

§. VI.

The Ætolians labour to prouoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, to warre vpon the Romans by whom they hold themſelues wronged and diſgraced. Nabis beſieged Gytheum, and waſteth ſome part of Achaa. The exact skill of Philopœmen, in aduantage of ground: whereby hee vtterly vanquiſheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied Peace by the Romans, ioynes with the Ætolians. The Ætolians ſurprize Demetrius; and by killing Nabis, their Confederate, ſeize vpon Sparta. But they are driuen out by the Citizens: who at Philopœmen his perſwaſions annexe themſelues to the Achæans.

ALL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieued much the Ætolians to thinke, that they who had promiſed vnto themſelues the whole ſpoyle of Philip, and the higheſt reputation among the Greeks; were not onely diſappointed of their couetous hopes, but quite forſaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the moſt vnregarded. Yet was there made a great acceſſe to their Eſtate; by adding much vnto them, of that which had beene taken from the Macedonian. This might well haue ſufficed them, if their deſires had not beene immoderate; and their indignation more vehement, than their deſire. But they were not ſo pleaſed with that which they had, ſince they thought it no more than part of their due; as they were vexed with the deniall of that which they claimed, and with finding themſelues to be wholly diſeſteemed; wherein they thought that they had vnſufferable wrong. Wherefore they deuiſed, in a Parliament which they ſhortly held, by what meanes they beſt might right themſelues; and giue the Romans a ſorrowful knowledge of the difference, betweene their enmity and friendſhip. To this purpoſe they ſoone agreed, as concurring all in one affection; That they would not onely perſwade Antiochus to make warr vpon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refuſed Peace; but that they would deale with the King of Macedon their ancient enemie, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, to ioyne altogether in a new Confederacy: whoſe ioynt forces could not in all likelihood, but far ſurmount thoſe of the Romans, Achæans Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterpriſe, which the Ætolians tooke in hand; and well beſeeming them, for they were great darers. They ſent Embaſſadours to all theſe Kings, with perſwaſions, as they thought moſt forcible. But Philip was irreſolute, and Antiochus willing to try firſt all other courſes. Nabis the Lacedæmonian, who neither (as Philip) had loſt much, nor (as Antiochus) was in feare of any warre; yet ſhewed himſelfe of all other the moſt forward: and not ſtaying ſo much as to ſeeke any good pretence, began immediately to lay ſiege vnto Gytheum, what had beene lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achæans, to whoſe care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the affaires of Peloponneſus, were not ſlow to admoniſh Nabis of his duty: neither would they haue ſtaled long from repreſſing his violence by open VVarre; had not ſome of them thought it wiſedome to aske counsaile of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themselues in a businesse of such importance. Whilest thus they spent time in sending Embassadours, and were aduised by Quintius to let all alone, and to waite for the comming of the Roman forces that would shortly be amongst them: Nabis was bold to giue them iust cause of complaint, by wasting their owne Territorie.

Philopœmen was then Prætor of the Achæans, who had long bin absent in Crete, making warre there for his mindes sake & recreation. Vnto him the Achæans referred themselues, giuing him leaue to order the warre at his pleasure; either staying till the Romans came, or doing otherwise, as he should thinke best. He made all haste to relieue Gytheum by Sea; fearing lest the Towne, and the Achæan Garrison within it, should be lost, if he vsed any delay. But Philopœmen was so bad a Sea-man, that hee knew not a strong Ship from a rotten. Hee made a Quadrireme Gallie his Admirall, that had fourescore yeeres agoe beene counted a gallant vessell, in the Nauie of Antigonus Gonatas. Neither was the rest of his Fleet so good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedæmonian. Onely it fell out well, that he committed himselfe to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with their wings, than with her tallons. For his Admirall Gallie was stemmed at the first; and being rotten with age, sprang so many leakes, and tooke in water so fast, that she was faine to yeeld without further resistance. When the rest of the Fleete saw what was become of their Admirall, all were presently discouraged, and saued themselues with what speed they could. But Philopœmen was not herewith danted. If hee had failed in Sea-seruice, which was none of his Occupation, He said, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Armie from the siege of Gyttheum, to stop the Achæans if they should inuade the Countrie. But vpon these which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopœmen came vnexpected; fired their Camp, and put all, saue a very few of them, to the sword. Then marched hee with all his Army towards Lacedæmon: within ten mile whereof he was, when the Tyrant met him that had already taken Gyttheum. It was not expected that Nabis would haue beene ready for them so soon. Or if he should come from Gyttheum, with any part of his forces: yet was it thought that hee must ouertake them, and charge them in the Rere. They marched therefore almost securely, in a long Troupe reaching some fiue miles; hauing their Horse, and the greatest part of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to beare off any sudden impression. But Nabis, who formerly vnderstood, or at least suspected, what course they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Armie; encamped there where they meant to haue lodged. It was the custome of Philopœmen, when he walked or trauelled abroad with his friends, to marke the situation of the Countrie about him; and to discourse, what might befall an Armie marching the same. He would suppose, That hauing with him there such a number of Souldiers, ordered and sorted in such manner, and marching towards such a place; he were vpon that ground encountred by a greater Armie, or better prepared to the fight. Then would hee put the question, whether it were meet for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a stand? what peece of ground it were meet for him to seize vpon? and in what manner he might best doe it? in what sort he should order his men? where bestow his Carriages, and vnder what Guard? in what sort encampe himselfe? and which way march the day following? By such continuall meditation, Hee was growne so perfect, that hee did neuer meet with any difficultie, whence hee could not explicate himselfe and his followers. At this time hee made a stand: and hauing drawne vp his Rere, Hee encamped neere vnto the place where hee was; within halfe a mile of the Enemie. His baggage, with all thereto belonging, he bestowed on a Rocke; encompassing them round with his Souldiours. The ground was rough, the wayes bad, and the day almost quite spent; so as Nabis could not at the present greatly molest him. Both Armies were to water at one Brooke; whereto the Achæans lay the neerer. This watering therefore was like to minister the first occasion of skirmish. Philopœmen vnderstood this; and layd an ambush in place conuenient; whereinto the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were slaughtered in great numbers. Presently after this, hee caused one of his owne Auxiliaries to goe to the Tyrant, as a fugitiue, and tell him, that the Achæans had a purpose to get betweene him and Lacedæmon, whereby they would both debarre his returne into the Citie, and withall encourage the people to take Armes for the recouerie of their freedome. The Tyrant hearing this, marched hastily away; and left his Campe, which hardly otherwise would haue beene forced.

Some

Some Companies he made to ſtay behinde, and ſhew themſelues vpon the Rampart; thereby to conceale his departure. But Philopœmen was not ſo to be beguiled. Hee eaſily wonne the Campe, and gaue chaſe to Nabis: whoſe followers being ouertaken, had no courage to turne about and make head. The enemies being thus diſperſed, and fled into Woods, where they lay in couert all that day; Philopœmen conceiued aright, that their feare and neceſſitie would teach them to creepe homewards, and ſaue themſelues, when it grew darke. Wherefore in the Euening, when hee had gathered together all thoſe of his Light-armature, which had followed the chaſe whileſt it was day, He led forth the reſt that had well refreſhed themſelues, & occupied the two moſt ordinary paſſages vnto Lacedæmon. So Nabis his men, when it was darke night, perceiuing in Philopœmens Campe great ſtore of lights; thought that all had beene at reſt: and therefore aduentured to make an eſcape home. But they were ſo way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirty dayes together after this, did Philopœmen waſt the Countrey round about, whileſt Nabis durſt not iſſue forth of his Towne; and then returned home, leauing the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embaſſadors were then in Greece, & T. Quintius among them, labouring to make their partie ſtrong againſt Antiochus & Nabis, whom they knew to bee ſollicited by the Ætolians. Very faire countenance they alſo made vnto Philip; and with comfortable promiſes drew him to make ſhew, whatſoeuer hee thought, of good correſpondence. They promiſed to reſtore vnto him his ſonne: and were contented to let him hope, that he ſhould receiue other fauours at their hands; and regaine poſſeſſions of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for warre againſt Antiochus in Greece, whileſt their Embaſſadors that were with him in Aſia, denyed otherwiſe to grant him Peace, than if he would yeelde vnto one of the Conditions, by them ſo often propounded. The long abſence of this King in Syria, where he had accompliſhed the marriage betweene Ptolomie and his daughter; together with the death of yong Antiochus the kings ſonne, which happened during the Treatie, and hindered, or ſeemed to hinder the King, from giuing audience in perſon to the Embaſſadours; cauſed them to returne home to Rome; as vncertaine of their anſwer as at their ſetting forth. One thing that might haue beene, and partly was, beneficiall vnto them, they brought to paſſe during their abode at Epheſus; either by cunning, or (as Liuie rather thinkes) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they diſcourſed often with him, and blamed him for hauing thus fled vnto Antiochus, vpon a cauſeleſſe ſuſpition wherin he held the Romans; that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harme. Many haue affirmed that P. Scipio was one of theſe Embaſſadors; and that he, among other diſcourſes with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captaines that had lined, Hannibal iudged the moſt worthy? So Hannibal gaue to Alexander of Macedon the firſt place: to Pyrrhus the ſecond: and the third he challenged vnto himſelfe. But Scipio who thought his owne title better, than that it ought to be ſo forgotten: asked yet further, What wouldeſt thou haue ſaid then, Hannibal, if thou hadſt vanquiſhed me? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I haue giuen the firſt place to Alexander, but haue claimed it as due vnto my ſelfe. Now whether this were ſo, or otherwiſe: the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embaſſadors, made him ſuſpected of Antiochus; who therefore did forbeare a while to vſe his counſell. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceiued this change in the King: and plainly deſiring him to tell the cauſe thereof, heard what it was; He eaſily recouered his former grace, and credit. For hee told how his Father had cauſed him to ſweare at the Altars, when he was a little boy, That he neuer ſhould be friend vnto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the king not to regard any vaine ſurmiſes: but to know thus much, That ſo long as he thought vpon warre with Rome, ſo long would Hannibal doe him all good ſeruice: whereas contrariwiſe if he intended to make peace, then ſhould it behooue him to vſe the counſaile of ſome other man.

The Ætolians, and their friends, were no leſſe buſie all this while, in making their partie ſtrong againſt the Romans, than were the Romans, in muſtering vp their friends in Greece. They had ſo often dealt with Antiochus, vanting much of their owne forces, and arrogating to themſelues the honour of the victory againſt Philip; that finally they preuailed with him; eſpecially when the Roman Embaſſadors had left him without hope of peace, vnles he would buy it at a deare rate. They dealt in like ſort with the Macedonian.

But

But in vaine. He vnderstood the Romans, and himselfe, too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improue their own forces to the vttermost: as knowing, that all the burthen must lie vpon Antiochus and themselues, without helpe from any; saue onely from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilest they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the king Antiochus that animated them to resolution: the Athenian Embassadors, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemencie a little; by exhorting them, not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay neere at hand. For want of a ready answer hereto, they were contented to approue the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the businesse worthy of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himselfe against the Romans: it would be no smal piece of seruice, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the aduenture. Wherefore he came to their Panætolium, or great Assembly of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might serue to appease them. He willed them to consider the weight of the enterprise which they took in hand; wherby Greece was like to become a Champaigne-field, on which, to the ruine of the Country, the Romans, and king Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Masterie: the Ætolians, as Masters in that kind of Fence, setting them on, and becomming * the Sticklers. As for those grieuances which did thus exasperate them, and vrge them to such violent courses, Hee willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might doe to send Embassadours to Rome, that should either pleade their right in the Senate, or (if their right vnto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to haue what they desired: than thus to set the world in an vprore, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he said, or could say, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassador of the king, whose helpe they had sought, waite so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it newes vnto them to heare those comfortable words, That, by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtain what they desired; either as their right, or else by way of fauour. For with such Termes had they been feasted once already: and were by the Senate reiected vnto Titus: who, hauing it in his owne power, gaue them no satisfaction; yet would now againe referre them to the Senate. This were onely losse of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherfore without more adoe they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should bee entreated to come ouer into Greece, as wel to set the cóuntry at libertie, as also to decide the controuersies depending between the Romans and Ætolians. Such a Decree they would not haue made, had they not vnderstood the kings minde before. Hauing made it, they forgot no point of brauery, whereby to vaunt themselues to the Kings Embassadours, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prætor, to let him see a Copie of this new Decree. The Prætor answered, That then he had other things to doe: but that this Decree, and their further answer, they would shortly let him know, if hee came to their campe in Italy vpon the riuer of Tibris. Gentler words would haue done better, as the Aetolians are like to vnderstand hereafter. But hauing thus begun, they meant henceforth to goe roundly to worke. The care of the warre they referred vnto the more priuate Councel of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authority of a generall Assembly. The Apocleti (so were the Priuie Councell of Aetolia called) went as hotly to worke as any of the yongest heads could haue done. They laid a plot, how to get into their hands at one time the Townes of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they tooke vpon the sudden; entring, some of them as friends to conduct home a principall man of the Citie: who for speaking words against T. Quintius, had beene driuen to flee thence, but was, by intercession of those that loued him, againe recalled. His Aetolian companions, that were not many, seized vpon a Gate; whereat they let in a Troupe which they had left not far behind them; and so fell to murdering the chiefe of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so strong, that their purpose was discouered, and the Town prepared to defend it selfe against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this hostilitie, they gaue a gentle answer, saying, That they came not thither as enemies, but onely to deliuer the Towne from the Romans; who more insolently dominered ouer it, than euer the Macedonians had done. By which Rhetoricke they preuailed no more, than they could doe by plaine force.

force. For the Towneſ-men replied, That they neither found any abridgement of their libertie, nor needed any Garriſon to keep them from the Romans, from whom they neither feared any danger, nor receiued iniurie. So this buſineſſe was daſht. The attempt vpon Sparta was more ſtrange and deſperate. Nabis their good friend, was Lord of the Towne; ſtyling himſelfe King: but, more truely by all men called Tyrant. He had welneere loſt all, by means of the ouerthrow which Philopœmen had lately giuen him: ſince, he durſt not ſtirre abroad; and daily expected the miſchiefe, that on all ſides threatned him. Wherefore hee ſent meſſengers, one after another, to the Ætolians; requeſting them, That as He had not beene ſlow to ſtirre in their behalfe, but aduentured himſelfe vpon the vtmoſt of danger, when all others were backward; ſo they would be pleaſed to ſend him what helpe they might, ſince his bad fortune had cauſed him preſently to neede it. It hath beene often ſaid, That the rauenous Ætolians were onely true to themſelues, and regarded neither faith nor friendſhip otherwiſe than as it might conduce to their owne ends. And ſo dealt they now. For ſince Nabis his mercenarie forces, which vpheld his Tyranny, were in a manner conſumed: they thought it expedient for their Eſtate, to put him out of the way; &, by ſo doing, to aſſure Lacedæmon vnto themſelues. To this purpoſe, they ſent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for ſuch a worke. To him they gaue a thouſand Foot, and thirtie Horſe, choſen for the purpoſe. Theſe thirtie were by Democritus the Prætor brought into the Councell of the Apocleti, where they were commanded to be no wiſer than they ſhould be, nor to thinke that they were ſent to make warre with the Achæans, or to doe ought elſe, ſaue onely what Alexamenus ſhould command them; which were it neuer ſo deſperate, and in ſeeming againſt all reaſon; yet muſt they vnderſtand, that vnleſſe they performed it, they ſhould haue no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom hee encouraged with braue words: telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to couer all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to finde other manner of worke, than of late with Philip: ſince the Elephants of this great king, without other helpe, would ſuffice to tread them downe. As for the Ætolians, He ſaid, that if need ſhould ſo require, they would preſently ſend away to Lacedæmon all the forces that they could raiſe: But that they were very deſirous at the preſent, to make as goodly a muſter as they could before the great king; which cauſed them to ſend him thither afore with no greater company. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his men, that had bin long pent vp in the Citie; and traine them without the wals: as if ſhortly he ſhould employ them in worke of conqueſt, rather than defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exerciſed his men in the field; riding vp and downe with this Alexamenus, and no more than three or foure horſe about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exerciſe, Alexamenus made it his faſhion to ſtep aſide alone to his Ætolians, and ſay ſomewhat as he thought fit: which done, he ſtill returned againe to Nabis. But when he ſaw time for the great worke that he had in hand: He then went aſide to his thirty horſemen, and bade them remember the taske enioyned them at their ſetting foorth; telling them that they were all in caſe of baniſhed men, vnleſſe they would anone come vp to him, and helpe him to finiſh that which they ſhould ſee him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant beganne to draw neere them: and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the ſudden, and ſtrucke him downe. The thirtie Ætolians neuer ſtood to deliberate vpon the matter: but all flew in; and, before any ſuccour could arriue, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Preſently vpon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercenaries ranne vnto the dead body: where in ſtead of ſeeking reuenge, they ſtood fooliſhly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Ætolians haſted into the Citie, and ſeized on the Palace: where he fell to ranſacking the Treaſure; and troubled himſelfe with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his followers as were diſperſed in the Towne, did alſo the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who ſeeing themſelues free by the death of the Tyrant, could not indure to ſee thoſe that had ſlaine him, beginne to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the towne was ſhortly in Armes: and for lacke of another Captaine, they tooke a little Boy of the Royall ſtocke, that had beene brought vp with Nabis his children; whom they mounted vpon a good Horſe, and made him their Chiefe. So they fell vpon the Ætolians that were idley ſtragling about; and put them all to the ſword. Alexamenus with with not many of his Company, were slaine in keeping the Citadell: and those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates, who sold them all as bond-slaues. In this doubtfull Estate of things at Lacedæmon, Philopœmen came thither: who calling out the chiefe of the Citie, and speaking such words vnto them, as Alexamenus should haue done after he had slaine the Tyrant; easily perswaded them for their owne good and safety, to incorporate themselues with the Achæans. Thus by the enterprise, no lesse dishonourable than difficult, of the Aetolians, and the small, but effectuall, trauaile of Philopœmen, the Achæans made a notable purchase: and Lacedæmon, that had hitherto bin gouerned either by kings, or by Tyrants that called themselues kings, became the member of a Common-wealth, wherof the name had scarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled ouer all Greece.

Antiochus, perswaded by Thoas the Ætolian, comes ouer into Greece, ill attended. Sundry passages betweene him, the Ætolians, Chalcidians and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Ile of Eubœa. The vanitie of the Kings Embassadors and the Ætolians, with the Ciuill answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Achæans. That it concerned the Greekes to haue desired peace, betweene the Romans and Antiochus; as the best assurance of their owne libertie. Of many petty Estates that fell to the King. Of Aminander; and an idle vanitie, by which King Philip was lost. Hannibal giues good counsaile in vaine. Some Townes wonne in Thessalie. The King retires to Chalcis; where hee marrieth a young Wife, and reuels away the rest of Winter. Vpon the comming of the Roman Consul all forsake Antiochus. He with two thousand Ætolians keepes the Streights of Thermopyla. He is beaten, and flies into Asia: leauing all in Greece vnto the Victors.

ANtiochus was troubled much in Asia with Smyrna and Lampsacus, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leaue them Enemies behinde him; and to winne them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet was hee desirous with all speede conuenient to shew himselfe in Greece; where he had bin told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, That in all the Countrie there was a very small number, which bore heartie affection vnto the Romans: That Nabis was already vp in Armes: That Philip was like a Bandog in a chaine, desiring nothing more than to breake loose; and that the Aetolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could haue done, were ready to conferre vpon him the greatnesse, which they had vnworthily bestowed vpon insolent Barbarians. Of all this the least part was true. Yet that which was true made such a noise as added credit vnto all the rest. Whilest therefore the King was thinking to send Hannibal into Africke, there to molest the Romans, & so giue him the better leisure of vsing his owne opportunities in Greece: Thoas the Aetolian came ouer to him, & bad him lay all other care aside; for that his Country-men had already taken Demetrias; a Towne of maine importance, that should giue him entertainment, whence he might proceede as became the greatnesse of his vertue and fortune. This did serue to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal: Thoas was bold to tell the king, first, That it was not expedient for him to diuide his forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serue to lay open vnto him all places, without neede of vsing violence: and secondly, That in any such great enterprise there could not be chosen a more vnfit man to be imployed in the kings seruice, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said, That the king should as greatly feele the losse of a Fleet or Armie, perishing vnder such a notable Commander if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried vnder one of meaner qualitie: whereas neuertheless if Hannibal preuailed, Hannibal alone should haue all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion, That such a renowned Warriour should be alwayes neere vnto the kings person, to giue aduice: which being followed as often as it was found commodious, the good successe would wholly redound vnto the honour of him that had the soueraigne Command; euen of the King himselfe. Antiochus gladly hearkened vnto this admonition; being iealous of the vertue, that shined brighter than the Maiestie of his owne fortune. And thereupon he laid aside the determination, which tended more to the aduancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought vpon.

Presently

Presently after this He made ready for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a friuolous pompe of ceremony, he went vp from the Sea-side to Ilium, there to doe sacrifice to Minerua of Troy. Thence passing ouer the Ægean Sea, He came to Demetrias. Eurylochus the Magnetian, the same whom the Ætolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext they won Demetrias; was now the chiefe man & Ruler of his Nation. He therefore with his Countreymen, in great frequencie, came to doe their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this: and tooke it as a signe of good lucke, to be so entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, that the Magnetians found not the like cause of ioy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Armie somewhat like to that of Xerxes: they saw three hundred ships; of which, no more than fortie were seruiceable for the Warres; with an Armie of ten thousand Foot, fiue hundred Horse, and six Elephants. The Ætolians no sooner heard of his comming, than they called a Parliament; & made a Decree, whereby they inuited him into their Countrie. He knew before that they would so doe; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met him that brought the Decree. At his comming to Lamia, the Ætolians gaue him as ioyfull entertainment as they could deuise. Being brought into their Councell, He made an Oration: wherein he desired them to hold him excused, that he came not followed with a greater Armie. This was, he said, in true estimation a signe of his good will: in that he staid not to make all things ready, but hasted vnto their aide, euen whilest the season was vnfit for nauigation. Yet it should not be long, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be satisfied vnto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-coast with his Fleets. Neither would he spare for any charge, trauaile, or danger, to follow the businesse which he had vndertaken: euen to driue the Romans and their authoritie out of Greece; leauing the Country free indeede, and the Aetolians therein the chiefe. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be very great: so was it his meaning, that all prouisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because hee would not be any way burdensome vnto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs entreat them, hauing thus hastily come ouer vnto their aide, vnprouided of many necessaries: that they would helpe him with Corne and other victuals, whereof he stood in neede. So he left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little dispute, (for a vaine motion was made by some, that the differences betweene the Romans and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) That they would yeelde vnto the Kings desire, and assist him with all their forces. Here we may obserue, how vaine a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himselfe, as did Antiochus, in a businesse of dangerous importance, vpon the promised assurance of a State that is meerely popular. For if the vehemencie of Thoas, and some other of that Faction, had not preuailed in this Councell: the Aetolians, for gaine of two or three Townes, yea for hope of such gaine that might haue deceiued them; were like to haue abandoned this King their friend, vnto the discretion of the Romans. And what remedy had there beene, if this had so fallen out? He could haue bemoaned himselfe to Thoas, and complained of the wrong: but he must haue beene contented with this answer, That the fault was in those of the opposite side; whom Thoas would therefore haue pronounced to be very wicked men. It happened much better for the present; though in the future it proued much worse, both for him, and for the Aetolians. He was chosen Generall of all their forces: and thirtie Commissioners were appointed to be about him, as a Councell of Warre for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilest it was in dispute where they should beginne the Warre. Chalcis was thought the meetest place to be first vndertaken: whither if they came suddenly, they should not peraduenture neede to vse much force. The King had brought with him into Aetolia but a thousand Foot; leauing the rest behinde him at Demetrias. With these he hasted away directly toward Chalcis; being ouertaken by no great number of the Aetolians, which accompanied him thither. At his comming, the Magistrates, and some of the chiefe Citizens, issued forth to parle with him. There the Aetolians beganne, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had onely in words and false semblance, set Greece at libertie. But such libertie, as might be true and vsefull, they said, would neuer be obtained, vntill by remouing the necessitie of obeying their pleasure that were most mightie, euery seuerall Estate had where to finde redresse of any pressure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well well able to counterpoise, yea to ouerweigh the Romans: who neuertheleſſe deſired them onely, ſo to ioyne with him in League, as that if either the Romans and Hee ſhould offer them wrong, they might keepe it in their power, to ſeeke redreſſe at the others hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the ſame anſwer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedome was not imaginarie, but abſolute, for which they were to thanke the Romans; without whoſe good liking, they would enter into no new confederacie. That which they ſpake of themſelues, they could likewiſe affirme of all the Greekes: foraſmuch as none of them payed any Tribute; was kept vnder, by any Garriſon; or liued otherwiſe than by their owne Lawes, and without being tied vnto conditions which diſpleaſed them. Wherefore they wondred, why the King ſhould thus trouble himſelfe, to deliuer Cities that were already free. But ſince hee, and the Ætolians, requeſted their friendſhip: they beſought both him, and the Ætolians, to doe a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leauing them in ſuch good caſe as they were. With this anſwere the King departed: for he was not, as then, ſtrong enough to force them. But very ſoone after, he brought thither a greater power; which terrified them, and made them yeelde: before all the ſuccours could arriue, which Titus had ſent for their defence.

The chiefe Citie of Eubœa being thus gotten; all the reſt of the Iland ſhortly yeelded to Antiochus. Foure or fiue hundred Roman Souldiers, that came ouer-late to haue defended Chalcis, repoſed themſelues at Delium, a little town of Bœotia, lying ouer againſt the Iland; where was a Temple and Groue, conſecrated vnto Apollo, that had the priuiledge of an inuiolable Sanctuary. In this place were ſome of them walking, and beholding the things there to be ſeene, whileſt others were buſied as they found cauſe: without feare of any danger; as being in ſuch a place, and no warre hitherto proclaimed. But Menippus, one of Antiochus his Captains, that had wearied himſelfe in many vaine Treaties of peace, tooke aduantage of their careleſneſſe, and vſed them with all extremitie of warre. Very few of them eſcaped: fiftie were taken; and the reſt ſlaine. Hereat Quintius was grieued: yet ſo, as it pleaſed him well to conſider, that his Romans had now more iuſt cauſe than before, to make warre vpon the King.

Antiochus liked wel theſe beginnings, and ſent Embaſſadors into all quarters of Greece; in hope, that his reputation ſhould perſwade very many to take his part. The wiſer ſort returned ſuch anſwere, as the Calcidians had done. Some reſerued themſelues vntill he ſhould come among them: knowing that either, if he came not, He muſt hold them excuſed for not daring to ſtirre; or, if he came, the Romans muſt pardon their iuſt feare, in yeelding to the ſtronger. None of thoſe that lay farre off, ioyned with him in true meaning; ſaue the Eleans, that alwayes fauoured the Ætolians, and now feared the Achæans. Little reaſon there was, that he ſhould thinke to draw the Achæans to his partie. Neuertheleſſe he aſſayed them, vpon auaine hope that the enuie, which Titus was ſaid to beare vnto Philopœmens vertue, had bred a ſecret diſlike betweene that Nation & the Romans. Wherefore both Hee and the Ætolians ſent Embaſſadours to the Councell at Ægium; that ſpared not braue words, if the Achæans would haue beene ſo taken. The Kings Embaſſadour told of great Armies & Fleets that were comming; reckoning vp the Dahans, Medians, Elimæans & Caducians; names that were not euery day heard of, and therefore as he thought, the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydonians, Tyrians, Arabians, and Pamphilians were; ſuch indeede as could not be reſiſted. Now concerning money and all warlike furniture: it was, he ſaid, well knowne, that the Kingdomes of Aſia had alwayes thereof great plenty. So as they were much deceiued: who conſidering the late warre made againſt Philip, did thinke that this with Antiochus would proue the like: the caſe was too farre different. Yet this moſt powerfull King, that for the liberty of Greece was come from the vtmoſt parts of the Eaſt; requeſted no more of the Achæans, than that they would hold themſelues as neutrall, and quietly looke on, whileſt He tooke order with the Romans. To the ſame effect ſpake the Ætolian Embaſſador, & further added, that in the battell at Cynoſcephale, neither Titus had done the part of a Generall, nor the Romans of good Souldiers: but that both He & his Armie had beene there deſtroyed, had they not beene protected by vertue of the Ætolians, which carried the day. Titus was preſent at the Councell, and heard all this: to which he made as fit anſwere, as could haue beene deſired. He told the Achæans, That neither the Kings Embaſſadour, nor the Ætolian, did ſo greatly labour to perſwade thoſe vnto whom they addreſſed addressed their Orations; as to vaunt themselues the one vnto the other. So as a man might well discerne, what good correspondence in vanitie it was, that had thus lincked the king and the Ætolians together. For euen such bragges as here they made, before the Achæans who knew them to be lyars, had the Ætolians also made vnto king Antiochus, proclaiming the victory ouer Philip to be meerely their Act: and the whole Country of Greece to be dependant on them. Interchangeably had they beene feasted by the King, with such tales as his Embassadour told euen now, of Dahans, and Aradians, & Elimæans, and a many others: that were all but a company of Syrians, such as were wont to be sold about for bondslaues, and good for little else. These diuers names of rascall people were, he said, like to the diuersitie of Venison, wherwith a friend of his at Chalcis (no such vanter as were these Embassadors) had sometime feasted him. For all that varietie, whereat he wondred, was none other, as his Host then merrily told him, than so many pieces of one tame swine, drest after seuerall fashions with varietie of sawces. Setting therefore aside this vanity of idle pompe: it were good to make iudgement of the great King, by his present doings. He had, notwithstanding all this great noyse, no more than tenne thousand men about him: for which little Armie hee was faine in a manner, to begge victuals of the Ætolians; and take vp money at vsurie, to defray his charges. And thus he ranne vp and downe the Country; from Demetrias to Lamia, thence backe to Chalcis, and being there shut out, to Demetrias againe. These were the fruits of lyes: wherewith since both Antiochus and the Ætolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilst wiser men tooke heed by their example. To a fauourable Auditory much perswasion is needlesse. The Achæans did not loue so well the Ætolians, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the veriest abiects. Wherefore they stood not to hearken after newes, what Antiochus did, how hee sped in Eubœa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed warre against him, and against the Aetolians.

How the hatred betweene these two Nations grew inueterate; sufficiently appeares in the story foregoing. Now haue they gotten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans; the other, king Antiochus. Herein did each of them vnwisely: though farre the greater blame ought to be laid on the turbulent spirits of the Aetolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Countrie at rest: there was nothing more greatly to haue beene desired, than that they might neuer finde occasion to returne with an Armie thither againe. And in this respect ought the Greekes to haue sought, not how Smyrna and Lampsacus might recouer their liberty (which had neuer been held a matter worth regarding, vntill now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, diuided and kept asunder by their Countrie, as two Seas by an Isthmus or neck of land, might bee kept from ouerflowing the barre that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their seeking to make free those base Asiatiques, which originally were Greekish, than the generall applause, wherwith all the nation entertained this their louing offer. Yet were Lysimachia, and the townes in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of feare, that should moue them to take armes euen in their owne defence. But if all Greece would haue made intercession, and requested that things might continue as they were, promising ioyntly to assist the Romans, with their whole forces both by Land and Sea, whensoeuer King Antiochus should make the least offer to stirre against them: then had not onely this quarrell beene at an end; but the Roman Patronage ouer the Country, had beene farre from growing, as soone after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Achæans were at this time, in a manner, the only Nation of Greece, that freely & generously declared themselues altogether from the Romans, their friends & benefactors. All the rest haue doubtfull answers of hope vnto both sides: or if some few, as did the Thessalians, were firm against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrel, nor shewed themselues his enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Bœotians willingly receiued him, as soone as he entred vpon their borders, not so much for feare of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had bin somewhat hardly vsed. Aminander the Athamanian, besides his old friendship with the Aetolians, was caught with a bait, which it may be doubted, whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and vaunted himselfe to be descended from Alexander the Great: naming his two sonnes, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these brethren, accompanied his sister to the poore Court of Ammander: where hauing made himselfe knowne, by talking of his Pedigree; Hee was iudged by Antiochus and the Aetolians, a man fit for their turnes. They made him beleeue, that in regard of his high parentage, and the famous memory of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to doe them best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoofe: since no man had therto so good title as he. But for the enabling of them hereunto; it behooued him to draw Ammander to their party, that so they might the sooner haue done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by perswasions of himselfe, or of his sister, effected as much as they desired. But the first piece of seruice done by this imaginary king (whether it proceeded from his owne phrenzie, in hope to get loue of the Macedonians that should be his subiects; or whether from some vanity in king Antiochus that imployed him) wrought more harme to his friends, than he and Ammander were able to doe good. There were two thousand men committed to his leading: with which he marched vnto Cynoscephalæ, there to gather vp the bones of the slaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had suffered all this while to lie vnburied. The Macedons troubled not themselues to thinke on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit at all: but king Philip took it in high indignation; as intended meerely vnto his despight. Wherefore he presently sent vnto the Romans; and gaue them to vnderstand, that he was ready with all his power to aid them wherein they should be pleased to vse him.

The Aetolians, Magnetians, Eubœans, Bœotians, & Athamanians, hauing now all ioyned with him; Antiochus tooke counsaile of them about the prosecution of the warre in hand. The chiefe question was, Whether it were meet for him to inuade Thessalie, that would not hearken to his perswasions; or whether to let all alone vntill the Spring: because it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and some another; confirming each his owne sentence, with the weightiest reasons which he could alledge, as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long beene cast aside, as a vessel of no vse; but was now required to deliuer his opinion. Hee freely told the king, That what he should now vtter, was euen the same which he would haue spoken, had his counsaile at any time before been asked since their comming into Greece. For the Magnetians, Bœotians, & other their good friends, which now so willingly took their parts: what were they else than so many poore Estates, that, wanting force of their owne, did adioyne themselues for feare vnto him, that was strongest at the present; and would afterwards, when they saw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrary side, alledging the same feare for their excuse? Wherefore he thought most behouefull, to win King Philip of Macedon vnto their partie; who (besides that being once ingaged, he should not afterwards haue power to recoyle and forsake them at his pleasure) was a mighty Prince; and one that had meanes to sustaine the Roman Warre with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be easily perswaded to ioyne with them; the benefit likely to redound vnto himselfe, by their societie, was a very strong Argument: though indeede what neede was there, of proouing by inference the likelihood of this hope? For, said Hee, These Ætolians here present; and namely, this Thoas, being lately Embassadour from them into Asia, among other Motiues which he then vsed to excite the King vnto this Expedition, insisted mainely on the same point. He told vs that Philip was moued beyond all patience, with the Lordly insolence of the Romans: likening that king to some wilde beast, that was chained or lockt vp within some grate, and would faine breake loose. If this be so: let vs breake his chaine, and pull downe the grate, that he may regaine his libertie, and satisfie his angry stomacke, vpon those that are common Enemies to vs and him. But if it proue otherwise, and that his feare be greater than his indignation: then shall it behoone vs to looke vnto him; that he may not seeke to please his good masters the Romans, by offending vs. Your sonne Seleucus is now at Lysimachia, with part of your Armie: if Philip will not hearken to your Embassage; let Seleucus be in readinesse, to fall vpon Macedon, and finde him worke to defend his owne on the other side, without putting vs here to trouble. Thus much concerning Philip; and the present War in Greece. But more generally for the managing of this great enterprise, wherein now you are embarqued against the Romans, I told you my opinion at the beginning: whereto had you then giuen eare; the Romans by this time should haue heard other newes, than that Chalcis in Eubœa was become ours. Italie and Gaule should haue been on fire with war; and little to their comfort, they should haue vnderstood, that Hannibal was againe come into Italy. Neither doe I see what should hinder vs euen now from taking the same course. Send for all your Fleet and Armie hither (but in any case let Ships of burden come along with them, loaden with store of victuals: For as the case now stands, we haue here too few hands, and too many mouthes.) Wherefore let the one halfe be employed against Italy; whilest you in person with the other halfe, tarrying on this side the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affaires of Greece, and therewithall make countenance, as if you were euen ready to follow vs into Italy: yea, and be ready to follow vs indeed, if it shall be requisite. This is my aduice; who though perhaps I am not very skilfull in all sorts of war; yet how to war with the Romans, I haue been instructed by long experience, both to their cost and mine owne. Of this counsaile which I giue, I promise you my faithfull and diligent seruice for the execution: but what counsaile soeuer you please to follow, I wish it may be prosperous. Many were pleased with the great spirit of the man, and said he had spoken brauely: but of all this was nothing done; saue onely that one was sent into Asia, to make all things ready there. In the meane while they went in hand with Thessaly; about which they had before disputed. There when they had wonne one Towne by force, many other places, doubting their owne strength, were glad to make submission. But Larissa, that was chiefe of the Countrey, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the walls with his whole Armie. This their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Bœbius, a Roman Proprætor, did send helpe thither. Likwise Philip of Macedon professed himselfe Enemy vnto Antiochus; whereby the fame of the succour comming to Larissa, grew such, as wrought more than the succour could haue done, had it arriued. For Antiochus perceiuing many fires on the Mountaines toppes afarre off; thought that a great Armie of Romans and Macedonians had beene comming vpon him. Therefore excusing himselfe by the time of the yeere; He brake vp his siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in loue with a young Maiden, daughter vnto a Citizen of the Towne; whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was betweene them, both in yeeres and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the Winter following, as delightfully as he could, without thinking vpon the war in hand. His great men and Captaines followed his example; and the souldiers as readily imitated their Captains: in such wise that when he tooke the field, he might euidently perceiue in what loose manner of discipline his Armie had passed the Winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Consul, shal meet him very shortly, and helpe him to reclaime them from this looseneſſe of nuptiall Reuels; by setting them to harder exercise.

M. Acilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The war against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwise Hee was no way so honourable, as Nasica his Colleague: vnto whom fell a charge, of far lesse credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobility of his Family, had bin long since, in time of the Punicke Warre, crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate, for very feare and superstition, durst not haue so pronounced him, had they not so thought him; as being commanded by Oracle, That none other man than the very best, should entertaine an old stone, which the Diuell then taught them to call The Mother of the gods. But no prærogatiue of Birth, Vertue, or good Opinion, gaue such aduantage to the better man, as to make choice of his owne Prouince; or arrogate more vnto himselfe, than his lot should affoord him. This vnpartiall distribution of employments, helped well to maintaine peace and concord. P. Scipio therefore was appointed to make warre against the Boijans; wherein hee purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder seruice, requiring the more abilitie in matter of war. But M. Acilius went ouer into Greece, with ten thousand Foot, two thousand Horse, & fifteen Elephants. Ptolomie King of Egypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with king Antiochus; and Philip king of Macedon; had lately sent Embassadours to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into Ætolia, there to assist the Consul in this warre. Ptolomie sent also gold and siluer, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earnest. But he was too young, and dwelt too farre off. So his money was returned vnto him with thankes; and his louing offer as louingly refused. Vnto Philips Embassadours answer was made, that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would thinke themselues beholding to him, for the assistance that Hee should giue to Acilius the Consul. Masanissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did striue, which of them should bee most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantitie of graine; which they would send partly to Rome, partly to the Army in Greece. And herein Masanissa farre out-went the poore city of Carthage; as also, in that he offered to lend the Consul fiue hundred Horse, and twenty Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians vndertooke to set out a Fleet at their own charges: and to bring in at one payment all the Tribute-money, which was behinde, and ought to be discharged by many yeerly pensions. But the Romans did neither think it good, to let them arme a Fleet; nor would let them redeeme themselues out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corne, it was accepted, with Condition, That they should be contented to receiue the price of it.

The hastie and ridiculous issue of this war, that began with such noyse and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great, between the Roman and the Asiatick souldier. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few townes of Acarnania, after the same maner as he had preuailed in other parts of Greece; partly by faire words, and treason of the Rulers; partly by terror, that was like to proue their excuse, when they should againe forsake him. But King Philip and Babius, hauing recouered many places; and the Roman Consul being arriued, against whom none made resistance; He was glad to withdraw himselfe. Aminander fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonian tooke and enioyed; as in recompence of his good seruice to the Romans. Philip, the brother of Aminanders wife, was taken by the Consul; made a mocking stocke, & sent away prisoner to Rome. The Thessalians vsed much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yeelding to the King. All their cities, one after other, gaue vp themselues: the Garrisons of Antiochus, compounding onely for their owne liues, and departing vnarmed: yet so, that a thousand of them stayed behind, and tooke pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplexe Antiochus; who hauing withdrawne himselfe to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cried out vpon his friends: and said, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deale of toyle during one halfe of a Winter, and spent the other halfe in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of need, Hee found all the promises of the Ætolians meerely verball: and himselfe reduced into tearmes of great extremitie. Hee therefore admired Hannibal as a wise man, yea a very Prophet, that had fore-seene all this long before. Neuertheless He sent word to the Ætolians, that they should now make ready all their forces: as considering their own need to be no lesse than his. But the Ætolians had cause to thinke, that they themselues were shamefully disappointed by Antiochus, who hauing promised to doe great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill vp the same ten thousand which he first brought ouer. Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which ioined with him. Hereat the king was angry: and could get no better satisfaction, than that Thoas and his fellowes had done their best, in vaine, to haue made all the Nation take Armes. Since therefore neither his owne men came ouer to him out of Asia, nor his friends of Greece would appeare in this time of danger: Hee seized vpon the Streights of Thermopylæ; as meaning to defend them against the Romans, vntil more helpe should come. Of the Streights of Thermopylæ there hath been spoken enough * before, vpon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Armie of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceiued, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came onwards into Thessalie, were vnable to passe that Ledge of Mountaines, diuiding the one halfe of Greece; vnlesse they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference betweene Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handfull of men, defended this passage two or three daies together, against a World of men comming to inuade the Country. The latter, hauing taken vpon him to doe great miracles, and effect what he listed himselfe in Greece: did commit himself vnto the safetie of this place, when he was charged by not many more than he had in his owne Armie. There whilest he lay, He sent earnest messengers one after another to the Ætolians, intreating them not to forsake him thus; but at least wise now to helpe, and keepe the toppes of the Mountaines, lest the Romans finding any by-path, should come downe vpon him. By this importunity, he got of them two thousand, that vndertook to make good the few passages: by which onely, and not without extreme difficulty, it was possible for the Enemy to ascend. The Roman Consul in like sort, prepared to force the Streights, without staying to expect king Philip: that was hindered by sickenesse from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them beene Consuls. These he sent forth by night with two thousand men, to try whether by any meanes they could get vp to the Ætolians. He himselfe incouraged his Armie not onely by telling them with what base conditioned enemies they had to deale, but what rich kingdomes Antiochus held, that should bountifully reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battaile. All that night Cato had a fore iourney (for what happened vnto L. Valerius it is vncertaine, saue onely that he failed in his intent) and so much the worse, for that he had no skilfull guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tired, with climbing vp steepie Rocks and crooked wayes: He commanded them to repose themselues; whilest Hee, being a very able man of body, tooke in hand the discouery, accompanied with no more than one of like mettle to himselfe. After a great deale of trouble, He found at length a path: which he tooke to be, as indeede it was, the best way leading vnto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the same path till toward break of day. It was a place not hanted, because in time of peace there was a faire way through the Streights below, that required no such trouble of climbing, neither had this entrance of the Thermopylæ bin so often the Seat of War, as might cause any trauailers to search out the passages of those desolate Mountaines. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best: yet did it lead him to a bogge at the end, which would suffer him to passe no further. So he staid there vntill day-light; by which he discouered both the Campe of the Greekes vnderneath him, and some of the Ætolians very neere vnto him, that were keeping watch. He therfore sent forth a lustie Crue of his men, whom he thought fittest for that seruice, and willed them by any meanes to get him some prisoners. This was effected: and hee thereby vnderstood, that these Ætolians were no more than sixe hundred; as also that king Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So hee presently set vpon the Ætolians, ouerthrew them, slew a great part of them, and chased the rest, that by flying into their Campe, guided him vnto it. The fight was already begun betweene the Armies below: and the Romans, that had easily repelled the kings men, and driuen them into their Campe, found it in a manner a desperate piece of worke to assault the Campe it selfe; which occupied the whole bredth of the Streights; was notably fortified, and not only defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kinde of seruice; but by Archers and slingers that were placed ouer them on the Hill-side, and powred down a showre of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approch determined the matter. It was thought at first that the Ætolians had beene comming to helpe the Kings men: but when the Roman armes and ensignes were discouered, such was the terrour, that none made offer of resistance; but all of them forsooke the Campe, and fled. The slaughter was not great: for that the badnesse of the way did hinder the Roman Army from making pursuit. Yet this dayes losse draue Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis, and from thence with the first opportunitie, got him backe into Asia.

All the Cities that had imbraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertaine the Romans, and intreat for pardon: setting open their gates; and presenting themselues vnto the Consul, in manner of suppliants. Briefly, in few dayes all was recouered that Antiochus had gained: the Ætolians onely standing out, because they knew not what else to doe. Neither did the Consul giue them any respite. At his returne from Chalcis he met with king Philip, that hauing recouered health, came to ioyne with him against Antiochus: ouer whom since the victory was alreade gotten, Hee did gratulate vnto the Romans their good successe; and offered to take part with them in the Ætolian Warre. So it was agreed, That the Consul should besiege Heraclea; and Philip, Lamia; at the same time. Each of them plied his worke hard; especially Philip, who faine would haue gotten Lamia before the Consul should come to helpe him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that vsed to worke by Myne, were ouermuch hindered by the stonie ground. Yet was Lamia euen ready to be taken, when the Consul, hauing won Heraclea, came thither; and told Philip, that the spoyle of these townes was a reward vnto those that had fought at Thermopylæ. Herewith Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Acilius, that could so ill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriuing by the Romans victory, got not Lamia himselfe vntill such time as another Consul was ready to ease him of his charge.

The losse of Heraclea did so affright the Ætolians, that they thought no way safer than to desire peace. Yet had they sent vnto king Antiochus presently after his flight, entreating him not to forsake them vtterly, but either to returne with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece; or if any thing withheld him from comming in person, at least wise to help them with money and other aide. They prayed him to consider, that this did not onely concerne him in honour, but appertained vnto his owne safetie: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Ætolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any Enemies at their backes, might set vpon him in Asia. He considered well of this, and found their words true. Therefore He deliuered vnto Nicander, one of their Embassadours, a summe of money, that might serue to defray the charges of the Warre: promising that ere long he would send them strong aide, both by Land and Sea. Thoas, another of their Embassadours, Hee retained with him: who willingly stayed, that he might vrge the king to make his word good. But when Heraclea was taken from them; then did the Ætolians lay aside all hope of amending their fortune by the helpe of Antiochus; and made suite vnto the Consul to obtaine peace, vpon any reasonable Condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to giue them audience, but said He had other businesse in hand; onely he granted them tenne dayes of Truce; and sent L. Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata; willing them to make him acquainted with as much, as they would haue deliuered vnto himselfe. At their comming to Hypata; they began, as men fauouring their owne cause, to alledge how well they had deserued of the Romans. Whereto Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainely, That the memory of such good Offices past, was quite obliterated by the malice which they had shewed of late. Wherefore he willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to doe so euen betimes, than to stay till they were reduced into termes of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themselues vnto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect sent Embassadors to the Consul. This phrase of committing vnto the faith; signified, in their vse of it, little else than the acknowlegement of a fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans vsed those words in another sense; and counted them all one, as * yeelding to discretion. Wherefore when the Consul heard them speake in this manner: He asked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They answered that it was: and shewed him the Decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpose. Then said hee, I command you first of all, That none of you presume to goe into Asia, vpon any businesse priuate or publike: then, That ye deliuer vp vnto me Dicaarchus the Aetolian, Menestratus the Epirot, Aminander the Athamanian, and such of his Countrimen as haue followed him in reuolting from vs. Whilest he was yet speaking: Phaneas the Embassadour interrupted him; and prayed him not to mistake the custome of the Greekes, who had yeelded themselues vnto his faith; not vnto slauerie. what? (said the Consul) Doe ye stand to plead Custome with me, being now at my discretion? Bring hither a chaine. With that, chaines were brought; and an iron collar by his appointment fitted vnto euery one of their neckes. This did so affright them, that they stood dumbe and knew not what to say. But Valerius and some others entreated the Consul, not to deale thus hardly with them, since they came as Embassadours; though since, their Condition was altered. Phaneas also spake for himselfe: and said, That neither He nor yet the Apocleti or ordinarie Councel of the Nation, were able to fulfill these iniunctions, without approbation of the generall Assembly. For which cause he entreated yet further ten dayes respite; and had granted vnto him Truce for so long.

* Liuy ex excerp. è Polyb. 13.

This surceasance of warre, during ten and other ten dayes together, began presently after the taking of Heraclea; when Philip had beene commanded away from Lamia, that else he might haue wonne. Now because of the indignitie herein offered vnto that king, and to the end that he might not returne home with his Armie, like one that could not be trusted in imployment: especially the Romans being like hereafter to haue further need of him, in the continuance of this Warre: He was desired to set vpon the Athamanians, and some other petty Nations their borderers, whilest the Consul was busie with the Aetolians; taking for his reward, all that hee could get. And he got in that space all Athamania, Perrhæbia, Aperantia, & Dolopia. For the Aetolians, hearing what had befalne their Embassadors, were so enraged, That although they were very ill prouided for Warre, yet they could not indure to heare more talke of peace. And so happened, that that Nicander about the same time was come back from Antiochus, with mony and hopefull promises: the Romans abiding still about Heraclea; & Philip hauing lately risen from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. His money Nicander conueighed into Lamia, by very vnusuall deuice inuented. But he himselfe being to passe further to the Assembly of the Aetolians, there to make report of his Embassage, was very much perplexed about this his iourney, which lay between the Roman and Macedonian Campes. Yet he made the aduenture: and keeping as farre as they could from the Roman side, fell vpon a Station of Macedonians; by whom he was taken, and led vnto their King. He expected no good; but either to be deliuered vnto the Romans, or euil enough by Philip. But it seemed, that the king had not hitherto conducted well the indignitie, of his being sent away from Lamia. For he commanded his seruants to entreat Nicander friendly: and he himselfe being then at supper, did visit him at soone as he rose vp, giuing him to vnderstand, That the Aetolians did now reape the fruits of their owne madnesse, for as much as they could neuer hold themselues contented, but would needes be calling strangers into Greece. They had pleased themselues well, in their acquaintance first with the Romans, & then with king Antiochus; but himselfe, being their neighbour, they could neuer well endure. It was now therefore, he said, high time for them to haue regard vnto his friendship, whereof hitherto they had neuer made any triall: for surely their good affection one vnto the other, would be much more auailable vnto either of them, than their continuall catching of aduantages; whereby they had wrought themselues much displeasure. Thus much the king willed Nicander to signifie vnto his Countrimen: and priuately to hold in minde the courtesie which he then did him, in sending him safe home. So giuing him a Conuoy to gard him to Hypata, He louingly dismissed him. For this beeing, Nicander was alwaies after dutifully affected to the Crown of Macedon: so as in the warre of Perseus he made himselfe suspected vnto the Romans; and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Consul vnderstood, that the Aetolians refused to make their submission in such wise as he required it: hee forthwith meant to prosecute the warre against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupactus: whither hee therefore directly marched, to try what they could or durst. The siege of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceiued it: for it was a strong City, and well manned. But Acilius stood vpon point of honour; wherein he thought that he should haue beene a loser, by rising from before it without Victory. So He staid there well neere all the following time of his Consulship, whilest the Macedonian king and the Achæans made farre better vse of the Roman Victorie. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had reuolted vnto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, won the strong Citie of Demetrias; and with an hastie course of Victory, subdued the Athamanians and others. The Achæans called to accompt the Eleans and Messenians: which had long beene addicted to the Aeolian side; and followed it in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleans gaue good words; whereby they saued themselues from trouble awhile. The Messenians being more stout, before they were inuaded, had none other helpe when the Achæan Prætor wasted their Countrey, than to offer themselues vnto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whom they sent word, That at his Commandement their gates should be opened; but that vnto the Achæans it was not their meaning to yeeld. A message from Titus to the Achæan Prætor, did suffice to call home the Armie, and finish the Warre: as also the peremptorie Command of the same Titus caused the Messenians to annexe themselues vnto the Achæans, and become part of their Common-weale. Such was now the Maiestie of a Roman Embassadour. Titus did fauour the Achæans; yet could not like it wel, that either they or any other should take too much vpon them. He thought it enough, that they had their libertie, and were strong enough to defend it against any of their neighbours. That they should make themselues great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans vpon euen termes, it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Ile of Zacynthus, which had once been Philips, and was afterward giuen by him to Amynander, who sent a Gouernor thither. But when Amynander in this present warre, was driuen out of his owne Kingdome by Philip: then did the Gouernour of Zacynthus offer to sell the Iland to the Achæans; whom he found ready Chapmen. Titus liked not of this: but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their owne Caruers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their Enemies, as a reward of the victorie which they had obtained. It was bootleſſe to diſpute. Wherefore the Achæans referred themſelues vnto his diſcretion. Sodee told them, that their Common-wealth was like a Tortoyſe, whereof Peloponneſus was the ſhel: which holding themſelues within that compaſſe, they were out of danger; but if they would needs be looking abroad, they ſhould lie open to blowes, which might greatly hurt them. Having ſet downe things thus in Peloponneſus, Hee went ouer to Naupactus: where Glabrio the Conſul had taken two moneths, that might haue beene farre better ſpent. There, whether out of compaſſion which he had vpon the Ætolians, or out of diſlike of king Philips thriuing ſo faſt, he perſwaded the Conſul to grant vnto the beſieged, & to the whole Nation, ſo long Truce, that they might ſend Embaſſadors to Rome, and ſubmitting themſelues, craue pardon of the Senate. Moſt like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger elſe, would not the Ætolians haue made ſuch earneſt ſuit as they did vnto Titus, for procuring of this fauour. But if Glabrio had beene ſure to carry it, in any ſhort ſpace, it may well be thought he would not haue gone away without it, ſince the winning of that Towne, wherein was then the whole ſtoore of the Nation, would haue made the promiſed ſubmiſſion much more humble and ſyncere. When they came vnto Rome, no entreaty could help them to better Conditions, than one of theſe two. That either they ſhould wholly permit themſelues to the good pleaſure of the Senate; Or elſe pay a thouſand Talents, and make neither Peace nor Warre with any, further than as the Romans ſhould giue approbation. They had not ſo much mony: neither could they well hope to bee gently dealt withall, if they ſhould giue themſelues away vnto diſcretion; which what it ſignified, they now vnderſtood. Wherefore they deſired to haue it ſet downe, in what points, and how farre forth they ſhould yeeld vnto the good pleaſure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certaine anſwer: ſo that they were diſmiſſed as enemies, after long and vaine attendance.

Whileſt the Ætolians were purſuing their hopes of peace, the Conſull had little to doe in Greece, and therefore tooke vpon him gravely to ſet things in order among the trouble Achæans. Hee would haue had them to reſtore the baniſhed Lacedemonians home into their Countrie, and to take the Eleans into the fellowſhip of their Common-wealth. This the Achæans liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romans ſhould be meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the reſtitution of the baniſhed Lacedemonians: intending to make it an Act of their own meere grace. As for the Eleans, they were loth to be beholding to the Romans, and thereby to diſparage the Achæans: into whoſe Corporation they were deſirous to be admitted, and ſaw that they ſhould haue their deſire, without ſuch compulſiue mediation.

The Roman Admirall C. Liuius, much about the ſame time, fought a battaile at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admirall to the king Antiochus. King Eumenes brought helpe to the Romans, though it was not great: and fiue and twenty ſaile of Rhodians came after the battaile, when they were following the Chaſe. The kings Fleet was the better of ſaile: but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquiſhed in fight, was yet out of danger; as ſoone as he betooke himſelfe to a ſpeedy retrait.

And ſuch end had the firſt yeeres warre, betweene King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greeks as had followed the vaine hopes of the Ætolians, were glad to excuſe themſelues by feare; thinking themſelues happy when by Embaſſadours they had obtained pardon. On the contrarie ſide, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemie of late vnto the Romans, did now ſend to gratulate this their Victorie: and, in recompence of his good affection, had reſtored vnto him Demetrius his younger ſonne, whom ſome few yeeres they had kept as an hoſtage. Alſo King Ptolomie of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victory, ſent word how greatly all Aſia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard Hee deſired the Senate not to foreſlow time; but to ſend an Armie, as ſoone as might be, into Aſia: promiſing, that his aſſiſtance, wherein ſoeuer it pleaſed them to vſe it, ſhould not bee wanting. This Ptolomie was the ſonne-in-law of King Antiochus: but hee was the friend of Fortune. He vnderſtood long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the Contention, that the Romans were like to haue the vpper hand. The ſame did Antiochus now begin to ſuſpect, who had thought himſelfe a while as ſafe at Epheſus, as if he had bin in another world: but was told by Hannibal, That it was not ſo far out of Greece into Aſia, as out of Italy into Greece; and that there was no doubt but the Romans would ſound him there, & make him try the chance of a battell for his kingdome.

§. VIII.

Lucius Scipio, hauing with him Publius the African his elder brother, for his Lieutenant, is sent into Greece. Her grants long Truce to the Ætolians, that so he might at leisure passe into Asia. Much troublesome businesse by Sea, and diuers fights. An inuasion vpon Eumenes his Kingdome, with the siege of Pergamus, raysed by an handfull of the Achæans. L. Scipio the Consul comes into Asia: where Antiochus most earnestly desireth peace, and is denied it. The battaile of Magnesia: wherein Antiochus being vanquished, yeeldeth to the Romans good pleasure. The Conditions of the peace. In what sort the Romans vsed their Victorie. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a most sumptuous triumph ouer Antiochus, is surnamed The Asiatique, as his brother was stiled The African.

Lvcius Cornelius Scipio, the brother of P. Scipio the African, was chosen Consul at Rome with C. Lælius. Lælius was very gracious in the Senate: and therefore being desirous (as generally all Consuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to referre to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would bee so pleased, the disposition of their Prouinces; without putting it to the hazzard of a Lotterie. Lucius hauing talked with his brother Publius, approued well of the motion. Such a question had not of long time been put vnto the Fathers: who therefore were the more desirous to make an vnblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwise somewhat indifferent; P. Scipio the African said openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the warre against Antiochus, He himselfe would follow his brother in that war, as his Lieutenant. These words were heard with such approbation, that the controuersie was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relied vpon Hannibal, and should happen to be directed wholly by that great Captaine: what better man could they oppose, than Scipio; that had beene victorious against that same Great Worthy? But indeed a worser man might haue serued well enough the turne. For Hannibal had no absolute Command, nor scarce any trust of great importance: excepting now and then in consultation; where his wisedome was much approued, but his liberty and high spirit as much disliked. It is worthy of remembrance; as a signe of the freedome that he vsed in his censures, euen whilest hee liued in such a Court; Antiochus mustered his Armie in presence of this famous Captaine: thinking, as may seeme, to haue made him wish, that he had beene serued by such braue men in Italy. For they were gallantly decked, both Men, Horses, and Elephants, with such costly furniture of Gold, Siluer, and Purple; as glittered with a terrible brauery on a Sun-shine day. Whereupon the king, well pleasing himselfe with that goodly spectacle, asked Hannibal what he thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (said Hannibal) were the Romans the most couetous men in all the world: meaning, that all his Cost vpon the backes of Cowardly Asiatiques, was no better than a spoyle to animate good Souldiers. How little this answer pleased the King, it is easie to gheese. The little vse that he made of this Carthaginian, testifies that his dislike of the man, caused him to lose the vse of his seruice, when he stood in greatest necessitie thereof.

The Scipio's made all haste away from Rome as soon as they could. They carried with them, besides other Souldiers newly prest to the war, about fiue thousand Voluntaries, that had serued vnder P. Africanus. There was also a Fleet of thirty Quinqueremes Gallies, and twenty Triremes newly built, appointed vnto L. Æmilius Regillus, that was chosen Admirall the same yeere for that voyage. At their comming into Greece, they found the old Consul Glabrio besieging Amphyssa a City of the Ætolians. The Ætolians after that they were denied peace, had expected him once againe at Naupactus. Wherefore they not onely fortified that Towne: but kept all the passages thereto leading; which heedlesly, as in a time of confusion, they had left vnregarded the last yeere. Glabrio knowing this, deceiued their expectation, and fell vpon Lamia: which being not long since much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the sudden; was carried at the second assault. Thence went he to Amphyssa: which he had almost gotten; when L. Scipio, his successor, came with thirteene thousand Foote, and fiue hundred Horse, and tooke charge of the Armie. The Towne of Amphyssa was presently forsaken by the Inhabitants, but they had a Castle, or higher Town, that was impregnable, whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embassadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalfe of the Ætolians:

lians: entreating him to ſtand their friend, and helpe them in obtaining ſome tolerable Condition of peace. He gaue them gentle words: and willed them to perſwade the Ætolians, that they ſhould faithfully and with true meaning deſire it. This was gladly taken. But many meſſages paſſing to and fro: though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Conſul made ſtill the ſame anſwer, with which they had been chaſed from Rome. The concluſion was, That they ſhould ſue for a longer time of reſpite from warre: whereby at more leiſure they might attend ſome better diſpoſition of the Senate; or any helpfull commoditie which time ſhould afford. So they obtained halfe a yeeres truce: after which, the Winter was like to afford them another halfe yeeres leiſure of breathing. Hereof were they not more glad, than was P. Scipio: who thought all time loſt, which with-held the Warre from paſſing ouer into Aſia.

The buſineſſe of Ætolia being thus laid aſide: and the old Conſul Glabrio ſent home into Italy: the Scipio's marched into Theſſaly; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon & Thrace vnto the Helleſpont. Yet they conſidered, That hereby they muſt commit themſelues vnto the loyaltie of King Philip: who might either do them ſome miſchiefe by the way, if he were diſpoſed to watch a notable aduantage: or at the leaſt, would be vnfaithfull; though he were not ſo couragious, yet might hee take ſuch order with the Thracians, that euen for want of victuals, if by no greater inconuenience, they ſhould be diſgracefully forced to returne. Hee had promiſed them the vtmoſt of his furtherance: wherein, whether he meant ſyncerely, they thought to make ſome triall; by cauſing a Gentleman to ride Poſt vnto him, and obſerue his doings as he ſhould take them on the ſudden. The King was merry at a feaſt, and drinking, when the Meſſenger came: whom he louingly bade welcome; and ſhewed him the next day, not only what prouiſion of victuals he had made for the Army, but how he had made bridges ouer the riuers, and mended the bad wayes by which they were to paſſe. With theſe good newes Gracchus returned backe in haſte vnto the Scipio's: who entring into Macedon, found all things in a readineſſe, that might helpe to aduance their iourny. The King entertained them royally; and brought them on their way, euen to the Helleſpont: where they ſtayed a good while, vntill their Nauie was in readineſſe to tranſport them into Aſia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this yeere; though, for the moſt part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admirall of Antiochus, was a baniſhed Rhodian: true to the King; and deſirous of reuenge vpon his Countrymen that had expelled him. Hee, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans & Eumenes hauing not as yet put to Sea; thought to doe ſomewhat vpon thoſe that were ſo early in their diligence, before their followers ſhould arriue to helpe them. Yet went he craftily to worke; and ſent word, as in great ſecrecie, to the Rhodian Admirall, That if the ſentence of his baniſhment might be repealed, He would, in requitall thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many paſſages to and fro, this was beleeued: and the Rhodian Admirall grew ſo careleſſe, expecting ſtill when he ſhould receiue a watch-word from Polyxenidas, that hee himſelfe was taken by Polyxenidas in his owne Hauen. The Kings Fleete ſet foorth from Epheſus by night; and, for feare of being diſcouered, reſting one day in a harbour by the way, came the ſecond night to Samos: where, by morning, it was ready to enter the Hauen. Panſiſtratus the Rhodian Admirall ſeeing this, thought it his beſt way of reſiſtance, to beſtow his men on the two head-lands or points of the Hauen; ſo to guard the mouth of it: for that he ſaw no likelihood of defending himſelfe by Sea. But Polyxenidas had already landed ſome Companies, in another part of the Iland: which falling vpon the backe of Panſiſtratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboord. This could not be without great confuſion: ſo as the enemies tooke him out of all order; and ſunke or boorded all his Nauie, fiue excepted, that by a ſudden deuice made ſhift to eſcape. Each of them hung out a burning Creſſet vpon two poles, at the Beake-head: and then rowed forwards directly vpon the Enemie: who hauing not bethought himſelfe what ſhift to make againſt ſuch vnexpected danger of firing, was content to giue way vnto theſe deſperate Gallies; for feare leſt they ſhould burne, together with themſelues, a part of the kings Fleete.

Not long after this, the Romans had ſome loſſe by tempeſt: whereof Polyxenidas could not take ſuch aduantage as hee had hoped; becauſe, putting to Sea for that purpoſe, Hee was driuen backe againe by the like foule weather. But the Rhodians, to ſhew that they

they were not discouraged, set forth a new Armie other Gallies: the Romans also with their Eumenes repaired their Fleet, and all of them together, in great bravery, presented battaile to Polyxenidas before the Haven of Ephesus. Whom they found not to accept him: they went from place to place, and tempting many things, as by their Countrey entreated by the Rhodians, or perswaded by some appearing hopes of doing good. Yet could they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindered by stormes arising; and another while by strong resistance, made against them at Land.

Eumenes with his Fleet was compelled to forsake them, and returne home to the defence of his owne kingdome. For Antiochus wasted all the ground about Elea & Pergamus: and leaving his Sonne Seleucus to besiege the royall Citie of Pergamus, did with the rest of his Armie spoyle the whole Countrey thereabout. Attalus, the brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamus, having with him no better men to defend the Citie, than were they that lay against it. Wherefore he had reason to stand in feare, being too much inferiour in number. There came to his aid a thousand Foote, and an hundred Horse of the Achæans: old souldiers all, and trayned up under Philopœmen, whose Scholler, in the Art of warre, Diophanes their Commander was. This Diophanes, beholding from the walls of Pergamus, which was an high Towne, the demeanour of the Enemy, began to dislike that such men as they should hold them besieged. For Seleucus his Armie which was encamped at the hill foot, seeing that none durst sallie forth upon them, grew so careless: as otherwise, than by spoyling all behinde their backes, they seemed to forget that they were in an Enemies Countrie. Diophanes therefore spake with Attalus, and told them that they would get forth encamped not farre from the Enemy. Then Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the besiegers, they wondred much at what his meaning was: but when they saw that he held himself quiet, they made a scoffe of his boldnesse; and laughed to see with what an handfull of men he looked so stoutly. So they returned vnto their former negligence and disorders. Which Diophanes perceiving, He commanded all his men to follow him, even as fast as they well might: and he himselfe, with the hundred Horse, brake out on a sudden upon the Stanes that were next at hand. Very few of the enemies had their Horses ready saddled, but more few, or none, had the hearts to make resistance: so as he drave them all out of their Campe, and chased them as farre as he might safely venture, with great slaughter of them, and no losse of his owne. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus, who had covered the walls of the Towne, men and women, to behold (as a spectacle) were very ioyfull; and highly magnified the vertue of these Achæans. Yet would they not therefore issue forth out of their gates, to helpe the Achæans in doing what remained to be done. The next day Attalus encamped halfe a mile further from the Towne, than he had done before: and against him went forth Diophanes the second time; who quietly rested a while in his old Station. When they had stayed many houres, looking who should begin: Seleucus in like order as he came, withdrew himselfe toward his lodging that was further off. Diophanes moued not whilest the Enemie was in sight: but as soone as the ground betweene them hindred the prospect, hee followed them in all haste, and soone ouertaking them with his Horse, charged them in Rere; so as he brake them, and with all his force pursued them at the heeles, to their very Trenches. This boldnesse of the Achæans, and the baseneſſe of his owne men, caused Seleucus to quit the siege, little to his honour. Such being the qualitie of these Asiatiques, Philopœmen had cause to tell the Romans, That we enuied their victorie. For when Antiochus lay feasting at Chalcis after his marriage, and his Souldiers betooke themselues to Reyor, as it had beene in a time of great security: a good man of warre might haue cut all their throates, euen as they were tipling in their victualling houses; which Philopœmen said that he would haue done, had He beene Generall of the Achæans, and not, as he then was, a priuate man.

Antiochus was full of businesse: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deale of trauaile, brought almost nothing to passe. He had beene at Pergamus, into which Eumenes, leauing the Romans, did put himselfe with a few of his Horse and light armature. Before Pergamus he left his Sonne, as before hath beene showed, & went to Elæa: whither he heard that Aemilius the Roman Admiral was come, to bring the warre to Eumenes. There hee made an Ouerture of peace: about which treating, Eumenes was sent for by Aemilius, and came from Pergamus. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made without the Consul, this Treatie brake off. Then followed the Outie drew by seditions, which caused them to giue ouer the siege of Pergamus. Fifteene gallies, foddered for fiue Voyages of Statelady worth of note were taken by the King: and the Syrian Fleet, being of seuen and thirty Sayle, was beaten by the Rhodians which was of like number. But of this victorie the Rhodians had no great cause to reioyce: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, ioyned together with Apollonius a Captaine of Antiochus, was Admirall both by Sea and Land, did them as great hurt as they could doe to Apollonius; and hauing the victorie taken out of his hand by Apollonius his flight, yet made such a feare, that the Rhodians durst not farre aduenture vpon him. Now of these Actions which were vsed as Preludes vnto the warre, the last and greatest was a victorie obtained by Sea, against Polyxenidas the Kings Admirall. The battaile was fought by Myonnesus a Promontorie in Asia: where Polyxenidas had with him fourescore saile of Gallies, and fiue of them greater than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which hee could make by Sea, we may note the vanitie of those brags, wherewith Antiochus vaunted the last yeare, That his Armada should couer all the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fifty Gallies; the Rhodians, two and twenty: the Romans being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodian more light-timbred and slim planckt, hauing all aduantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to helpe themselues by the same deuice, with which, fiue of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their prowes they ran vpon the Enemy, who declining them for feare, laid open his side: and was thereby in greater danger of being ouerrunne. After no long fight, the Kings Nauie hoysted saile, and hauing a faire winde, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet fortie of their Gallies they left behinde them, whereof thirteene were taken: all the rest burnt or sunke. The Romans and their fellowes lost only two or three shippes: but got hereby the absolute Masterie of the Sea.

The event of this misaduenture, may seeme to haue taken from Antiochus all vse of reason. For as if no hope had been remayning, to defend those places that hee held in Europe, he presently withdrew his Garrisons from Lysimachia, which might easily haue been kept vntill the end of Winter following, and haue reduced the besiegers (if the siege had beene continued vntill that time) into termes of great extremitie. Hee also gaue ouer the siege of Cyzicum: and laying aside all thought saue onely of defence, drew together all his Armie, and sent it for help to his father-in-law, King Ariarathes in Cappadocia.

The Roman Consul, without impediment, not onely came to the Hellespont, but had yeelded vnto him all places there belonging to Antiochus on Europe side. The Fleet was there also in readinesse, to transport him ouer into Asia: where Eumenes had taken order before, that Hee landed quietly at his owne good ease, euen as if the Countrie had been his already. The first newes that he heard of the Enemie, was by an Embassador that came to sue for peace. This Embassador declared in his Masters name, That the same things which had hindered him from obtaining peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perswade him, that he should easily come to good agreement with them. For in all disputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampsacus, and Lysimachia, had beene the places about which they stirred. Seeing therefore the King had now already giuen ouer Lysimachia; and was further purposed, not to striue with the Romans about Lampsacus and Smyrna: what reason was there, why they should need to trouble him with warre? If it were but his desire, that any other Townes vpon the Coast of Asia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, should bee also set at liberty, or otherwise deliuered into their hands: the King would not refuse to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take some part of Asia so as the bounds, dividing them from the King, might not be vncertaine; and it should bee quietly put into their hands. If all this were not enough: the King would likewise beare halfe the charges, wherein they had beene in this warre. So praying the Romans to hold themselues content with these good offers, and not to bee too insolent vpon confidence of their fortune, Hee expected their answer. These offers which the Embassador seemed to great, were iudged by the Romans to be very little. For they thought it reasonable, that the King should beare all the charges of the warre, since he got it through his owne fault: and that He should not onely depart out of these few Townes which he held in Aolis and Ionia, but quite out of Asia the lesse, and keep himself to this side of Mount Taurus. When the Embassadours therefore saw, that shame better bargaine could be made. He dealt with P. Scipio in priuate: and to him hee promised a great quantitie of gold, together with the free restitution of his sonne, who (in a vncertaine by what misfeliance) was taken prisoner, and most honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of gold: nor otherwise to the restitution of his sonne, than vpon Condition, That it might bee with making such amends for the benefit, as became a priuate man. As for the publike businesse: Hee onely said this much, That since Antiochus had already forsaken Lysimachia, and suffered the warre to take hold on his owne Kingdome; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yeeld to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, said He, tell your king in my name, that I would aduise him to refuse no Condition whereby he may haue peace.

The king was not any whit moued with this aduice. For seeing that the Consul demanded of him no lesse, than if he had beene already subduced; little reason there was that he should feare to come to battaile; wherein he could lose, as he thought, no more, than by seeking to auoid it he must giue away. Hee had with him threescore and tenne thousand Foot, and twelue thousand Horse, besides two and fiftie Indian Elephants, and many Chariots armed with hookes or sythes, according to the manner of the Easterne Countries. Yet was he nothing pleased, to heare that the Consul drew neere him apace as one hastning to fight. But how soeuer he was affected; He made so little shew of feare, that hearing P. Scipio to lie sicke at Elea, He sent thither vnto him his sonne without ransome: as one both desirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his sickenesse, and withall not desirous to retaine the young Gentleman for a pledge of his owne safetie. Thus ought his bountie to be constant. Otherwise it might be suspected, That herein hee dealt craftily. For sure he could haue none other ransome of Scipio, than such as an honourable man, that had no great store of wealth, might pay: better it was to doe such a courtesie before the battell, as would afterwards haue beene little worth; than to stay vntill the Romans, perhaps victorious, should exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the recouerie of his sonne: so as the ioy thereof was thought, to haue beene much auaileable vnto his health. In recompence of the kings humanitie, Hee said onely thus much vnto those that brought him this accepteble Present, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by aduising him not to fight vntill hee shall heare that I am in the Campe. What he meant by this, it is hard to coniecture. Antiochus resolued to follow his counsaile, and therefore withdrew himselfe from about Thyatira, beyond the Riuer of Phrygius or Hyllus, vnto Magnesia by Sipylus: where encamping, Hee fortified himselfe as strongly as hee could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Consul; and sate downe within foure miles of him. About a thousand of the kings Horse, most of them Gallo-Greeks, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at first they slew some; and were anon, with some losse, driuen backe ouer the Riuer. Two daies were quietly spent, whilest neither the King nor the Romans would passe the water. The third day the Romans made the aduenture: wherein they found no disturbance; nor were at all opposed, vntill they came within two miles and a halfe of Antiochus his Campe. There as they were taking vp their lodging, they were charged by three thousand Horse and Foote: whom their ordinary Corps du garde repelled. Foure dayes together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and set them in order before the Trenches, without aduancing any further. The fift day the Romans came halfe way forward, and presented battaile; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Consul tooke aduice what was to be done. For either they must fight vpon whatsoeuer disaduantage, or else resolue to abide by it all Winter, farre from any Countrey of their friends, and therefore subiect vnto many difficulties: vnlesse they would staine their honour by returning farre backe, to winter in a more conuenient place; and so defer the warre vntill the next Spring. The Roman souldier was throughly perswaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the generall Crie, That this great Armie should be assayled, euen in the Campe where it lay: as if rather there were so many beasts to be slaughtered, than men to bee fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discouering the fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set vpon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being very loth to dishearten his men, by seeming to stand in feare of the Enemie, resolued to put the matter to triall. So when the Romans took the field againe, and ordered their Battells:

Hee also did the like; and aduanced so farre, that they might vnderstand his meaning to fight.

The Roman Armie consisted of foure Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were fiue thousand and foure hundred men. The Latines, as vsually, were in the points, the Romans, in the maine battell. All of them, according to their wonted forme, were diuided into Maniples. The Hastati had the leading: after them follow the Principes, at such distance as was vsuall; and last of all, the Triarij. Now beside these, there were about three thousand Auxiliaries; partly Achæans; and partly such as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equall Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Vtmost of all (saue some fiue hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians) were almost three thousand Horse: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the banke of the riuer: yet foure Troups of horse were placed there, though such helpe seemed in a manner needlesse. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Campe. The Consul had with him sixteene African Elephants, which he bestowed in his Rere: forasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they onely would haue serued to discourage his men; as being sure to bee beaten: the Indian being farre the greater, and more couragious beastes: whereof Antiochus had likewise much aduantage in number.

The kings Armie being compounded of many Nations, diuersly appointed, and not all accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the seuerall kindes, in such wise as each might be of most vse. The maine strength of his Foot consisted in sixteene thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These hee placed in the middest, and diuided into tenne Battalions: euery one hauing two and thirty in File, and fiftie in Front. Betweene euery Battalion were two Elephants, goodly beastes, and such as being adorned with Frontals, high Crests, Towers on their backes, and besides him that gouerned the Elephant, foure men in euery Tower, made a gallant and terrible shew. On the right hand of these were fifteene hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greeks: then, three thousand Barbd Horse: and a Regiment of almost a thousand Horse, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choyce of the Countrie, and accompanied by some others. All which Troupes of Horse, diuided in their seuerall kindes, doe seeme to haue followed one another in depth, rather than to haue bin stretched out in Front. Adioyning vnto these, were sixteene Elephants together in one flocke. A little further to the right hand, was the kings owne Regiment; called the Argyraspides, or Siluersbields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like so valiant as those of the same name, that had serued vnder Great Alexander: then, twelue hundred Archers on horsebacke, three thousand light-armed Foot, two thousand and fiue hundred Archers of Mysia; with foure thousand Slingers and Archers of the Cirtæans, and Elymæans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greeks, and Barbd Horse: as also two thousand horse that were sent from Ariarathes, with two thousand and seuen hundred of diuers Nations; and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were called The Kings Troup, being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In front of all these Horse were the Chariots armed with hookes or sythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon sate Arabians with long Rapiers, that would serue to reach from those high Camels. Beyond these were, as in the right wing, a rable of many Nations, Carians, Cicilians, Pamphylians, Pisidians, Cyrtæans, Elymæans, and many others, hauing also with them sixteen Elephants. Antiochus himselfe commanded in the right wing: Seleucus in the left: and three of his principall Captains commanded ouer the Phalangiers.

The first on-set was giuen by the Dromidaries, and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horse; the other, to breake the Squadrons of the Foote; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, easily made frustrate the danger threatned by them both. For with shoutings, and noyses, and some wounds, they were driuen out of the field; and running backe vpon their owne men, did the same harme which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horse following this aduantage, charged vpon the left wing: whereas they found no resistance; some being out of order; others being without courage. It is shamefull to rehearse, and so strange, that it may hardly seeme credible: that the Phalangiers, with such varieties of Auxiliaries, made little or no resistance; but all of them fled, in a manner, as soone as they were charged. Onely the king, Antiochus himselfe, being in the left wing of his owne battaile: and seeing the Latines, that stood opposite vnto him, weakly flanked with Horse: gaue vpon them courageously, and forced them to retire. but M. Æmilius, that had the Guard of the Roman Campe, issued forth with all his power to helpe his fellowes: and, what by perswasion, what by threats, made them renew the fight. Succour also came from the right wing, where the Romans were already victorious: whereof when Antiochus discouered the approach; Hee not onely turned his Horse about, but ranne away vpon the spur without further tarriance. The Campe was defended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is said to haue lost in this battaile fiftie thousand Foot, and foure thousand Horse; besides those that were taken. Of the Romans, there were not slaine aboue three hundred Foot, and foure and twenty Horse: of Eumenes his followers fiue and twenty.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the same night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before, He left the custodie of Sardes, and the Castle there, to one whom he thought faithfull. But the Towne-men and Souldiers were so dismayed with the greatnesse of the Ouerthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Townes in those parts, without expecting summons, yeelded vp themselues by Embassadours: whom they sent to the Romans, whilest they were on the way. Neither were many daies spent, ere Antiochus his Embassadour was in the Campe: hauing none other errand, than to know what it would please the Romans to impose vpon the king his Master. P. Scipio was now come to his brother, who obtained leaue to make the answer, because that it should bee gentle. They required no more than they had lately done: which was, that he should quite abandon his Dominions on this side Taurus. For their charges in that Warre, they required fifteene thousand Talents: fiue hundred in hand; two thousand and fiue hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome should haue confirmed the peace; and the other twelue thousand, in twelue yeeres next ensuing, by euen portions. Likewise they demanded foure hundred Talents for Eumenes; and some store of Corne, that was due to him vpon a reckoning. Now besides twentie hostages which they required, very earnest they were to haue Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thoas the Ætolian, with some others who had stirred vp the King to this war, deliuered into their hands. But any wise man might so easily haue perceiued, that it would be their purpose to make this one of their principall demands; as no great art was needfull to beguile their malice. The kings Embassadour had full commission, to refuse nothing that should be enioyned. Wherefore there was no more to doe, than to send immediately to Rome for the ratification of the Peace.

There were new Consuls chosen in the meane while at Rome, M. Fuluius, and Cn. Manlius Vulso. The Ætolians desired peace, but could not obtaine it: because they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Consuls should make warre vpon the Ætolians; the other, vpon Antiochus in Asia. Now though shortly there came newes that Antiochus was already vanquished in battaile, and had submitted himselfe vnto all that could be required at his hands: yet since the State of Asia was not like to bee so throughly settled by one Victory, but that many things might fall out worthy of the Romans care; Cn. Manlius, to whom Asia fell by lot, had not his Prouince changed.

Soone after this, came the Embassadours of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and some others: yea, by king Eumenes in person; whose presence added a goodly lustre to the businesse in hand. Concerning the peace to bee made with king Antiochus, there was no disputation: it was generally approoued. All the trouble was, about the distribution of the purchase. King Eumenes reckoned vp his own deserts; and comparing himselfe with Masanissa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountifull to him than they had beene to the Numidian, since they had found him a King indeed, whereas Masanissa was onely such in title; and since both hee and his Father had alwayes beene their friends, euen in the very worst of the Roman fortune. Yet was there much adoe to make him tell what hee would haue: He still referring himselfe to their courtesie; and they desiring him to speake plaine. At the length hee craued they would bestow vpon him, as much of the Country by them taken from Antiochus, as they had had no purpoſe to keepe in their owne hands. Neither thought he it needfull, that they ſhould trouble themſelues with the care of giuing liberty to many of the Greeke Towns, that were on Aſia ſide. For ſince the moſt of thoſe Townes had beene partakers with the king in his Warre; it was no reaſon that they ſhould bee gainers by his ouerthrow. The Rhodians did not like of this. They deſired the Senate to be truely Patrons of the Grecian liberty, and to call to minde, that no ſmall part of Greece it ſelfe had bin ſubiect vnto Philip, and ſerued him in his Warre: which was not alledged againſt him as a cauſe why they ſhould not be made free, after that Philip was ouercome. But the maine point whereon they inſiſted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans againſt king Antiochus was ſo great, as eaſily might ſatisfie the deſires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to heare of this, and very bountifully gaue away ſo much, that euery one had cauſe to be well pleaſed.

Such end had the Warre againſt king Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted vnto him the honour of a Triumph: the pompe whereof exceeded in riches, not onely that of Titus Quintius Flaminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld vntill that day. Now foraſmuch as the ſurname of The African had beene giuen vnto P. Scipio, it was thought conuenient by ſome, to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Aſiatick: which the fortune of his Victory had no leſſe deſerued; though the vertue, requiſite to the purchaſe thereof, was no way correſpondent.

The Ætolians, and the Gallo-Greeks, vanquiſhed by the Roman Conſuls Fuluius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtaines a Triumph: being charged (among other obiections) with attempting to haue paſſed the bounds appointed as fatall to the Romans by Sibyl. Of Sibyls Prophecies; the Bookes of Hermes; and that Inſcription, Simoni Deo Sancto. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipio's: and that beginning and faction among the Roman Nobilitie.

M. Arc. Fuluius and Cn. Manlius had the ſame charge diuided betweene them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now ſtyled Aſiaticus, had lately vndergone. It was found more than one mans worke, to looke at once to Greece and to Aſia. And for this reaſon was it apparant, that L. Scipio had granted ſo long a Truce to the Ætolians. But ſince, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughtie little Nation had not ſought to humble it ſelfe to the Roman Maieſtie, it was now to bee brought vnto more lowly termes than any other of the Greekes. The beſt was, that ſo great a ſtorme fell not vnexpected vpon the Ætolians. They had foreſeene the danger, when their Embaſſadours were vtterly denied peace at Rome: and they had prouided the laſt remedie; which was, to entreate the Rhodians and Athenians to become interceſſours for them. Neyther were they ſo deiected, with any terrible apprehenſions, that they could not well deuiſe, euen vpon helping themſelues, by repurchaſe of Countries loſt, where they ſpied aduantage.

Poore king Aminander liued in exile among them, whileſt Philip of Macedon kept for him, poſſeſſion of his Lands and Caſtles. But the Athamanians (beſides that many of them bore a naturall affection to their owne Prince) hauing beene long accuſtomed to ſerue a Mountaine Lord, that conuerſed with them after an homely manner; could not endure the proud and inſolent manner of command, vſed by the Captaines of Philip his Garriſons. They ſent therefore ſome few of them to their King, and offered their ſeruice toward his reſtitution. At the firſt there were onely foure of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fiftie, which vndertooke the worke. Yet aſſurance, that all the reſt would follow, made Aminander willing to trie his fortune. Hee was at the borders with a thouſand Ætolians, vpon the day appointed: at what time his two and fiftie aduenturers hauing diuided themſelues into foure parts, occupied, by the ready aſſiſtance of the multitude, foure of the chiefe Townes in the Countrie, to his vſe. The fame of this good ſucceſſe at firſt; with diuers letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to doe their beſt in helping forward the Action, made the Lieutenants of Philip vnable to thinke vpon reſiſtance. One of them held the Towne of Theium a few dayes; giuing thereby ſome leiſure vnto his King to pro-prouide for the rescue. But when he had done his best, he was forced thence; and could onely tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was lost. Philip had brought from home fixe thousand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in such a running march, hee left all saue two thousand behinde him, and so came to Athæneum, a little Athamanian Castle, that still was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he sent Zeno, who had kept Theium awhile, to take a place lying ouer Argithea, that was chiefe of the Countrie. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither hee, nor the king had the boldnes to descend vpon Argithea; for that they might perceiue the Athamanians, all along the hill sides, ready to come downe vpon them, when they should be busie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a safe retreat: especially when Aminander came in sight with his thousand Ætolians. The Macedonians were called back, from-wards Argithea, & presently withdrawn by their king towards his owne borders. But they were not suffered to depart in quiet at their pleasure. The Athamanians and Ætolians way-laid them, and pursued them so closely, that their retrait was in manner of a plaine flight, with great losse of men and armes, few of those escaping, that were left behinde, as to make a countenance of holding somewhat in the Countrey, vntill Philip his returne.

The Ætolians hauing found the businesse of Athamania so easie, made an attempt in their owne behalfe, vpon the Amphilochians and Aperantians. These had belonged vnto their Nation, & were lately taken by Philip; from whom they diligently reuolted and became Ætolian againe. The Dolopians lay next; that had beene euer belonging to the Macedonian, and so did still purpose to continue. These tooke Armes at first: but soone layed them away; seeing their neighbors ready to fight with them in the Ætolian quarrell, and seeing their owne king so hastily gone, as if he meant not to returne.

Of these victories the ioy was the lesse; for that newes came of Antiochus his last ouerthrow, and of M. Fuluius the new Consul his hasting with an armie into Greece. Aminander sent his excuses to Rome, praying the Senate, not to take it in despight, that hee had recouered his owne from Philip with such helpe as he could get. Neither seemes it that the Romans were much offended to heare of Philip his losses: for of this fault they neither were sharpe correctors, nor earnest reprouers. Fuluius went in hand with the businesse, about which he came, and layed siege to Ambracia, a goodly Citie, that had beene the chiefe seate of Pyrrhus his Kingdome. With this he began; for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Ætolians: yet could not by them be relieued, vnlesse they would aduenture to fight vpon equal ground. To help the Ambracians, it was not in the Ætolians power: for they were, at the same time, vexed by the Illyrians at sea, and ready to be driuen from their new conquest, by Perseus the sonne of Philip, who inuaded the Countries of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were vnable to deale with so many at once; and therefore as earnestly sought peace with the Romans, as they stoutly made head against the rest. In the meane while the Athenian and Rhodian Embassadours came; who besought the Consul to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made strong resistance, and would not be terrified, by any violence of the Assaylants, or danger that might seeme to threaten. The Consull had no desire to spend halfe his time about one Citie, and so bee driuen to leaue vnto his successour the honour of finishing the Warre. Wherefore hee gladly hearkened vnto the Ætolians, and bade them seeke peace with faithfull intent, without thinking it ouerdeare, at a reasonable price; considering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the same purchase. Hee also gaue leaue to Aminander, offering his seruice as a mediatour, to put himselfe into Ambracia, and trie what good his perswasions might doe with the Citizens. So, after many demaunds and excuses, the conclusion was such as was grieuous to the weaker, but not vnsufferable. The same Embassadours of the Athenians and Rhodians, accompanied those of the Aetolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needfull in this intercession, for that Philip had made a very grieuous complaint about the losse of those Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Heereof the Senate could not but take notice, though it did not hinder the peace, which those good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens did earnestly solicite. The Aetolians were bound to vphold the Maiestie of the people of Rome, and to obserue diuers Articles, which made them the lesse free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any people of Greece, they hauing beene the first that called these their Masters into the Countrie. The ile of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselues (as not long since they had gotten Zacinthus from the Achæans, by stiffely pressing their owne right) that so they might haue possession along the coast of Greece, whilest they seemed to forbeare the Countrey. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others, might lay claime, there was set down an Order so perplexed, as would necessarily require to haue the Romans Iudges of their controuersies, when they should arise. And hereof good vse will bee shortly made: when want of employment elsewhere, shall cause a more Lordly Inquisition to be held, vpon the affaires of Macedon and Greece.

Cn. Manlius, the other Consull, had at the same time warre in Asia, with the Gallo-Greeks and others. His Armie was the same that had followed L. Scipio; of whose victorie, his acts were the consummation. He visited those Countries on the hither side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these were some petty Lords, or Tyrants, some free Cities, and some that were together at Warres, without regard of the great alteration that hapned in Asia. From euery of these hee got somewhat; and by their quarrells found occasion to visite those Prouinces, into which hee should else haue wanted an errand. Hee was euen loaden with booty, when, hauing fetcht a compasse about Asia, he came at length vpon the Gallo-Greeks. These had long domineered ouer the Countrie: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terror of their fore-passed acts, than any present vertue of theirs, which held them vp in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such triall, when they did serue vnder king Antiochus, as made them to acknowledge themselues farre the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safetie, that they dwelt vpon the Riuer Halys, in an In-land Countrie, where those enemies were not very like to search them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their owne Nation; that had beene friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yeeld: then there was no counsaile thought so good, as to forsake their houses and Countrey, and, with all that they could carrie or driue, to betake themselues vnto the high mountaines of Olympus and Margana. These mountaines were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should vndertake the custodie. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time; as also the naturall strength being helpt, by such fortification as promised greatest assurance: it was thought, that the Consul would either forbeare the attempt of forcing them, or easily bee repelled; and that finally, when hee had stayed there a while, winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this auailed not. For whereas the Gallo-Greekes had beene careless of furnishing themselues with casting weapons, as if stones would haue serued well enough for that purpose: the Romans, who came farre otherwise appointed, found greater aduantage in the difference of Armes, than impediment in disaduantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did easily preuaile against casters of stones; especially being such as were these Gallo-Greeks, neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor hauing prepared their stones before-hand, but catching vp what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit size. Finally, the Barbarians, wanting defensiue Armes, could not hold out against the Arrowes and weapons of the Roman light armature: but were driuen from a piece of ground, which they had vndertaken to make good, vp into their Campe on the top of the mountaine; and being forced out of their Campe, had none other way left, than to cast themselues headlong downe the steepe rockes. Few of their men did escape aliue: all their wiues, children, and goods became a prey vnto the Romans. In the very like manner, were the rest of that Nation ouercome soone after, at the other mountaine: onely more of them saued themselues by flight, as hauing fairer way at their backes.

These warres being ended: Fuluius and Manlius were appointed by the Senate, each of them to retaine as Proconsul, his Prouince for another yeere. Fuluius, in his second yeere, did little or nothing. Manlius gaue peace to those whom he had vanquished; as likewise to Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselues for feare of the Roman armes. He drew from them all, what profit he could: and laid vpon them such conditions, as he thought expedient. He also did finish the league of peace with Antiochus; whereto hee swore, and receiued the Kings oath oath by Embassadors, whom he sent for that purpose. Finally, hauing set in order the matters of Asia, he took his way toward the Hellespont, loaden with spoyle, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallo-Greeks had in so many yeers extorted, from the wealthy Prouinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Armie of Manlius returne home, rich in money alone, or cattell, or things of needfull vse, which the Roman souldier had beene wont to take as the onely good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous housholdstuffe, and slaues of price, excellent Cookes, and Musicians for banquets, and in a word, with the seedes of that luxurie, which finally ouer-grew and choked the Roman vertue.

The Country of Thrace lay between Hellespont & the kingdome of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his iourney homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he passed through them, without any such booty as might prouoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stirre. But when Manlius came along with a huge traine of baggage; the Thracians could not so well contain themselues. Neither was it thought, that Philip tooke it otherwise than very pleasantly, to haue this Roman Armie robbed, & well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angry, seeing how little himselfe was regarded, and what great rewards were giuen to Eumenes. For he vnderstood, and afterwards gaue the Romans to vnderstand, that Eumenes could not haue abidden in his owne kingdome, if the people of Rome had not made warre in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered vnto himselfe three thousand talents, and fiftie ships of warre, to take part with him and the Ætolians, promising moreouer to restore vnto him all the Greeke Cities, that had been taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference between him and Eumenes, when the warre began: he thought it no euen dealing of the Romans, after their victory, to giue away not only the halfe of Asia, but Chersonnesus & Lysimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas vpon himselfe they bestowed not any one Towne. It agreed not indeed with his Nobilitie to goe to Rome and begge Prouinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. He had entertained louingly the two Scipio's, which he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was grown into neer acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by letters, whereby hee made himselfe acquainted with the warres in Spaine and Africke. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes tooke a surer way. For the Scipio's had not a disposing of that which they wonne from Antiochus: as neitheir indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates assisting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceed. When Philip therfore saw these vpstart kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, aduanced so highly, and made greater than himselfe; yea himselfe vnregarded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to wish, that he had not so hastily declared himselfe against Antiochus, or rather that he had ioyned with Antiochus and the Ætolians, by whom he might haue beene freed from his insolent Masters. But what great argument of such discontentednes the Macedonian had, we shall very shortly be vrged to discourse more at large. At the present it was beleeued, that the Thracians were by him set on, to assaile the Romans passing through their Country. They knew all aduantages; and they fell, vnexpected, vpon the carriages, that were bestowed in the midst of the Armie; whereof part had already passed a dangerous wood, through which the baggage followed; part was not yet so farre aduanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leaue behind: though both the getting and the sauing, did cost many liues, as well of the Barbarians, as of the Romans. They fought vntill it grew to night: & then the Thracians withdrew themselues; not without as much of the bootie, as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though lesse dangerous, before the Armie could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the kingdome they had a faire march into Epirus; and so to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the Citie, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: especially to Manlius, whom some of the ten Delegates, appointed to assist him, did very bitterly taxe, as an vnworthy commander. Touching the rest of their accusation; it sufficeth that hee made good answer, and was approoued by the chiefe of the Senate. One clause is worthy of more particular consideration. Reprehending his desire to haue hindred the peace with Antiochus;

Liu. l. 38. they said, That with much adoe he was kept from leading his Armie ouer Taurus, and aduenturing vpon the calamitie threatned by Sibyls verses, vnto those that should passe the fatall bounds. What calamitie or ouerthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls prophecie threatned the Roman Captaine or Armie, that should passe ouer Taurus, I doe not conceiue. Pompey was the first, that marched with an Armie beyond those limits: though the victories of Lucullus had opened vnto him the way, and had before-hand won, in a sort, the Countries on the other side of the Mount; which Lucullus gaue to one of Antiochus his race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we finde not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any losse, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeed the accomplishment of this prophecie, fell out neere about one time, with the restitution of Ptolomie king of Egypt, that was forbidden vnto the Romans by the same Sibyl. It may therefore seeme to haue had reference vnto the same things, that were denounced, as like to happen vpon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tullie noteth, sowed at randome in the large field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by euent; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptolomie to his kingdome by Gabinius the Roman, should haue any way betokened the comming of our Sauiour: as some both ancient and moderne Christian Writers haue been well pleased to interpret Sibyl in that prophecie. Of the Sibylline prædictions, I haue sometimes thought reuerently: though not knowing what they were (as I thinke few men know) yet following the common beleefe and good authority. But obseruation of the shamefull Idolatry, that vpon all occasions was aduanced in Rome by the books of Sibyl, had well preuailed vpon my credulitie, and made me suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the iudgement of Eusebius: when that learned and excellent work of Master Casaubon vpon the Annales of Cardinall Baronius, did altogether free me from mine errour; making it apparant, That not onely those prophecies of Sibyl, wherin Christ so plainly was shewed, but euen the bookes of Hermes, which haue borne such reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained (whosoeuer deuised them) by the vndiscreet zeale of such, as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthened with forrein proofs. And in the same ranke, I thinke, we ought to place that notable Historie, reported by Eusebius from no meane Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely, of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy god. For what can bee more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publike, should haue beene quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Phylosophers and Poets would not haue suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it beene true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then liued and flourished, would haue abstained from speaking any word of an Argument so famous. Wherefore I am perswaded, that this inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some bad Criticisme, taken amisse in place of Semoni Sango: a title foure hundred yeeres older than the time of Simon Magus. For the goods of one Vitruuius a Rebell, had many ages before beene consecrated Semoni Sango, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sangus, in whose Chappell they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, or by some spoile that Time had wrought vpon them; it might easily come to passe, that the words should be misse-read, Simoni Sancto, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sangus, therupon should frame the coniecture, which now passeth for a true Historie. Such coniectures, being entertained without examination, find credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more Historicall, than was conceiued by the Authour. But it cannot bee safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firme vpon a sure foundation) leane ouer-hardly on a well painted, yet rotten post.

Euseb. Eccl. hist. c. 13.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbred among a few of the richest, which euer the Citie beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasurie, was made the last paiment of those monies which the common-wealth had borrowed from priuate men, in the second Punick warre. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memorie, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, euen so long as hee well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the Citie, vntill the

the heat of an Inquisition, than raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipio's were called one after other, into iudgement, by two Tribunes of the people; men, onely by this actusation, knowne to Posteritie. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that such vnworthy men should question him, of purloyning from the Common Treasury, or of being hired with bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargaine for his Countrey. When therefore his day of answer came; hee appeared before the Tribunes, not humbly as one accused, but followed by a great traine of his friends and Clients, with which he passed through the middest of the Assembly, and offered himselfe to speake. Having audience, he told the people, That vpon the same day of the yeere hee had fought a great battaile with Hannibal, & finished the Punick Warre by a figd nall victory. In memory whereof, he thought it no fit season to brabble at the Law; but intended to visit the Capitoll, and there giue thankes to Iupiter, and the rest of the gods; by whose grace, both on that day and at other times, he had well & happily discharged the most weighty businesse of the Common-weale. And hereto he inuited with him all the Citizens: requesting them, That if euer since the seuenteenth yeare of his life, vntill he grew old, the honourable places by them conferred vpon him, had preuented the antetitia of his age, and yet his deserts had exceeded the greatnesse of those honourable places: then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their Citie might still be like to him. These words were heard with great approbation: so as all the people, euen the Officers of the court, followed Scipio, leauing the Tribunes alone, with none about them, except only their own slaues & a Crier, by whom ridiculously they cited him to iudgement; vntill for very shame, as not knowing what else to doe, they granted him, vnrequested, a further day. After this, when the African perceiued that the Tribunes would not let fall their suit, but enforce him to submit himselfe to a disgracefull triall: he willingly relinquished the Citie, & his vnthankefull Romans, that could suffer him to vndergoe so much indignitie. The rest of his time he spent at Liternum: quietly with a few of his inward friends, and without any desire of seeing Rome again. How many yeers he liued, or whether he liued one whole yeere in this voluntary banishment, it is vncertaine. The report of his dying in the same yeere with Hannibal and Philopœmen, as also of his priuate behauiour at Liternum, render it probable, that he out-liued the Tribuneship of his accusers; who meant to haue drawn him back to his answer, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the rest from proceeding) had not caused them to desist. However it was; the same Tribunes went more sharply to work with L. Scipio the Asiatique. They propounded a Decree vnto the people, touching mony receiued of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treasury; that the Senate should giue charge vnto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and iudicially determine thereof. In fauour of this Decree, an Oration was made by Cato, the supposed author of these contentions, and instigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect, vertue; temperate, valiant, and of singular industrie; frugall also, both of the publike, and of his owne; so as in this kinde he was euen faultie: for though he would not be corrupted with bribes, yet was he vnmercifull and vnconscionable, in seeking to increase his owne wealth, by such means as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poysoned with enuie, troubled both himselfe and the whole Citie, whilest he liued. His meane birth caused him to hate the Nobilitie, especially those that were in chiefe estimation. Neither did he spare to bite at such as were of his own ranke, men raised by desert, if their aduancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whose Lieutenant he had beene at Thermopylæ, was his Competitor for the Censorship, and likely to carry it, he tooke an Oath against him, which was counted as no better than malicious periurie; That he had not brought into the common Treasury some vessels of gold & siluer, gotten in the Campe of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare vnto the Scipio's, grew partly, (besides his generall spight at the Nobility) from his owne first rising, wherin he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from some checke, that was giuen vnto himself, in the African voyage, by P. Scipio, whose Treasurer he then was. For when Cato did vtter his dislike of the Consuls had husbandry (iudging Magnificence to be no better) in some peremptory manner; Scipio plainly told him, That hee had no need of such double diligence in his Treasurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lyes he published, or for want of iudgment, thinking vnworthily of the vertue that was farre aboue him, Cato filled Rome with vntrue reports against his Generall; whose noble deedes confuted sufficiently the author of such false tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought vpon by the Scipio's, whilest it was nourished by their enemy, brake out vpon aduantage, especially against L. Scipio: his brother being dead, or out of the way. A seuere inquiry and indgement being appointed of purpose against Scipio, matters were so carried, that he was seene condemned in a sum of money, far exceeding his ability to pay. For non payment, his body should haue been laid vp in prison: but from this rigour of the Law he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the same Tribune who had caused the suite against the African to be let fall. In his estate, which was confiscated to the vse of the Citie, when there neither appeared any signe of his hauing beene beholding to Antiochus, nor was found so much as what he had beene condemned to pay; then fell his accusers, and all whose hands had been against him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kinred, friends, and Clients made such a collection for him, as would haue set him in better estate than before, if he had accepted it. Hee tooke no more than such of his owne goods, as were of necessary vse, being redeemed for him by his neerest friends.

And thus began the ciuill warre of the Tongue, in the Roman pleadings: which had either not beene, or not beene much regardable, vntill now, since the Punicke Warre. Securitie of danger from abroad; and some want of sufficient employment, were especiall helpes to the kindling of this fire; which first caught hold vpon that great Worthy, to whose vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into so great security her extreme danger. But these factious contentions did no long while contain themselues within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude, in such quarrelsome businesse, grew to perfection, they that found themselues ouer-matched by their aduersaries at this kinde of weapon, began to make opposition, first, with clubs & stones, afterward with swords; and finally, proceeded from frayes & murders in the streets, vnto battaile in the open field. Cornelia, daughter of Scipio the African, a Lady of rare vertue, that in honour of her two sonnes was more commonly named Mother of the Gracchi, saw those her two sons, whilest they were but yong, slaughtered in Rome, together with some of their friends, by those whom they opposed, and their death not reuenged by order of Law, but rather approued by the Senate. At these times the Senatours began to take vpon them authoritie, more than was to them belonging. They conferred vpon the Consuls all the whole power of the Citie, vnder this forme, Let the Consuls prouide, that the Commonweale receiue no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemy to the State, they thought to haue wonne a great aduantage ouer the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturninus a popular man, whom by such authority they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marius, a famous Captaine of theirs, was so condemned; who by force of armes returned into the Citie, and murdered all the principall Senators: whereupon began the ciuill warres; which giuing vnto Sylla, who preuailed therin, means to make himselfe absolute Lord of Rome, taught Cæsar, a man of higher spirit, to affect and obtaine the like soueraign power, when by the like Decree of the Senate he was prouoked. It is true, that neuer any Consul had finally cause to reioyce, of his hauing put in execution such authority to him committed by the Senate. But as the furie of the multitude, in passing their Lawes by hurling of stones, and other violence, made the Citie stand in need of a Soueraigne Lord: so the vehemency of the Senate, in condemning as enemies those that would not submit themselues, when they were ouer-topped by voyces in the House, did compell Cæsar, or giue him at least pretence, to right himselfe by armes: wherewith preuailing against his aduersaries, hee tooke such order, that neither Senate nor people, should thenceforth be able to doe him wrong. So by intestine discord, the Romans consuming all or most of their principal citizens, lost their owne freedome, and became subiects vnto the arbitrary gouernment of one: suffering this change in three generations, after this beginning of their insolent rule, wherein they tooke vpon them as the highest Lords on earth, to doe euen what they listed. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto vnto compleat greatnesse, nor beleeued of her selfe as if shee had, whilest a king sate crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and vpholding the reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this consummation of her honour was thought vpon betimes. How it was effected, the sequele will discouer.

Chap. VI.

The second Macedonian Warre.

The Condition wherein those Princes and Estates remained, which were associates of the Romans, when the warre with Antiochus was finished. The Romans quarrell with Philip. They deale insolently with the Achæans. The Macedonian, being vnreadie for warre, obtaines peace at Rome, by his sonne Demetrius; of whom thenceforth hee becomes iealous.

After the ouerthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweale of the Achæans, and all other the States of Greece, were gouerned by the same Lawes and Magistrates, as they formerly had beene, before the arriuall of the Romans in those parts: yet in very truth (the publike declaration excepted) they were none other than absolute vassals to the People of Rome. For of those fiue Prerogatiues belonging to a Monarch, or vnto Soueraigne power, in whomsoeuer it rest; namely, To make Lawes, To create Magistrates, To arbitrate Peace and warre, To beate Monie, and to reserue (as the French call it) le dernier resort, or the last Appeales, the Romans had assumed foure; and the greatest of them so absolutely, that is, The Appeale, or last resort, as euery petty iniurie offered to each other by the forenamed Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embassadors, or Commissioners, in those places whence the Complaint came, or otherwise by the Senators themselues within Rome; from whose arbitrement, or direction, if either King, or Common-weales, declined, He or they were beaten, and inforced to obedience; or had their Estates and Regalities vtterly dissolued. Neuertheless it is true, that they had their owne Lawes, and Offices of their owne ordaining: yet so, as neither their Lawes were of force, when the Romans interposed their will to the contrary, neither was their election of Magistrates so free, as that they had not therein especiall regard vnto the good pleasure of these their Masters.

And to such degree of seruitude the seuerall Estates of Greece did bow very gently: either as being thankefull for their deliuerance from a yoke more sensibly grieuous; or, as being skilfull in the Art of flattery, and therin taking delight, since therin consisted their chiefe hope of thriuing; or, as being more fearful of displeasing the strongest, than mindfull of their owne honour. But Eumenes liuing further off, and being most obsequious vnto the Romans, was not, of long time, questioned about any of his doings: his conformitie vnto them in matter of warre & peace, together with the diuersion of their thoughts another way, giuing him leaue to vse his owne euen as he listed, vntill they should otherwise dispose of him. Neither was it a little auaileable to him, that his kingdome bordered vpon the Nations, by them not throughly subdued. For vpon the same reason (as well as vpon his owne high deserts) were they very louing vnto Masanissa, and to his House, vntill Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion setled in Africke: as likewise afterwards to the kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others holding people in subiection vnto themselues, by the Ministery of kings; especially of such Kings, as were vsefull and obsequious vnto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper; & shewed himselfe not forgetfull of his owne former greatnesse, the honour of his race, or the high reputation of his kingdome. But such magnanimity was none otherwise construed by the Romans, than as want of due reuerence to their estate, & a valuation of himselfe against them: which, in the pride of their fortune, they could not indure. Wherfore notwithstanding that he had lately giuen passage to their Armies through his country, prepared the wayes for them; and furnished them both with victuals, and other things needfull, to transport them ouer the Hellespont into Asia, against Antiochus: yet vpon the complaint of Eumenes, and the States of Thessalie and Thrace, he was commanded to abandon the Cities of Ænus and Maronea, Maronea, with all Pieces and Places demanded by any of his neighbours; whereof many of them he had lately conquered, by direction, or licence, euen from the Romans themselues.

These townes of Ænus and Maronea had beene part of Lysimachus his Kingdome: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the Northwest, extended his dominion very far. He is thought to haue made himselfe Lord of Transyluania: in which Prouince it is said, *That innumerable Medals of gold haue beene found, in the age of our grandfathers, each of them weighing two or three crownes, and stamped with his Image on the one side, on the other side with Victorie. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title (for he liued not to settle his estate in Europe) fel to Seleucus Nicator by right of war, wherein he vanquished and slew Lysimachus: as also, by the like right, Ptolemie Ceraunus thought them his owne, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gaules, which the kingdome of Macedon could not sustaine, did shortly and easily wash away from that crowne, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heapes of land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the sonne of Demetrius, and his successors: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The furie of the Gaules being ouer-past, those Countries which lately had beene oppressed by them, recouered their libertie, and not onely held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wilde Thracians, to finde their aduantages, and make vse of them, euen vpon Macedon. Against the mischiefs commonly done by these, king Philip did prouide the most conuenient remedies: by shutting vp the wayes, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his kingdome; and by occupying Lysimachia, with some other townes in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarkes of his owne Countrey, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behooued him thus to doe, for the defence of his owne estate: yet forasmuch as these Townes were, in a manner, at absolute libertie, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of iustice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Ætolians, of wrongfull vsurpation and oppression, in his hauing occupied Lysimachia. Heereunto hee made a good answer, That his Garrison did only saue it from the Thracians: who, as soone as he thence withdrew his men, did seize vpon the Towne, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might haue said, touching Ænus and Maronea; That they were places vnable to defend themselues, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might haue entrance into his kingdom. But this Plea had not availed him, in the disputation about Lysimachia: & in the present question, the Romans were not without their owne title; since Antiochus had gotten all the Country thereabout, whilest Philip was busied in his former warre: and since they, by their victory had gotten vnto themselues all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he onely submitted his right vnto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it vnto their disposition, Whether Ænus and Maronea should be set at libertie: whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed vpon Eumenes; who begged them, as an appendix to Lysimachia & Chersonesus, that were already his by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceiue, by the demeanor of their Embassadors towards him: who sitting as Iudges between him and all that made complaint vpon him, gaue sentence against him in euery controuersie. Neuertheless, he sent Embassadors to Rome, there to maintaine his right vnto these Townes; wherein he thought, that equitie (if it might preuaile) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the warre against Antiochus and the Ætolians: wherein whatsoeuer hee had gotten for himselfe, was now taken from him by their Embassadours: and would they now depriue him of those two Townes, lying so fitly for the guard of his kingdome, which he had gotten to himselfe out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his owne ruines Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deale more? By such allegations either he was likely to preuaile, or at least wise to gaine time, wherein he might bethinke himselfe what he had to doe. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equall to him, than had beene their Embassadors. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaued themselues, in pleading against him for their liberty, hee tooke counsell of his owne passions; and (as by nature he was very cruell) gaue order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such sort, as they might haue little ioy of the libertie by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thra-cians by night, that they might lacke the Towne, and vse all cruelties of warre. This was done: but so it taken by the Roman Embassadors, who had better notice, than could haue beene feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Maiestie, to an accompt. He would haue remooued the blame from himselfe, and layed it euen vpon the Maronites; affirming, that they, in heat of their Factions, being some inclinable to him, other some to Eumenes, had fallen into such outrage, that they had cut one anothers throates. And hereof he willed the Embassadours to enquire, among the Maronites themselues: as well knowing, that they who suruiued, were either his owne friends; or so terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durst not vtter an offensiue word. But he found the Romans more seuere, and more throughly informed in the businesse, than to rest contented with such an answer. He was plainely told, That if he would discharge himselfe of the crime obiected; he must send Onomastus and Cassander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate should thinke fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his spirits, and said, that Cassander should be at their disposition: but concerning Onomastus, who had not beene at Maronea, nor neere to it, he requested them not to presse him; since it stood not with his honour, so lightly to giue away his friends. As for Cassander, because hee should tell no tales; hee tooke order to haue him poysoned by the way. By this wee see, that the doctrine, which Machiauel taught vnto Cæsar Borgia, to employ men in mischieuous actions, and afterwards to destroy them when they haue performed the mischiefe; was not of his owne inuention. All ages haue giuen vs examples of this goodly policie, the later hauing beene apt schollers in this lesson to the more ancient: as the reigne of Henry the eighth here in England, can beare good witnesse; and therein especially the Lord Cromwell, who perished by the same vniust Law that himselfe had deuised, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an vnpleasant noise at Rome, & were like to haue brought vpon him the warre which he feared, before hee was ready to entertaine it. Wherefore he employed his younger son Demetrius as Embassadour vnto the Senate: giuing him instructions, how to make answer to all complaints, and withall to deliuer his owne grieuances, in such wise that if ought were amisse, yet might it appeare that hee had beene strongly vrged to take such courses. The summe of his Embassage was, to pacifie the Romans, and make all euen for the present. Demetrius himselfe was knowne to be very acceptable vnto the Senate, as hauing beene well approued by them, when he was hostage in Rome: and therefore seemed the more likely, to preuaile somewhat; were it onely in regard that would be borne vnto his person.

Whilest this businesse with the Macedonian hung in suspense, and whilest hee, by his readinesse to make submission, seemed likely to diuert from himselfe some other way the Roman armes: the same Embassadours, that had beene Iudges betweene him and his neighbours, made their progresse through the rest of Greece; and tooke notice of the controuersies, which they found betweene some Estates in the Countrey. The greatest cause that was heard before them, was the complaint of the banished Lacedæmonians against the Achæans. It was obiected vnto the Achæans, That they had committed a grieuous slaughter vpon many Citizens of Lacedæmon: That vnto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing downe the walls of the Citie: as also further, in changing the Lawes, and abrogating the famous Institutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycortas, then Prætor of the Achæans, made answer, That these banished Lacedæmonians, who now tooke vpon them to accuse the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriously known to be the men, who had themselues committed that murder, whereof shamelesly they laid the blame vpon others: the Achæans hauing onely called those vnto iudgement, they were supposed to bee chiefe authours of a Rebellion against both them and the Romans; and these plaintifes hauing slaine them, vpon priuate, though iust hatred, as they were comming to make answer for themselues. Concerning their throwing downe the walls of Lacedæmon, he said it was most agreeable to Lycurgus his ordinance: who, hauing perswaded his Citizens to defend their Towne and libertie by their proper vertue, did inhibite vnto them all kindes of fortifications: as the Retraits and Nests either of Cowards, or Whereof Lacedæmon had wofull experience of Tyrants and Vsurpers. Further he shewed, how the same Tyrants that had built these walls and hemmed in the Spartans, had also quite abolished Lycurgus his ordinances, and gouerned the Citie by their owne lawlesse will. As for the Achæans, they communicated their owne Lawes, which they held for the best, or else would soone change them and take better, vnto the Lacedæmonians; whom they found without Lawes, or any tolerable forme of policie. For conclusion, Lycortas plainely tolde App. Claudius the chiefe of the Embassadours, That hee and his Countrimen held it strange, being friends and faithfull Allies of the Romans, to see themselues thus constrained, to answer and giue account of their actions, as vassals and slaues to the People of Rome. For if they were indeed at libertie: why might not the Achæans as well require to be satisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did busie themselues, to take account how things went at Lacedæmon? For if the Romans would stand vpon their greatnesse; and intimate, as they began, that the liberty of their friends was nothing worth, longer than should please themselues to ratifie it: then must the Achæans haue recourse vnto those Agreements, that were confirmed by oath, & which without periurie could not be violated; as reuerencing, and indeed fearing the Romans, but much more, the immortall gods. To this bold answer of Lycortas, Appius found little to reply. Yet taking state vpon him; he pronounced more like a Master than a Iudge, That if the Achæans would not be ruled by faire meanes, and earne thankes whilest they might; they should be compelled with a mischiefe, to doe what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This altercation was in the Parliament of the Achæans, which groned to heare the Lordly words of Appius. Yet feare preuailed aboue Indignation: and it was permitted vnto the Romanes to doe as they listed. Hereupon the Embassadours restored some banished and condemned men: but the Romane Senate, very soone after, did make voide all iudgements of death or banishment, that had beene laid by the Achæans vpon any Citizen of Lacedæmon; as likewise they made it a matter of disputation, whether or no the Citie and Territory of Lacedæmon, should be suffered to continue a member of the Achæan Cómon-wealth; or taken from them, and made as it had beene an Estate by it selfe. By bringing such a matter into question, the Romans well declared, That they held it to depend vpon their owne will, how much or how little any of their confederates should be suffered to enioy: though by contributing Sparta to the Councell of Achaia, they discouered no lesse, as to them seemed, the loue which they bare vnto the Achaians, than the power which they had ouer them.

Into such slauery had the Greeks, & all kings and Common-weales whatsoeuer, bordering vpon any part of the Mediterran Seas, reduced themselues; by calling in the Romans to their succour. They wanted not the good counsaile & perswasion of many wise and temperate men among them; They had also the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gauls and Africans, all subdued by the Romans; and, by seeking Patronage, made meere vassals; to instruct them, what in the like case they should expect: yet could not the true reasons of Estate and Policie so preuaile with them, but their priuate passions, & neighbouring hatred, which hath euermore bought reuenge at the price of self-ruine, brought them from the honour which they enioyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into most base and fearefull seruilitie.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who though he saw the Greeks very farre from daring to stirre against those, by whom both hee and they were kept in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans by freeing from his subiection had made his implacable enemies) in heartie affection all the Countrey would be his, whensoeuer he should take armes, as shortly hee was like to doe. Young Demetrius, comming home from Rome, brought with him the desired ratification of peace; though qualified with much indignitie soone following. Hee had beene louingly vsed at Rome, and heard with great fauour in the Senate: There, being confounded with the multitude of obiections, whereto his youth, vnskilful in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make answer, it was permitted vnto him, to reade such briefe notes as he had receiued from his Father; and out of those the Senate were contented to gather satisfaction, more for Demetrius his owne sake, as they then said, and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodnesse in the defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the intreatie of his sonne, together with some insolence of his sonne, growing (as appeared) from this fauour of the Romans, did increase in Philip his his hatred vnto Rome, and breed in him a iealousie of his too forward sonne. To set him forward in these passions, there came daily new Embassadours from Rome, some bringing one commandement, some another; and some, requiring him to fulfill those things, which had beene imposed vpon him by their fore-goers. Neither were there wanting that obserued his countenance: and when hee had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge that he had done things vnwillingly, and would be obedient, no longer than hee needes must. With these Embassadours young Demetrius was conuersant: rather perhaps out of simplicitie, and for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious respect; yet a great deale more than was pleasing to his father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perseus, the elder son of the king, should not succeed vnto his father; but that the Diademe should be conferred vpon Demetrius, if not by some other pretence, yet by meere fauour of the Romans. This offended not onely Perseus, but Philip himselfe: who suspected his younger sonne, as more Roman than his owne; and accordingly misconstrued all his doings. But ere we proceed vnto the bitter fruits of this iealousie; it will not be amisse, to speake of some memorable accidents that were in the meane time.

§ II.

The death of Philopœmen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Militarie profession is of all other the most vnhappie: notwithstanding some examples, which may seeme to proue the contrary.

THE Romans, wanting other matter of quarrell in the Continent of Greece, had of late beene so peremptorie with the Achæans; that they seemed not vnlikely to take part against them, in any controuersie that should bee moued. Hereupon the Messenians, who against their will were annexed vnto the Achæan Commonwealth, hauing long beene of a contrary Faction thereto, grew bold to withdraw themselues from that Societie, with purpose to set vp againe an Estate of their owne, seuered from communion with any other. This was the deuice of some that were powerfull in their Citie: who finding the multitude onely inclinable to their purpose, and not ouer-strongly affected in the businesse; were carefull to seeke occasion of reducing things to such passe, that all their Citizens might bee entangled in a necessitie of standing out, and of not returning to the Achæan League. And hereupon they began to doe some acts of hostilitie; whereby it was probable that blood should bee drawne, and either side so farre exasperated, that little hope of agreement would bee left. Vpon the fame of their commotion and proceedings; Philopœmen, then Prætor of the Achæans, leuied such forces as hee could in haste, and went against them. Many principall Gentlemen of the Achæans, especially of the Megalopolitans, were soon in a readinesse to wait vpon him. Besides these, which were all, or for the most part, Horse; he had some Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that vsually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captaine of the Messenians; whom hee charged, and forced to runne. But whilest his horsemen were too earnest in following the chase, there arriued, by chance, a supply of fiue hundred from Messene, which gaue new courage vnto those that were fled. So the Enemies began to make head againe; and with the helpe of those, who very seasonably came to their aide, compelled Philopœmens Horsemen to turne backe. Philopœmen himselfe had long beene sicke of an Ague, and was then very weake: yet the greatnesse of his courage would not suffer him, to bee negligent of their safetie, which had so willingly aduentured themselues vnder his conduct. Hee tooke vpon him to make the Retrait; and suffering his Horsemen to passe along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about against the Messenians; whom his reputation, and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrifie from approaching ouer-neere to him. But it fell out vnhappily, that being cast to ground by a fall of his Horse, and being withall in very weake plight of body, he was vnable to get vp againe. So the Enemies came vpon him, and tooke him; yet scarce beleeued their fortune to be so good, although their eyes were witnesses. The first messenger that brought these newes to Messene, was so farre from being beleeued, that he was hardly thought to bee in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the Citie ranne foorth to meet him, and behold the spectacle seeming so incredible. They caused him to be brought into the Theater, that there they might satisfie themselues with beholding him. The greatest part of them had compassion on his misfortune: and in commemoration both of his vertue, and of the singular benefits by him done vnto them, especially in deliuering them from Nabis the Tyrant; began to manifest their good will for his deliuerie. Contrariwise, Dinocrates and his Faction were desirous hastily to take away his life: because they held him a man implacable, and one that would neuer leaue any disgrace, or iniurie done to him, vnreuenged. They durst not one trust another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a strong vault vnder ground, that had beene made for the custody of their Treasure. So thither they let him downe fast bound, and with an engine laid an heauie stone vpon the mouth of the vault. There hee had not stayed long, ere his enemies had concluded his present death. The Hangman of the Citie was let downe vnto him, with a cup of poyson, which Philopœmen tooke in his hand: and asking no more than whether the Horsmen were escaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was safe; when he heard an answer to his minde, hee said it was well: and so with a cheerefull countenance, dranke his last draught. He was seuentie yeeres old, and weakned with long sickenesse, whereby the poyson wrought the sooner, and easily tooke away his life. The Achæans, when they missed him in their flight, were maruellously offended with themselues, for that they had beene more mindefull to preserue their owne liues, than to looke vnto the safetie of so excellent a Commander. Whilest they were deuising what to doe in such a case: they got aduertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: so as Embassadours were forthwith dispatched vnto Messene, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtaine it by force, in case that faire meanes would not serue. Lycortas was chosen Generall of the Armie against Messene: who comming thither, and laying siege to the Towne, enforced it in short space to yeeld. Then Dinocrates, knowing what he was to expect, laid hands vpon himselfe, and made an end of his owne life. The rest of those that had beene partakers in the murder, were compelled to wait in bonds vpon the ashes of Philopœmen that were carried home in solemne pompe to Megalopolis; where they were all of them slaine at his funerall, as sacrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended. Flaminius, a Roman Embassadour, was then in Greece; whence, vpon one occasion or other, the Romane Embassadours were seldome absent. Hee would haue entermedled in this businesse of Messene, had not Lycortas made short worke, and left him nothing to doe.

About the same time was T. Quintius Flaminius sent Embassadour to Prusias King of Bithynia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the war against Eumenes, as to entreat him, that he would deliuer Hannibal, the most spightful enemy in all the world vnto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (therein vnworthy of the Crowne he wore) did readily condescend: or rather (as Liuie thinkes) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliuer him aliue to Flaminius. For vpon the first conference betweene the King and Flaminius, a troupe of Souldiers were directed to guard and enuiron the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captaine hauing found cause before this to suspect the faith of Prusias, had deuised some secret sallies vnder-ground to saue himselfe from any treasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedy: which he then was constrained to practise, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing ouer him, as to saue himselfe from their fortune and mercilesse hands; who, as hee well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprises, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no way of escape, nor counsell to resort vnto, hee tooke the poyson into his hand, which he alwaies preserued for a sure Antidote against the sharpest diseases of aduerse fortune; which being ready to swallow downe, he vttered these words: I will now (said he) deliuer the Romans of that feare, which hath so many yeeres possest them; that feare, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victory of Flaminius, ouer me, which am disarmed, and betrayed into his hands, shall neuer bee numbred among the rest of his heroicall deedes: No, it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the world, how farre the ancient Roman vertues degenerate and corrupted. For such was the nobleneſſe of them for fathers; as, when Pyrrhus inuaded them in Italie, and was ready to giue them battaile at their verie doores, they gaue him knowledge of the treason intended against him by poy- son; whereas these of a later race haue employed Flaminius, a man who hath heretofore beene one of their Consuls, to practise with Prusias, contrary to the honour of a King, contrary to his Faith giuen, and contrary to the Lawes of Hospitalitie, to slaughter or deliuer vp his owne Guest. He then cursing the person of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortall gods to reuenge his infidelitie, dranke off the poyson, and died.

In this yeere also (as good Authors haue reported) to accompanie Philopœmen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African: these being, all of them, as great Captaines as euer the world had; but not more famous, than vnfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, whose Tragedie we haue now finished, had he beene Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authority might haue commanded such supplies, as the Warre which he vndertooke, required; it is probable, that he had torne vp the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was so strongly crost by a cowardly and enuious Faction at home, as his proper vertue, wanting publike force to sustaine it, did lastly dissolue it selfe in his owne, and in the common miserie of his Countrey and Common-weale.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the enuie of our equals, and iealousie of our Masters, be they Kings, or Commonweales, That there is no Profession more vnprosperous than that of Men of Warre, and great Captaines, being no Kings. For besides the enuie and iealousie of men, the spoyles, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastation, and burnings, with a world of miseries laid on the labouring man, are so hatefull to God, as with good reason did Monluc the Marshall of France confesse, That, were not the mercies of God infinite, and without restriction, it were in vaine for those of his profession to hope for any portion of them: seeing the cruelties by them permitted and committed, were also infinite. Howsoeuer, this is true, That the victories, which are obtained by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serue vnder them, to Fortune, or to the cowardise of the Nation against whom they serue. For the most of others, whose vertues, haue raised them aboue the leuell of their inferiours, and haue surmounted their enuie: yet haue they beene rewarded in the end, either with disgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans we finde many examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Liuius, L. Æmilius, and this our Scipio, whom wee haue lately buried. Among the Greekes wee reade of not many, that escaped these rewards. Yea, long before these times, it was a Legacie that Dauid bequeathed vnto his victorious Captaine Ioab. With this fare Alexander feasted Permenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereto Valentinian the Emperour inuited Ætius: who, after many other victories, ouerthrew Attila of the Hunnes, in the greatest battaile, for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that euer was strucken in the world; for there fell of those that fought, beside runne-awayes, an hundred and fourescore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told vnto the Emperour by Proximus, That in killing of Ætius, hee had cut off his owne right hand with his left: for it was not long after that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian slue Ætius) murdered the Emperour; which hee neuer durst attempt, Ætius liuing. And, besides the losse of that Emperour, it is true, That with Ætius, the glory of the Westerne Empire was rather dissolued than obscured. The same vnworthy destinie, or farre worse, had Bellisarius; whose vndertakings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torne out of his head by Iustinian: and hee died a blinde beggar. Narses also, to the great preiudice of Christian Religion, was disgrac'd by Iustine. That rule of Cato against Scipio, hath been well obserued in euery age since then; to wit, That the Common-weale cannot be accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence hath the Turkes drawne another Principle, and indeed a Turkish one, That euery warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of Warre, than suffer his owne glory to be obscured by them. For this cause did Bajazet the second dispatch Bassa Acomat; Selim strangle Bassa Mustapha; and most of those Princes bring to ruine the most of their Visiers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gonsalus, who draue the French out of Naples: and Ferdinando Cortese, who conquered Mexico; were crowned with nettles, not with Lawrell. The Earles of Egmond and Horn, had no heads left them to weare garlands on. And that the great Captaines of all Nations haue beene paid with this copper Coine; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary it may be said, That many haue acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great abilitie in matter of warre. This I confesse. Yet must it be had withall in consideration, that these high places haue beene giuen, or offered, vnto very few, as rewards of their militarie vertue; though many haue vsurped them, by the helpe and fauour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it vnregardable, That the Tyrants which haue oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emperours, which haue traiterously cast downe their Masters, and stepped vp into their seats; were not all of them good men of warre: but haue vsed the aduantage of some commotion, or many of them by base and cowardly practices, haue obtained those dignities, which vndeseruedly were ascribed to their personall worth. So that the number of those, that haue purchased absolute greatnesse by the greatnes of their warlike vertue, is farre more in seeming, than in deed. Phocas was a Souldiour, and by helpe of the Souldiours he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but he was a coward; and with a barbarous crueltie, seldome found in any other than cowards, he slew first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that neuer had done him wrong, before his face, and after them Mauritius himselfe. This his bloudy aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid vnto him againe by Heraclius: who tooke from him the Imperiall Crowne, vniustly gotten; and set it on his owne head. Leontius laid hold vpon the Emperour Iustine, cut off his nose and eares, and sent him into banishment: But Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge hee had left his owne men of warre. Iustine, hauing recouered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same fashion. Philippicus, commanding the forces of Iustine, murdered both the Emperour and his sonne. Anastatius, the vassall of this new Tyrant, surprised his Master Philippicus, and thrust out both his eyes. But with Anastasius, Theodosius dealt more gently: for hauing wrested the Scepter out of his hands, he enforced him to become a Priest. It were an endlesse, and a needlesse worke to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodosius; how many others haue beene repayed with their owne crueltie, by men alike ambitious and cruell; or how many hundreds, or rather thousands, hoping of Captaines to make themselues Kings, haue by Gods iustice miserably perished in the attempt. The ordinarie, and perhaps the best way of thriuing, by the practice of Armes, is to take what may be gotten by the spoyle of Enemies, and the liberalitie of those Princes and Cities, in whose seruice one hath well deserued. But scarce one of a thousand haue prospered by this course. For that obseruation, made by Salomon, of vnthankfulnesse in this kinde, hath beene found belonging to all Countries and Ages: A little Citie, and few men in it, and a great King came against it, and compassed it about, and builded Forts against it: And there was found a poore and wise man therein, and hee deliuered the Citie by his wisdome: but none remembred this poore man. Great Monarchs are vnwilling to pay great thankes, lest thereby they should acknowledge themselues to haue beene indebted for great benefits: which the vnwiser sort of them think to sauour of some impotency in themselues. But in this respect they are oftentimes cousened and abused; which proues that weaknesse to be in them indeed, whereof they so gladly shun the opinion. Contrariwise, free Estates are bountifull in giuing thankes; yet so, as those thankes are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Captaines haue made, by enriching themselues with the spoyle of the enemie, they are very inquisitiue to search into it, and to strip the wel-deseruers out of their gettings: yea most iniuriously to rob them of their owne, vpon a false supposition: that euen they whose hands are most cleane from such offences, haue purloyned somewhat from the common Treasurie. Hereof I need not to produce examples: that of the two Scipio's being so lately recited.

Eccl. c. 9. 14. & 15.

In my late Soueraignes time, although for the warres, which for her owne safetie, she was constrained to vndertake, her Maiesty had no lesse cause to vse the seruice of Martial men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predecessors for many yeeres had; yet, according to the destiny of that profession, I doe not remember, that any of hers, the Lord Admirall excepted, her eldest and most prosperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwise honoured, for any seruice by them performed. And that her Maiestie had many aduised, valiant, and faithfull men, the prosperitie of her affaires did well witnesse, who in all her dayes neuer receiued dishonour, by the cowardise or infidelity of any Commander, by her selfe chosen and imployed.

For as all her old Captaines by Land died poore men, as Malbey, Randol, Drewrie, Reade, Wilford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Cunstable, Bourchier, Barkeley, Bingham, and others:

ſo thoſe of a later and more dangerous imployment, whereof Norrise and Vere were the moſt famous, & who haue done as great honour to our Nation (for the meanes they had) as euer any did: thoſe (I ſay) with many other braue Colonels, haue left behinde them (beſides the reputation which they purchaſed with many trauels and wounds) nor title nor eſtate to their poſteritie. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Berty L. Willoughby of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Eſtates.

That her Maieſtie in the aduancement of her Men of warre did ſooner beleeue other men than her ſelfe, a diſeaſe vnto which many wiſe Princes, beſides her ſelfe, haue beene ſubiect, I ſay that ſuch a confidence, although it may ſeeme altogether to excuſe her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in ſome ſort accuſe her of weakeneſſe. And exceeding ſtrange it were, were not the cauſe manifeſt enough, that where the proſperous actions are ſo exceedingly prized, the Actors are ſo vnproſperous and ſo generally neglected. The cauſe, I ſay, which hath wrought one and the ſame effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that thoſe which are neereſt the perſon of Princes (which Martiall men ſeldome are) can with no good grace commend, or at leaſt magnifie a profeſſion farre more noble than their owne, ſeeing therein they ſhould onely minde their Maſters of the wrong they did vnto others, in giuing leſſe honour and reward to men of farre greater deſeruing, and of farre greater vſe than themſelues.

But his Maieſtie hath already payed the greateſt part of that debt. For beſides the relieuing by Penſions all the poorer ſort, hee hath honoured more Martiall men, than all the kings of England haue done for this hundred yeeres.

He hath giuen a Coronet to the Lord Thomas Howard for his chargeable and remarkable ſeruice, as well in the yeere 1588. as at Caliz, the Ilands, and in our owne Sea; hauing firſt commanded as a Captaine, twice Admirall of a Squadron, and twice Admirall in chiefe. His Maieſtie hath changed the Baronies of Montioy and Burley into Earledomes, and created Sidney Vicount, Knollys, Ruſſel, Carew, Danuers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chicheſter, Barons, for their gouernments and ſeruices in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elſewhere.

§ III.

Philip making prouiſion for warre againſt the Romanes, deales hardly with many of his owne ſubiects. His negotiation with the Baſtarne. His crueltie. Hee ſuſpecteth his ſonne Demetrius. Demetrius accuſed by his brother Perſeus; and ſhortly after ſlaine, by his fathers appointment. Philip repenteth him of his ſonnes death; whom hee findeth to haue beene innocent: and intending to reuenge it on Perſeus, he dieth.

QVintius Martius the Roman Embaſſador, who trauelled vp and downe, ſeeking what worke might bee found abour Greece, had receiued inſtruction from the Senate, to vſe the moſt of his diligence in looking into the Eſtate of Macedon. At his returne home, that he might not ſeeme to haue diſcouered nothing, hee told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatſoeuer they enioyned him; yet ſo, as it might appear, that ſuch his obedience would laſt no longer, than meere neceſſity ſhould enforce him thereunto. He added further, That all the doings and ſayings of that King did wholly tend vnto rebellion, about which he was deuiſing. Now it was ſo indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithful obſequiouſneſſe to the Romans, and foreſaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdome into their owne hands, with ſafety of their honour, if they could finde conuenient meanes; or otherwiſe (as to him ſeemed apparant) by what meanes ſoeuer. Hee was in an ill caſe: as hauing beene already vanquiſhed by them; hauing loſt exceedingly both in ſtrength and reputation; hauing ſubiects that abhorred to heare of Warre with Rome; and hauing neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto vrged, would aduenture to take his part: yet he prouided as well as he could deuiſe, againſt the neceſſitie which he daily feared. Such of his owne people as dwelt in the maritime Townes, and gaue him cauſe to ſuſpect, that they would doe but bad ſeruice againſt the Romans, he compelled to forſake their dwellings, and remooued them all into Emathia. The Cities and Country, whence theſe were tranſplanted, hee filled with a multitude of Thracians, whoſe faith he thought a great deale more aſſured against those enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, hee deuised vpon alluring the Bastarnæ, a strong and hardie Nation, that dwelt beyond the riuer of Danubius, to abandon their seat, and come to him with all their multitude: who, besides other great rewards, would helpe them to roote out the Dardanians, and take possession of their Country. These were like to doe him notable seruice against the Romans: being not onely stout fighting men; but such as being planted in those quarters by him, would beare respect vnto him alone. The least benefit that could bee hoped by their arriuall, must be the vtter extirpation of the Dardanians; a People alwaies troublesome to the Kingdome of Macedon, whensoeuer they found aduantage. Neither was it iudged any hard matter, to perswade those Bastarnæ, by hope of spoyle, and other inticements, vnto a more desperate Expedition, through Illyria, and the Countries vpon the Adriaticke Sea, into Italie it selfe. It was not knowne who should withstand them vpon the way: Rather it was thought, that the Scordisci, and peraduenture some others, through whose Countries they were to passe, would accompanie them against the Romans,, were it onely in hope of spoyle. Now to facilitate the remoue of these Bastarnæ from their owne habitations, into the land of the Dardanians, vpon the border of Macedon; a long and tedious iourny vnto them, that carried with them their wiues and children: Philip with gifts did purchase the good will of some Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to passe. And thus hee sought meanes to strengthen himselfe, with helpe of the wilde Nations, which neither knew the Romans, nor were knowne vnto them; since he was not like to finde assistance from any ciuill Nation, about the whole compasse of the Mediterranean Seas. But these deuices were long ere they tooke effect: so as the Bastarnæ came not before such time as he was dead; his death being the ouerthrow of that purpose. In the meane time hee neglected not the training of his men to Warre, and the exercise of them in some small Expeditions, against those wilde people that bordered vpon him, and stood worst affected toward him.

But these his counsailes and proceedings were miserably disturbed by the calamities that fell vpon him, both in his Kingdome, and in his owne house. The Families and whole Townships, which he had caused much against their wils to forsake their ancient dwellings, & betake themselues to such new habitations, as he in his discretion thought meeter for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at first contained it selfe within words: hee hauing done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long liued: which also hee did vnwillingly, being himselfe ouer-ruled by necessitie, that seemed apparant. This euill therefore would soone haue beene determined; had not his cruell and vindicatiue nature made it worse. He could not pardon words proceeding from iust sorrow: but imputed all to traiterous malice; and accordingly did seeke reuenge where it was needlesse. In his rage he caused many to die: among whom were some eminent men; and few or none of them deseruedly. This increased the hatred of the people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more generall; when the King in a most barbarous and base fury, mistrusting all alike whom hee had injured, thought himselfe vnlike to be safe, vntill hee should haue massacred all the children of those parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his vnmanly pleasure, some accidents, more tragicall than perhaps hee could haue desired, gaue men cause to thinke, (as they could not in reason thinke otherwise) that, not without vengeance powred on him from Heauen, hee felt the like miserie in his owne children. It is hard to say what the Romanes intended, in the extraordinary fauour which they shewed vnto Demetrius, the kings yonger sonne. It may well bee (though it may be also suspected that they had no purpose to make and nourish dissention betweene the brethren, but onely to cherish the vertue and towardlinesse of Demetrius; like as we finde it in their Histories. But their notable fauour towards this young Prince, and his mutuall respect of them, bred extreame iealousie in the fathers head. If any custome of the Romanes, the manner of their life, the fashion of their apparell, or the vnsightly contriuing and building (as then it was) of the Towne of Rome, were iested at in ordinary discourse and table-talke, Demetrius was sure to be presently on fire, defending and prayising them, euen in such points as rather needed excuse. This, and his daily conuersation with their Embassadours, as often as they came, gaue his father cause to thinke, that he was no fit partaker of any counsaile held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his deuices with his elder sonne Perseus: who fearing so much lest his brother should step betweene him and the succession, conuerted wholly vnto his destruction, that grace which he had with his father. Perseus was then thirty yeeres old: of a stirring spirit, though much defectiue in valour. Demetrius was younger by fiue yeeres, more open and vnwarie in his actions, yet thought olde and crafty enough, to entertaine more dangerous practices, than his free speeches discouered. The iealous head of the King hauing entertained such suspitions, that were much increased by the cunning practice of his elder sonne; a slight occasion made the fire breake out, that had long layne smothered. A Muster, and ceremonious lustration of the Armie, was wont to be made at certaine times with great solemnitie. The manner of it at the present was thus: They cleft in twaine a bitch, and threw the head and fore-part, with the entrailes, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way which the Armie was to passe. This done, the Armes of all the kings of Macedon, from the very first originall, were borne before the Armie. Then followed the king betweene his two sonnes: after him came his owne band, and they of his guard, whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Hauing performed other ceremonies, the Armie was diuided into two parts: which, vnder the Kings two sonnes, charged each other in manner of a true fight, vsing poles, and the like, in stead of their pikes and accustomed weapons. But in this present skirmish there appeared some extraordinary contention for the victory: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captaines did ouer-earnestly seeke each to get the vpper hand, as a betokening of their good successe in a greater triall. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds giuen, euen with those stakes, vntill Perseus his side at length recoyled. Perseus himselfe was sorry for this, as it had been some bad presage: but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good vse. They were of the craftier sort: who perceiuing which way the kings fauour bent, and how all the courses of Demetrius led vnto his owne ruine, addressed their seruices to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they said, that this victory of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint against him; as if the heate of his ambition had carried him beyond the rules of that solemne pastime. Each of the brethren was that day to feast his owne companions, and each of them had spies in the others lodging, to obserue what was said and done. One of Perseus his Intelligencers behaued himselfe so indirectly, that he was taken & well beaten by three or foure of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of doores. After some store of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would goe visit his brother, and see what cheare he kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting such of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet hee would leaue none of his traine behinde, but forced them all to beare him company. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themselues secretly to preuent all danger. Yet was there such good espiall kept, that this their comming armed was forthwith made knowne to Perseus: who thereupon tumultuously locked vp his doores, as if hee stood in feare to be assaulted in his house. Demetrius wondred to see himselfe excluded, and fared very angerly with his brother. But Perseus bidding him bee gone as an enemie, and one whose murderous purpose was detected, sent him away with entertainment no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the king. The elder brother accused the yonger vnto the father of them both. Much there was alledged, and in effect the same hath beene here recited, saue that by misconstruction all was made worse. But the maine point of the accusation, and which did aggranate all the rest, was, That Demetrius had vndertaken this murder, & would perhaps also dare to vndertake a greater, vpon confidence of the Romanes, by whom hee knew that he should be defended and borne out. For Perseus made shew, as if the Romans did hate him, because hee bore a due respect vnto his father, and was sorry to see him spoyled, and daily robbed of somewhat by them. And for this cause he said it was, that they did animate his brother against him: as also that they sought how to winne vnto Demetrius the loue of the Macedonians. For proofe hereof he cited a letter, sent of late from T. Quintius to the king himselfe: whereof the contents were, That hee had done wisely in sending Demetrius to Rome, and that he should yet further doe well to send him thither againe, accompanied with a greater and more honourable traine of Macedonian Lords. Hence hee enforced, That this counsell was giuen by Titus, of purpose to shake the allegeance of those, that should lie in vpon his brother to Rome, and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become seruants to this yong Traytor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made answer, by rehearsing all passages of the day and night foregoing, in such manner as he remembred them, and had conceiued of them: bitterly reprehending Perseus, that conuerted matters of Passime, and what was done or spoken in wine, to such an accusation, whereby he sought his innocent brothers death. As for the loue which the Romans did beare him, He said that it grew, if not from his owne vertue, at least wise from their opinion thereof, so as by an impious practice, Hee were more like to lose it wholly, than to increase into. In this wretched pleading there wanted not such passions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren; besides those that are common to all Plaintiffes and Defendants, before ordinarie Iudges. The king pronounced like a father, though a iealous father, That he would conclude nothing vpon the excesse or error, whatsoeuer it were, of one day and night, nor vpon one houres audience of the matter, but vpon better disquisition of their dites, manners, and whole carriage of themselues both in word and deed. And herein he may seeme to haue dealt both iustly and compassionately. But from this time forward he gaue himself ouer wholly to Perseus: vsing so little conference with his yonger sonne, that when he had matters of weight in hand, such especially as concerned the Romans, he liked neither to haue him present, nor neere vnto him. Aboue all, he had especiall care, to learne out what had passed between Demetrius and T. Quintius, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpose he sent Embassadors to Rome, Philetas and Apelles; men whom hee thought no way interessed in the quarrells betweene the brethren; though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they saw the more in grace. These brought home with them a letter, said to be written by Titus (whose seale they had counterfeited) vnto the King. The contents whereof were, A deprecation for the yong Prince, with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthfull and ambitious desires had caused him to enter into practices vniustifiable, against his elder brother; which yet should neuer take effect, for that Titus himselfe would not be author, or abetter, of any impious deuice. This manner of excuse did forcibly perswade the king, to thinke his sonne a dangerous traytor. To strengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gaue Demetrius in custodie, made shew as if he had pitied the estate of the vnhappy Prince, and so wrung out of him his secret intentions, which he shortly discouered vnto Philip. It was the purpose of Demetrius to flye secretly to Rome, where he might hope not onely to liue in safety, from his father & brother, but in greater likelihood, than he could finde at home, of bettering such claime as he had in reuersion vnto the Crown of Macedon. Whatsoeuer his hopes and meanings were, all came to nought through the falshood of Didas; who playing on both hands, offered vnto the Prince his helpe for making the escape, & in the meane while reuealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolued to put his sonne to death, without further expence of time. It was thought behouefull to make him away priuily, for feare lest the Romans should take the matter to heart, and hold it as a proofe sufficient, at least, of the kings despight against them, if not of his meaning to renew the warre. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the vnhappy Prince out of his life. This accursed Minister of his Kings vnaduised sentence, first gaue poyson to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was desired. Hereupon he sent a couple of Ruffians, to finish the tragedie; who villainously accomplished their work by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Macedon.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not beene found a king, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his owne blood. The houses of Lysimachus and Cassander felt either with themselues, or euen vpon their heeles, by intestine discord and iealousies, grounded on desire of soueraigne rule, or feare of losing it. By the like vnnaturall hatred, had almost beene cut off the lines of Ptolemie and Seleucus: which though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their kingdomes thereby grieuously distempered. Contrariwise, it was worthy of extraordinary note, how that vpstart family of the kings of Pergamus had raised it selfe to maruellous greatnesse, in very short space, from the condition of priuate nurery: whereof a principall cause was, the brotherly loue maintained by them, with singular commendation of their pietie. Neither was Philip ignorant of these examples; but is said to haue propounded the last of them, to his owne children, as a patterne for them to imitate. Certainely hee had reason so to doe: not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith king Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minoritie. But he was himselfe of an vnmercifull nature; and therefore vnmeet to be a good perswader vnto kindly affection. The murders by him done vpon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satiating of his bloud-thirsty appetite, he delightfully had committed vpon many innocents, both strangers, and subiects of his owne; did now procure vengeance downe from Heauen, that rewarded him with a draught of his owne Poyson. After the death of his sonne, He too late began to examine the crimes that had beene obiected; and to weigh them in a more equall ballance, Then found he nothing that could giue him satisfaction, or by good probabilitie induce him to thinke, that malice had not bin contriuer of the whole processe. His onely remaining Son Perseus could so ill dissemble the pleasure which he tooke, in being freed from all danger of competition; as there might easily be perceiued in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remooue of those dangers, which he had lately pretended. The Romanes were now no lesse to bee feared than at other times, when he, as hauing accomplished the most of his desires, left off his vsuall trouble of minde, and carefulnesse of making prouision against them. Hee was more diligently courted, than in former times; by those that well vnderstood the difference, betweene a rising and a setting Sunne. As for old Philip, he was left in a manner desolate, some expecting his death, and some scarce enduring the tediousnesse of such expectation. This bred in the king a deepe melancholy; and filled his head with suspitious imaginations, the like whereof hee had neuer beene slow to apprehend. Hee was much vexed: and so much the more, for that he knew, neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complaine. One honourable man, a Cousin of his, named Antigonus, continued so true to Philip, that hee grew thereby hatefull to Perseus: and thus becomming subiect vnto the same iealous impression which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This counsailour, when he found that the anger conceiued against Perseus would not vent it selfe, and giue ease to the king, vntill the truth were knowne whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the treason obiected; as also that Philocles and Apelles, (the Embassadours which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flaminius, that serued as the greatest euidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgery, in the businesse: made diligent inquirie after the truth. In thus doing, he found one Xychus, a man most likely to haue vnderstood what false dealing was vsed by those Embassadors. Him he apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented vnto the King: saying, That this fellow knew all, and must therfore be made to vtter what he knew. Xychus for feare of torture, vttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himself, that he had beene employed by the Embassadors in that wicked piece of businesse. No maruell, if the Fathers passions were extreme; when he vnderstood that by the vnnatural practice of one sonne, he had so wretchedly cast away another, farre more vertuous and innocent. He raged exceedingly against himselfe, and withall against the authors of the mischiefe. Vpon the first newes of this discouerie, Apelles fled away, and got into Italie, Philocles was taken: and either forasmuch as he could not denie it when Xychus confronted him, yeelded himselfe guilty; or else was put to torture. Perseus was now growne stronger, than that he should need to flye the Countrie: yet not so stout as to aduenture himselfe into his fathers presence. He kept on the borders of the kingdome, towards Thrace, whilest his father wintred at Demetrias. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his vngracious sonne; tooke a resolution, to aliene the Kingdome from him, and confer it vpon Antigonus. But his weake body, and excessiue griefe of minde, so disabled him in the trauell thereto belonging; that ere he could bring his purpose to effect, hee was constrained to yeeld to nature: Hee had reigned about two and forty yeeres: alwaies full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexed himselfe with continuall warres; of which that with the Romans was most vnhappy, and few or none of the rest found the conclusion, which a wise Prince would haue desired, of bringing forth together, both honour and profit. But for all the euill that befell him, hee might thanke his own peruerse condition: since his Vncle, king Antigonus, had left vnto him an estate, so great, and so well settled, as made it easie for him, to accomplish any moderate desires, if he had not abhorred all good counsell. Wherefore he was iustly punished by feeling the difference betweene the imaginary happinesse of a Tyrant, which hee affected, and the life of a king, where of he little cared to performe the dutie. His death, euen whileſt yet he was onely drawing neere, was fore-ſignified vnto Perſeus, by Caligenes the Phyſician; who alſo concealed it a while from thoſe that were about the Court. So Perſeus came thither on the ſuddaine, and tooke poſſeſſion of the kingdome: which in fine hee no leſſe improuidently loſt, than he had wickedly gotten.

§. IV.

How the Baſterne fell vpon Dardania. The behauiour of Perſeus in the beginning of his reigne. Some warres of the Romanes: and how they ſuffered Maſſaniſſa cruelly to oppreſſe the Carthaginians. They quarrell with Perſeus. They allow not their Confederates to make warre without their leaue obtained. The Treaſon of Callicrates, whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perſeus. He ſeekes friendſhip of the Achæans, and is withſtood by Callicrates. The Romanes diſcouer their intent of warring vpon him.

IMmediately vpon the death of Philip, came the Baſterna into Thrace: where order had beene taken, long before, both for the free paſſage, and for the indemnitie of the Countrey. This compact was friendly obſerued, as long as no other was known than that Philip did liue, to recompence all that ſhould bee done, or ſuſtained, for his ſeruice. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon; and not heard withall, that he tooke any care what became of the enterprize: then was all daſht and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford ſo good markets vnto theſe ſtrangers, as formerly they had done. On the other ſide, the Baſtarna would not be contented with reaſon, but became their owne caruers. Thus each part hauing loſt the rich hopes repoſed in Philip, grew carefull of thriuing in the preſent; with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blowes; and the Baſtarna had the vpper hand, ſo as they chaſed the Thracians out of the plaine Countries. But the victors made little vſe of their good fortune. For whether by reaſon of ſome ouerthrow, receiued by them in aſſaulting a place of ſtrength; or whether becauſe of extreame bad weather, which is ſaid to haue afflicted them as it were miraculouſly: all of them returned home, ſaue thirty thouſand, which pierced on into Dardania. How theſe thirty thouſand ſped in their voyage, I doe not finde. It ſeemes that by the careleſſe vſing of ſome victories, they drew loſſe vpon themſelues: and finally tooke that occaſion, to follow their companions backe into their owne Countrey.

As for Perſeus he thought it not expedient, in the noueltie of his reigne, to embroyle himſelfe in a war ſo dangerous, as that with the Romanes was likely to prooue. Wherefore he wholly gaue his minde to the ſetling of his Eſtate: which well done, hee might afterwards accommodate himſelfe, as the condition of his affaires ſhould require, eyther for war or peace. To preuent all danger of rebellion, he quickly tooke away the life of Antigonus. To win loue of his people, he ſate perſonally to heare their cauſes in iudgement (though herein he was ſo ouer-diligent and curious, that one might haue perceiued this his vertue of iuſtice to be no better than fained); as alſo hee gratified them with many delightfull ſpectacles, magnificently by him ſet forth. Aboue all, he had care to auoid all neceſſity of war with Rome: and therefore made it his firſt worke, to ſend Embaſſadors thither, to renew the league, which he obtained, & was by the Senate ſaluted King, and friend vnto the State. Neither was he negligent in ſeeking to purchaſe good will of the Greekes, & other his neighbours: but was rather herein ſo exceſſiuely bountifull, that it may ſeeme a wonder how in few yeeres, to his vtter ruine, he became ſo griping and tenacious. His feare was indeede the maſtring paſſion, which ouer-ruled him, and changed him into ſo many ſhapes, as made it hard to diſcerne which of his other qualities were naturally his owne. For proofe of this, there is requiſite no more, than the relation of his actions paſt and following.

The Romanes continued, as they had long, buſie in warres againſt the Spaniards and Ligurians; people often vanquiſhed, and as often breaking foorth into new rebellion. They alſo conquered Iſtria; ſubdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had ſome quarrells, though to little effect, with the Illyrians and others. Ouer the Carthaginians they bore (as euer ſince the victory) a heauy hand: & ſuffered Maſeniſſa to take from them what he liſted.

sisted. The Carthaginians, like obedient vassals to Rome, were afraid, though in defence of their owne, to take Armes: from which they were bound by an Article of peace, except it were with leaue of the Romans. Masanissa therefore had great aduantage ouer them, and was not ignorant how to vse it. He could get possession by force, of whatsoeuer he desired, ere their complaining Embassadours could be at Rome: and then were the Romans not hardly entreated, to leaue things as they found them.

So had he once dealt before, in taking from them the Countrie of Emporia: and so did he vse them againe and againe, with pretence of title, where he had any; otherwise, without it. Gala the Father of Masanissa had wonne some land from the Carthaginians, which afterward Syphax wanne from Gala, and within a while, restored to the right owners, for loue of his Wife Sophonisba, and of Asdrubal his Father-in-law. This did Masanissa take from them by force: and by the Romans (to whose iudgement the case was referred) was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficiall it was for their Estate, to vse all manner of submissiue obedience to Rome. They had scarcely digested this iniury, when Masanissa came vpon them againe, and tooke from them aboue seuentie Townes and Castles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embassadors they made lamentable complaint vnto the Roman Senate. They shewed how grieuously they were oppressed by reason of two Articles in their League: That they should not make warre, out of their owne Lands, nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were so, that they might lawfully withstand the violence of Masanissa, inuading their Country, howsoeuer he was pleased to call it his: yet since he was confederate with the Romanes, they durst not presume to beare defensiue armes against him, but suffered themselues to bee eaten vp, for feare of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherefore they entreated, that either they might haue fairer iustice, or be suffered to defend their owne by strong hand, or at least, if right must wholly giue place to fauor, That the Romans yet would be pleased to determine, how farre forth Masanissa should bee allowed, to proceed in these outrages. If none of these petitions could be obtained, then desired they, that the Romans would let them vnderstand, wherein they had offended since the time that Scipio gaue them peace, and vouchsafe to inflict on them such punishment, as they themselues in honour should thinke meete: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to suffer at once what should be appointed by such Iudges, than continually to liue in feare, and none otherwise draw breath, than at the mercy of this Numidian Hangman. And herewithall the Embassadors threw themselues prostrate on the ground, weeping, in hope to moone compassion.

Here may we behold, the fruits of their enuy to that valiant house of the Barchines, of their irresolution, in prosecuting a warre so important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their half-penny worthing, in matter of expence, when they had aduentured their whole estate, in the purchase of a great Empire. Now are they seruants, euen to the seruants of those men, whose fathers they had oft chased, slaine, taken, & sold as bondslaues in the streets of Carthage, & in all cities of Africk & Greece. Now haue they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno so often & so earnestly desired. Onely they want peace with Masanissa, once their mercenarie, & now their master, or rather their tormentor, out of whose cruell hands, they beseech their masters to take the office of correcting them. In such case are they, & adore the Romans, whom they see flourishing in such prosperitie as might haue beene their owne. But the Romans had farre better entreated Varro, who lost the battel at Canna, than Hannibal that won it was vsed by the Carthaginians: they had freely bestowed, euery man of them, all his priuate riches, vpon the Commonwealth, and employed their labours for the publike, without craning recompence: as also they had not thought it much, though being in extreame want, to set out an Armie into Spaine, at what time the enemy lay vnder their owne walls. These were no Carthaginian vertues: and therefore the Carthaginians hauing fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miseries belonging vnto the vanquished. Their pitifull behauiour bred peraduenture some commiseration; yet their teares may seeme to haue beene interrupted, as proceeding no lesse from enuy vnto the Romans, than from any feeling of their owne calamitie. They thought themselues able to fight with Masanissa: which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into comparisons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained no such leaue as they sought, of defending their owne right by armes: but contrariwise, when without leaue obtained they presumed so far, the destruction of Carthage was thought an easie punishment of that offence. At the present, they receiued a gentle answer; though they had otherwise little amends. Gulussa the sonne of Masanissa was then in Rome; and had not as yet craued audience. He was therefore called before the Senate; where he was demanded the reason of his coming; and had related vnto him the complaint made by the Carthaginians against his Father. He answered, That his Father not being throughly aware of any Embassadours thither sent from Carthage, had therefore not giuen him instructions, how to deale in that businesse. Onely it was knowne, that the Carthaginians had held councell diuers nights, in the Temple of Æsculapius: whereupon he himselfe was dispatched away to Rome, there to entreat the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romans and of his Father might not be ouermuch trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the people of Rome. This answer gaue little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replyed, that for Masanissa his sake, they had done, and would doe, whatsoeuer was reasonable; but that it stood not with their iustice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians those lands, which by the couenants of the league, were granted vnto them freely to inioy. With this milde rebuke they dismissed Gulussa, bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willed him to tell his Father, that he should doe well to send Embassadours, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian warre was euen ready to begin: at which time the Romanes were not willing, too much to offend, either the Carthaginians (for feare of vrging them vnseasonably to rebellion) or Masanissa, at whose hands they expected no little helpe. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Masanissa: by the Carthaginians, partly for feare, partly for hope of better vsage in the future; by Masanissa, in way of thankefulnes; though if it had happened (which was vnlikely) that they should be vanquished; he made none other account, than that all Africke round about him, and Carthage therewithall, should be his owne.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not been vnmindfull of Perseus. They visited him daily with Embassadours, that is, with honourable spies to obserue his behauiour. These hee entertained kindely at first, vntill (which fell out ere long) hee perceiued whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any satisfaction, vntill the Bastarnæ were thence gone; though he protested, that he had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no lesse ill contented with good offices, by him done, to sundry of his neighbours, than with those wrongs, which (they said) that he did vnto other some. Where he did harme to any; they called it, making warre vpon their friends: Where he did good; they called such his bounty, seeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his subiects, (vpon what occasion it is vncertaine) rebelled, and with exquisite torments slew Euphranor, whom hee had appointed their gouernour. It seemes that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonian: and therefore vnlikely to haue presumed so farre, vnlesse either they had beene extremely prouoked, or else were secretly animated by the Romanes. Whatsoeuer it was that bred this courage in them: Perseus did soone allay it, and reclaime them by strong hand. But the Romanes tooke very angerly this presumption of the King: euen as if hee had inuaded some Countrie of their Italian confederates, & not corrected his owne rebels at home. Faine they would haue had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians; whereunto had hee humbled once his necke, they could themselues haue done the part of Masanissa; though Eumenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had beene wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That conditions of the league between them were such, as made it vnlawfull, both to his father heretofore, and now to him, to take armes without their licence first obtained.

To the same passe they would also faine haue reduced the Greeks, & generally all their adherents, euen such as had entred into league with them vpon equall termes: whom vsually they rewarded with a frowne, whensoeuer they presumed to right themselues by force of Armes, without seeking first the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Achæans had good experience: whose confidence in their proper strength made them otherwhiles bold to be their owne caruers, and whose hope of extraordinary fauour at Rome caused them the more willingly to referre their causes to arbitrement. For when they went about to haue chastised the Messenians by warre; T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking such a worke in hand, without his authoritie: yet by his authoritie he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they reprehended, euen with Lordly threats, when they tooke vpon them to carry any businesse of importance, by their owne power, without standing vnto the good grace of the Romans. Who neuertheless vpon submission, were apt enough to doe them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their absolute libertie, as by which they were not like to thriue; especially in vsurping the practice of Armes, which belonged onely to the Imperiall Citie. In learning this hard lesson, they were such vntoward Schollers, that they needed, and not long after felt, very sharpe correction. Yet was there no small part of blame to be imputed vnto their Masters. For the Romane Senate, being desirous to humble the Achæans, refused not onely to giue them such aide as they requested; and as they challenged by the tenour of the League betweene them; but further, with a careless insolencie, reiected this honest and reasonable petition, That the Enemie might not be supplied from Italie, with victualls or armes. Herewith not content, The Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affaires of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argiues, Lacedæmonians, or Corinthians, would reuolt from the Achæans; they themselues would thinke it a businesse no way concerning them. Polyb. Legat. 51. & 53.

This was presently after the death of Philopœmen: at what time it was beleeued, that the Common-wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much distresse; were it not vpheld by countenance of the Romanes. All this notwithstanding; when Lycortas Prætor of the Achæans had vtterly subdued the Messenians farre sooner than was expected; and when as not only no towne rebelled from the Achæans, but many entred into their corporation: then did the Romans with an ill-fauoured grace, tell the same Embassadours, to whose petition they had made such bad answer (and who as yet were not gone out of the Citie,) That they had streightly forbidden all manner of succour to be carried to Messene. Thus thinking, by a fained grauitie, to haue serued their owne turnes; they manifested their condition; both to set on the weaker, against the stronger and more suspected; and also to assume vnto themselues a Soueraigne power, in directing all matters of Warre, which dissemblingly they would haue seemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their confederates: not permitting any of them to make Warre, whether offensiue or defensiue; though it were against meere strangers; without interposing the authoritie of the Senate and People of Rome: vnlesse peraduenture sometimes they winked at such violence, as did helpe towards the accomplishment of their owne secret malice. Now these Romane Arts howsoeuer many (for gainefull or timerous respects) would seeme to vnderstand them; yet were generally displeasing vnto all men endued with free spirits. Only the Athenians, once the most turbulent Citie in Greece, hauing neither subiects of their owne that might rebell, nor power wherewith to bring any into subiection; for want of more noble argument wherein to practise their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the most mighty. So they kept themselues in grace with the Romans, remained free from all trouble, vntill the warre of Mithridates: being men vnfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-crauers for the vanquished. Such were the Athenians become. As for those other Common-weales and kingdomes, that with ouer-nice diligence stroue to preserue their liberties and lands, from consuming by piece-meale: they were to bee deuoured whole, and swallowed vp at once. Especially the Macedonian, as the most vnpliant, and wherein many of the Greekes began to haue affiance, was necessarily to be made an example, how much better it were to bow than to breake.

Neither Perseus nor the Romans were ignorant, how the Greeks at this time stood affected. Perseus, by reason of his neere neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce betweene them and his subiects, could not want good information, of all that might concerne him, in their affaires. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopœmen had long since foretold, of the miserable subiection, whereinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Romane patronage. Indeed they not onely perceiued the approching danger, but as being tenderly sensible of their liberty, felt themselues grieued with the present subiection, whereto already they were become obnoxious: Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publike to fal out with the Romans: yet all of them had the care, to choose among themselues none other Magistrates, than such as affected the good of their Countrie, and would for no ambition, or other seruile respect, be flatterers of the greatnesse which kept all in feare. Thus it seemed likely, that all domesticall conspiracies would soone be at an end; when honestie and loue of the Common-weale, became the faireſt way to preferment. Of this carefull prouision for the safety of Greece, the Romans were not throughly aduertised: either because things were diligently concealed from their Embassadours, whom all men knew to be little better than Spies; or because little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by such Traitors (of whom euery citie in Greece had too many) as were men vnregarded among their owne people, and therefore more like to speake maliciously than truely, or perhaps because the Embassadours themselues, being all Senators, and capable of the greatest Office or charge, had no will to finde out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their owne desires of employment. But it is hard to conceale that which many know, from these that are feared or flattered by many. The Achæans being to send Embassadors to Rome, that should both excuse them, as touching some point wherein they refused to obey the Senate; and informe the Senate better in the same businesse; chose one Callicrates, among others, to goe in that Embassage. By their making choise of such a man; one may perceiue the aduantage, which mischieuous wretches, who commonly are forward in pursuing their vile desires, haue against the plaine sort of honest men, that least earnestly thrust themselues into the troublesome businesse of the weale publike. For this Callicrates was in such wise transported with ambition; that he chose much rather to betray his Countrey, than to let any other bee of more authoritie than himselfe therein. Wherefore in stead of well discharging his credence, and alleaging what was meetest in iustification of his people: he vttered a quite contrary tale; and strongly encouraged the Romans, to oppresse both the Achæans and all the rest of Greece, with a farre more heauy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to looke vnto the feeling of their authority, among his froward Countrimen; if they meant not wholly to forgoe it. For now there was taken vp a custome, to stand vpon points of confederacie, and lawes: as if these were principally to bee in regard; any iniunction from Rome notwithstanding.

Hence grew it, that the Achæans both now, and at other times, did what best pleased themselues, and answered the Romans with excuses: as if it were enough to say, That by some condition of League, or by force of some Law, they were discharged, or hindered, from obeying the decrees of the Senate. This would not bee so, if Hee, and some other of his opinion, might haue their wills; who ceased not to affirme; That no Columes or Monument erected, nor no solemne oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the obseruance of Confederacie or statute, ought to bee of force, when the Romanes willed the contrary. But it was euen the fault of the Romans themselues, That the multitude refused to giue eare vnto such perswasions. For howsoeuer in popular Estates, the sound of libertie vsed to be more plausible, than any discourse tending against it: yet if they which vndertooke the maintenance of an argument, seeming neuer so bad, were sure by their so doing, to procure their owne good; the number of them would increase apace, & they became the preualent faction. It was therfore strange how the Fathers could so neglect the aduancement of those, that sought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman maiesty. More wisely, though with seditious & rebellious purpose, did the Greeks: who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, vpon men otherwise of little account or desert; only for hauing vttred some braue words against the Romans. The Fathers hearing these & the like reasons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughly those that were obstinate, and by cherishing their friends, to make their partie strong; resolued to follow this good counsaile, in euery point; yea to depresse all those that held with the right, and to set vp their owne followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not onely dealt thenceforth more peremptorily with the Achæans, than had been their manner in former times; but wrote at the present vnto all cities of Greece; requiring them to see that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedæmon) should be fulfilled. Particularly in behalfe of Callicrates, they aduised all men, to be such,

and ſo affected, as hee was, in their ſeuerall common-weales. With this diſpatch, Callicrates returned home a ioyfull man: hauing brought his Country into the way of ruine, but himſelfe into the way of preferment. Neuertheleſſe he forbore to vaunt himſelfe, of his eloquence vſed in the Senate. Onely hee ſo reported his Embaſſage, that all men became fearefull of the danger, wherewith he threatned thoſe that ſhould preſume to oppoſe the Romanes. By ſuch arts he obtained to be made Prætor of the Achæans: in which Magiſtracie, as in all his courſes following, he omitted nothing, that might ſerue to manifeſt his ready obſequiouſneſſe vnto thoſe whom he had made his Patrons.

Now as the Romans by threatning termes won many flatterers, and loſt as many true friends: ſo Perſeus on the other ſide, thinking by liberall gifts, and hopefull promiſes, to aſſure vnto himſelfe thoſe that ill could brooke his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honeſter than his enemies had. Thus were all the cities of Greece diſtracted with factions: ſome holding with the Romans; ſome with the Macedonian; and ſome few, reſpecting onely the good of the Eſtates, wherein they liued. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignitie not ſufferable, That a king, no better than their vaſſall, ſhould dare to become head of a faction againſt them. This therefore muſt be reckoned in the number of his treſpaſſes: whereof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, ſhall affoord them iuſt occaſion to make warre vpon him. Perſeus hauing finiſhed his buſineſſe among the Dolopians, made a iourney to Apollo his temple at Delphi. He tooke his Armie along with him; yet went, and returned in ſuch peaceable and friendly wiſe, that no place was the worſe for his iourney, but the good affection towards him generally increaſed thereby. With thoſe that were in his way, he dealt himſelfe; to ſuch as lay further off, he ſent Embaſſadors or letters: praying them, That the memory of all wrongs whatſoeuer, done by his father, might bee buried with his father; ſince his owne meaning was to hold friendſhip ſincerely with all his neighbours. The Romans perhaps could haue beene pleaſed better, if hee had behaued himſelfe after a contrary faſhion, and done ſome acts of hoſtilitie in his paſſage. Yet as if he ought not to haue taken ſuch a iourney, without their licence; this alſo was made a valuable matter, and caſt into the heape of his faults. He laboured greatly to recouer the loue of the Achæans: which his father had ſo loſt, that by a ſolemne decree, they forbade any Macedonian to enter their territories. It was iealouſie perhaps, no leſſe than hatred, which cauſed them, at the firſt, to make ſuch a decree. For howſoeuer Philip had by many vile acts, eſpecially by the death of the two Arati, giuen them cauſe to abhorre him: yet in the publike adminiſtration of their eſtate, he had, for the more part, been to them ſo beneficiall, that not without much adoe and at length, without any generall conſent, they reſolued to forſake him. Wherefore it was needfull, euen for preſeruation of concord among them, to vſe all circumſpection; that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a country, towards him ſo doubtfully affected: eſpecially when by hearkening to his meſſages, they might make themſelues ſuſpected by their new friends. But the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of Warre, and when all danger of innouation was paſt; was vnciuill, if not inhumane, as nouriſhing deadly hatred, without leauing means of reconciliation. And hereof the Achæans reaped no good fruit. For although they were not, in like ſort, forbidden the kingdome of Macedon: yet vnderſtanding what would be due to them, if they ſhould aduenture thither, none of them durſt ſet foot therein. Hence it came to paſſe, that their bondmen, knowing a ſafe harbour, out of which their maſters could not fetch them, ranne daily away, in great numbers: exceedingly to the loſſe of ſuch, as made of their ſlaues very profitable vſe. But Perſeus tooke hold vpon this occaſion: as fitly ſeruing to pacifie thoſe, whoſe enmity faine he would haue changed into loue. He therefore apprehended all theſe fugitiues, to ſend them home againe: and wrote vnto the Achæans, That as for good will vnto them, hee had taken paines to reſtore back their ſeruants; ſo ſhould they doe very well to take order for keeping them, that heereafter they might not run away againe. His meaning was readily vnderſtood, & his letters kindly accepted by the greater part; being openly rehearſed by the Prætor, before the Councel. But Callicrates tooke the matter very angerly; and bade them be aduiſed what they did: for that this was none other, than a plaine deuice, to make them depart from the friendſhip of the Romanes. Heerewithall hee tooke vpon him, ſomewhat liberally, to make the Achæans beforehand acquainted with the Warre, that was comming vpon Perſeus from Rome. Hee told told them; how Philip had made preparations for the same warre; how Demetrius had beene made away, because of his good affection to the Romanes; and how Perseus had, since his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly Hee rehearsed all those matters, which were afterwards alleaged by the Romans; the inuasion of the Bastarnæ, vpon the Dardanians; the kings iourny against the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi, & finally, his peaceable behauiour, which was (he said) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherfore he aduised them, to expect the euent of things, and not ouer-hastily to enter into any degree of friendship with the Macedonians. Hereto good answer was made by the Prætors brother: That Callicrates was too earnest, in so light a matter; and that, being neither one of the kings cabbinet, nor of the Romane Senate, he made himselfe too well acquainted with all that had passed, or was like to follow. For it was well knowne, that Perseus had renued his league with the Romans; that he was by them saluted King, and friend to the Estate; and that he had louingly entertained their Embassadors: This being so: why might not the Achæans, as well as the Ætolians, Thessalians, Epirots, & all the Greeks, hold with him such correspondence, as common humanitie required? Neuertheless Callicrates was growne a man so terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durst not ouer-stiffely gainesay him. Therefore the matter was referred vnto further deliberation: and answer made the whilest, That since the king had onely sent a letter without an Embassadour; they knew not how to resolue. Better it was to say thus, than that they were afraid to doe as they thought most reasonable and conuenient. But when Perseus herewith not contented, would needes vrge them further, and send Embassadors: then were they faine, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and deny to giue audience: which was proofe sufficient (to one that could vnderstand) of the condition wherein they liued For harkening to this aduice of Callicrates; they were soone after highly commended by a Roman Embassadour: whereby it became apparant, that the Romans intended warre vpon the Macedonian; though hitherto no cause of warre was giuen.

§. V.

How Eumenes King of Pergamus was busied with Pharnaces, the Rhodians and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuseth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and contemnes his enemies the Rhodians; with the causes thereof. The vnusuall stoutnesse of the Macedonian Embassadors. Perseus his attempt vpon Eumenes. The brotherly loue betweene Eumenes and Attalus. Perseus his deuice to poyson some of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree warre against him, and send him defiance. Other things, concerning the iustice of this warre.

EVmenes King of Pergamus had beene troubled, about these times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mithridates his neighbours. Hee had taken the right course; in making first his complaint to the Romanes: by whom hee was animated with comfortable words, and promise, That they, by their authoritie, would end the businesse, to his content. But in conclusion, by the helpe of the Kings Prusias and Ariarathes, he ended the warre himselfe; and brought the Enemies to seeke and accept peace, on such conditions as pleased him to giue them. After this, being at good leisure; he began to consider, how the affaires of Macedon stood vnder Perseus. His hatred to Perseus was very great: and therefore he was glad to vnderstand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the same his Enemy, was as great, and withall notorious. Now besides his ancient and hereditarie quarrell with the Macedonian; it vexed him exceedingly, That his own honours (whereof the Greeks, prodigall in that kinde, had heaped immoderate store on his father and him) began to waxe euery where stale: whilest Perseus, either by his currying fauour, or by the enuy borne to the Romans, had gotten their best liking and wishes. For despight of this indignitie, He stirred vp the Lycians against the Rhodians his old friends: and in helping the rebels was so violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, to open warre. But small pleasure found he, in these poore & indirect courses of reuenge. The Lycians could not be saued by his patronage, from seuere and cruell chastisement, giuen to them by the Rhodians. This rendred him contemptible: as likewise, his acts of hostilitie; litle different from robberies, made him hatefull to those which loued him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not onely continued falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a decree of the Achæans, as too vnmeasured, misbeseeming them to giue, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deseruings. All this (which he needed not to haue regarded, had hee not beene too vainely ambitious) befell him, especially for his being ouer-seruiceable to the Romanes, and for his malice to that noble Kingdome, which if it fell, the liberty of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redresse heereof; hee thought it in vaine to striue any longer with bounty, against such an aduersarie, as by hopefull promises alone, without any great performance, had ouer-topped him in the generall fauor. And therefore he resolued euen to ouerturn the foundations of this popularitie, by inducing the Romans vtterly to take away from the eyes of men, this Idol, The Macedonian kingdome, which all so vainely worshipped. Neither would it proue a difficult matter, to perswade those that were already desirous: rather he was like to be highly thanked, for setting forward their wishes; and perhaps to be recompenced with some piece of the kingdome, as he had beene rewarded, for the like seruice, when Antiochus was vanquished. Liuie lib. 42.

To this end he made a second voyage to Rome: where though hee had little to say which they knew not before; yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange noueltie, and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turne the ballance, that before was equall. The death of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bastarnæ into Dardania; that of Perseus himselfe against the Dolopians, and to Delphi; the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece; his intermedling in businesse of neighbours; his riches, and his great prouisions: were all the materiall points of Eumenes his discourse. Only he descended into particulars, hauing searched into all (as he professed) like vnto a Spie. Hee said, that Perseus had thirty thousand foot, and fiue thousand Horse, of his owne; money in a readinesse to entertaine ten thousand Mercenaries for ten yeeres; armes, to furnish a number thrice as great; The Thracians his friends at hand, ready, at a call, to bring him Souldiers as many as hee should require; and that he prepared victuals for ten yeeres, because he would not be driuen, either to liue vpon spoyle, or to take from his owne Subiects. Heerewithall hee prayed them to consider, that king Seleucus the sonne and successour of Antiochus the Great, had giuen his daughter Laodice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not wooing, but Seleucus offering the match; That king Prusias of Bythinia, by earnest suite, had gotten to wife the sister of Perseus, and that these marriages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassages from all quarters. Neither spared he to tell them, (though seeming loath to vtter it plainely) That euen the enuie of their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to heare of amitie with Philip, were now growne maruellously well affected to his sonne. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might either be denied, or iustified (as, that he had procured the death of some which were friends to the Romans, & that he had expelled Abrypolis the Illyrian, who inuaded Macedon, out of his Kingdome or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplifie vnto the most: saying that he thought it his dutie to forewarne them; since it would be to himselfe a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italie making warre vpon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great folly, to beleeue that the Romans stood in feare of Perseus, lest hee should set vpon them in Italie. Neuertheless forasmuch as they loued not to make war without faire pretence, not onely of wrong done to them or their associates, but of further hurt intended: great thankes were giuen to Eumenes, who had euery way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautifie their intendment. Now though it were so that hee told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his comming, made all seeme greater. For if vpon any relation made by their owne Embassadours, or vpon tales deuised by their flatterers and spies, they had warred against Perseus, ere he had committed any open act of hostility against them; their iniustice, and oppression, would haue beene most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done were so notorious, and the danger threatning them so terrible; that such a Prince as Eumenes, came out of his owne Kingdome, as farre as from Asia, to bid them looke to themselues; who could blame them, if they tooke the speediest order to obtaine their owne right and securitie? Toward this iustification of the warre, and magnifying the necessitie that enforced them thereto; their more than vsuall curiositie, in concealing what Eumenes had vttered in the Senate, when they could not but vnderstand that his errand was well knowne; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadours were at Rome, prouided of answers to the words, which they knew before-hand that he would speake; and with matter of recrimination. The vanity, either of Him, or of some about him, seemes to haue disclosed all: when the wariness of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearfull apprehension; against which, it behooued their wisedome to neglect no possible remedie. Wherefore careless audience was giuen to the Rhodian Embassadours; who accused Eumenes, as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had euer beene, and a prouoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pompe, conueighed by sea vnto Perseus, his bride Laodice; which friendly office as the Macedonian bountifully requited, so the Romans despightfully accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already vanquished, were setling themselues in their obedience to the people of Rhodes: Embassadors came from Rome with strange news, which gaue new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced, That it stood not with the manner of the Romans, to aliene quite from their owne protection any people or Nation by them vanquished; and that the Lycians were by them assigned vnto those of Rhodes, not as meere vassals, but as dependants and associates. For proofe hereof, they referred themselues vnto the commentaries of the tenne Embassadours; whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the victory against king Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Masanissa, The Ætolians, and all other Kings or Estates, that were beholding to Rome for increasing the number of their subiects, had cause to finde themselues agrieued if they well considered the matter: since by force of this or the like decree, those their subiects might easily be made their fellowes, whensoeuer it should please the Senate: though it were so, that all men knew the present meaning of the Senate, which was onely to plague the Rhodians, for their good wil to Perseus, by setting them and the Lycians together by the eares. The Fathers could therfore see no reason to dislike Eumenes, vpon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadours; which indeed more neerely touched themselues. Rather they honoured the king so much the more: for that others (as they would needes take it) conspired against him, because of his loue to Rome.

Polyb. Legat. 60. & 61.

Liu. lib. 41.

But the Macedonian Embassage they heard not so carelesly as angrily: though peraduenture it well contented them to finde cause of anger. For whereas at other times all cares had beene taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That king Perseus desired much to giue them satisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might sauour of hostilitie; but that, if his trauaile in this kinde proued vaine, then would he be ready to defend himselfe by armes, and stand to the chance of warre, which often falls out contrarie to expectation. These bigge words may seeme to haue proceeded from the vehemencie of Harpalus, that was chiefe of the Embassadors; rather than from instruction giuen by the king, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Perseus himselfe might, at this time, thinke to speed better by a shew of daring, than he was like to do by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast vpon him, as on the greatest hope of deliuerance from the Roman seruitude; it was not expedient, that he should lessen, or perhaps vtterly cut off, the generall expectation, and the good affection borne to him, which thereon depended, by discouering his too much weakenesse of spirit, vnanswerable to a worke of such importance. Wherefore He, or his Embassador for him, was bold to set a good countenance on a game not very bad, but subiect (in appearance) to fortune; which might haue beene his, had he knowne how to vse it.

Now that this brauery (as better it may be termed than courage) proceeded from the kings owne heat; it appeares by his daring to aduenture soone after, on a practice that more iustly might anger the Romans, and giue them fairer shew of reason to make warre vpon him. It was knowne that Eumenes, in turning home, would take Delphi in his way, and there doe sacrifice to Apollo. Perseus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his blood, resolued to way-lay him, and by making there of him a sacrifice, to rid his owne hands of a most mischieuous enemy. So there were appointed three or foure stout ruffians to doe the murder: who placing themselues, behinde a broken mud wall, on the side of a very narrow path leading vp from the Sea to the Temple; did thence assault the King; whom they sorely bruised with great stones, and left for dead. They might haue finished their worke; such was the opportunitie of the place which they had chosen; but feare of being being apprehended, made them, without staying to see all sure, flee in such haste, that they killed one of their owne companions, who could not hold pace with them, because hee should not discouer them. Eumenes was conueighed away to the little Ile of Ægina, where he was cured: being all the while kept so secretly, that the fame of his death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his brother Attalus tooke vpon him as King, & either tooke or would haue taken to wife (supposing it belike a matter of State) Stratonica the daughter of King Ariarathes, whom he then thought the widow of Eumenes. It may well be numbred among the rare examples of brotherly loue, That when the King returned aliue home, Attalus going forth to meet him and doe his dutie, as in former times, receiued none other checke, than that hee should forbeare to marrie with the Queene, vntill Hee were well assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes neuer spake of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, vnto the same brother, both his wife and Kingdome. As likewise Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the preiudice of the King his brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in speciall fauour, when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readinesse, to haue transferred the Kingdome from his brother to Him. By such concord of brethren was the Kingdome of Pergamus raised and vpheld: as might also that of Macedon haue been, if Demetrius had liued and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Perseus.

It is likely that Perseus was very glad when he vnderstood, that his ministers had both accomplished his will, and had saued all from discouerie. But as he was deceiued in the maine point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes liued: so was Hee beguiled in that other hope, of the concealement; which he vainly esteemed the lesse materiall. For Hee had written to one Praxo a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertain the men whom he sent about this businesse: and she, being apprehended by C. Valerius a Roman Embassadour then attending vpon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Rammius a Citizen of Brundusium: who comming newly from the Court of Macedon, loaden with a dangerous secret, had presently sought out the Embassador, and therof discharged himselfe. Brundusium was the ordinary Port, for ships passing between Italy and Greece. There had Rammius a faire house; wherin he gaue entertainment, being a wealthy man, to Embassadors, and other honourable personages, both Romans and Macedonians, journying to and fro. By occasion of such his hospitality, he was commended to Perseus, and inuited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose many courtesies to his Embassadors, the King was studious to requite. At his comming he was much made of; and shortly, with more familiaritie than he expected or desired, made partaker of the kings secrets. The summe of all was, That he must needes doe a turne, in giuing to such of the Romans as the king should hereafter name, a poyson of rare quality, sure in operation, yet not to be perceiued either in the taking or afterward. Hee durst not refuse to accept this employment: for feare lest the vertue of this medicine should be tryed vpon himselfe. But being once at liberty; he discouered all. Rammius was but one man, and one whom the king had neuer seene before, nor was like to see againe: and therefore, besides that the kings deniall ought to be as good as such a fellowes affirmation, the accusation was improbable. Thus did Perseus, in time shortly following, answer for himselfe, and in like sort concerning the attempt vpon Eumenes: denying to haue had any hand, either in the one or other: yet withall professing, That such obiections were not to be made vnto a king, to proue the rightfulnesse of making warre vpon him; but rather vnto a subiect pleading for his life in iudgement. But howsoeuer the Romans neglected the getting of stronger proofe (which might haue beene easie) than any that wee finde by them produced: yet the base & cowardly temper of Perseus was very suteable to these practices. Neither did the Senate greatly stand to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royall Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for such priuate offences, it gaue him no priuiledge: they iudging him to haue offended in the nature of a king. Herein surely they wanted not good reason. For if hee might not lawfully make warre vpon Eumenes their confederate; that is, if Hee might not send men, to waste the kingdome of Pergamus, or to besiege the Townes: might he send Ruffians to murder the king? If it were no lesse breach of the league to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the sword: was it lawfull for him to doe

it by poyson. Wherefore they presently decreed warre against him; and sent Embassadours to denounce it vnto him, vnlesse hee would yeeld to make such amends as they should require. He seemed at this time to haue beene so confident in the generall fauour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances; that if he desired not warre, yet he did not feare it: or at least he thought by shew of courage, to make his enemies more calme. He caused the Embassadours to dance attendance; till being weary, they departed without audience. Then called he them backe; and bade them doe their errand. They made a tedious rehearsall of all matters, which they had long been collecting against him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that Hee had entertained long and secret conference in the Ile of Samothrace, with Embassadours sent to him out of Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to giue defiance. Better they might haue stood vpon the euidence, brought against him by Rammius and Praxo. For if those accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground whereon to build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a King, to be strong, wel-beloued, and well friended. Perseus answered, for the present, in a rage; calling the Romans, Greedy, Proud, Insolent, and vnderminers of him by their daily Embassadors, that were no better than meere spies. Finally, he promised to giue them in writing their full answer: which was to this effect; That he would no longer stand to the league, made betweene them and his father, and renewed by himselfe indeed onely for feare: but wished them to descend to more equall conditions, whereupon he, for his part, would aduise, as they might also doe for theirs.

Polyb. Legat. 9. Liuius lib. 33.

In the forme of the league betweene Philip and the Romans, as it is set downe by Polybius, we finde no condition, binding the Macedonian to any inconuenience in the future; excepting those which he immediately performed. But Liuie inserts a clause, wherby he was expresly forbidden, to make any war abroad, without leaue of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman confederates were included in this peace: whereby euery one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entring shortly into league with Rome, did so binde the Kings hands, that he could no more make warre abroad, than if he had beene restrained by plaine couenant. And thus might that seeme an Article of the peace, which neuer was agreed vpon, but onely was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would vrge this point further, and say, that the Macedonian might not beare defensiue armes, without their permission: then had Perseus very iust reason to finde himselfe agrieued. For since they had allowed his father, without controule, to make warre in Thrace, (whilest they themselues were vnacquainted with the Thracians) and elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why should they now interpret the bargaine after another fashion? Was it now become vnlawfull for him to chastise his owne Rebels, or to repay an Illyrian that inuaded Macedon? By such allegations hee maintained the right of his cause, in very milde sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the league as vniust; he ministred occasion vnto the Embassadours, to giue him defiance. Hauing heard the worst of their message; he commanded them to be gone out of his kingdome in three dayes. But either he should haue beene lesse vehement, or more constant in his resolution. For if his heart could serue him to vndertake the warre; hee should couragiously haue managed it, and haue fallen to worke immediately, whilest the Enemie was vnprepared; not haue lost opportunitie, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worse peace than the former.

§. VI.

§. VI.

The Romans sollicit the Greekes, to ioyne with them in the warre against Perseus. How the Greekes stood affected in that warre. The Timorousnesse of Perseus. Martius a Roman Embassadour deludes him with hope of Peace. His forces. He takes the field, and winnes part of Thessaly. The forces of Licinius the Roman Consul: and what assistants the Romans had in this warre. Of Tempe in Thessaly; and what aduantages the Macedonian had, or might haue had; but lost by his feare. Perseus braues the Romans; fights with them; knowes not how to vse his victorie; sues for Peace; and is denied it by the vanquished. Perseus hauing the worse in a skirmish, forsakes all the Countrey lying without Tempe. The Roman Commanders vnfortunate in the warre against Perseus. They vexe the Greekes their friends; for whose ease the Senate makes prouision, hauing heard their complaints. The flattering Alabanders.

SO long had the Romans beene seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian warre, that well might they haue beene ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behinde hand in prouisions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the warre: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together seemed more than sufficient. This opportunitie of making their cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were vnprepared for the action. Wherefore knowing, or hauing reason to beleeue, that their owne strength was such as would preuaile in the end; they hastily embraced the faire occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of Time. Neither was this their vnreadinesse a small helpe, towards examining the disposition of the Greekes, and others; who must afterwards dearely pay for any backwardnesse found in their good will. There was not indeed any cause to feare, that all of the Greekes or other Easterne people should conspire together, and take part with the Macedonian: such was the dissention betweene their seuerall Estates; howsoeuer the generalitie of them were enclined the same way. Neuertheless Embassadours were sent to deale with them all; and to craue their helpe against Perseus, or rather to demand it, in no lesse ample manner, than heretofore they had yeelded it against Philip and Antiochus, in warres pretending the liberty of Greece. The Embassadours vsed as gentle words for fashions sake, as if they had stood in doubt, that their request might happen to bee denied. But the Greeks were now growne well acquainted with such Roman courtesie: and vnderstood that not only such as made refusall, but euen they who might seeme to haue granted halfe vnwillingly, were like to heare other manner of words, when once this businesse was ended. Wherefore none of them were scrupulous in promising the best of their helpe to the Romans: the * Achæans and Rhodians, which were chiefe among them, being rather doubtfull, euen when they had done their best, lest it should be ill taken, as if they had halted in some part of their duetie. It is strange, that men could be so earnest to set vp the side, whereof they gladly would haue seene the ruine. The vulgar sort was euery where addicted to Perseus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if some were vehemently Roman, they wanted not opposers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wisest and most honest, who regarded onely the benefit of their Countrey, wished better to Perseus than to the Romans. And of this number, Polybius the chiefe of Historians was one: who though Hee * iudged the victory of Perseus, like to proue hurtfull vnto Greece; yet wished hee the Romans ill to thriue, that so the Greekes might recouer perfect libertie: for his endeuours in which course, he was at length tyrannically handled, as shall be shewed hereafter. This considered, it appeares, that an extraordinarie feare, and not onely reuerence of the Imperial City, made the Achæans and other Estates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occasion of this their feare, may be iustly imputed vnto the timorous demeanour of Perseus himselfe. He had vndertaken a warre, whereof the benefit should redound, not onely to his owne kingdome, but vnto all that were oppressed by the Romans. Yet no sooner were some few companies brought ouer-sea, to make a countenance of meaning somewhat against him, than he began to speak the enemy faire, and sue for Peace at Rome. Since therefore it was knowne, that euery small thing would serue to terrifie him; & consequently, that it should at all times be in the Romans power, by giuing him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take reuenge at leisure vpon those which had assisted him: little cause was there, why any should aduenture to partake with him. He made indeed a great noise; leading about his armie; taking by force or composition, some few Townes; and soliciting all to ioyne with him. But wise men could not be so beguiled. For at the same time, hee sought all meanes of pacification: and to that end, made humble suit vnto the Roman Embassadours. Q. Martius, the chiefe of those Embassadours, and a man of more sinenesse in cunning than was vsuall among the Romans; made shew of inclination to the Kings desire: and gaue out such comfortable words, that the king intreated, and obtained a meeting at the Riuer Peneus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the king, and charge him with those crimes that are before mentioned. Whereto though Perseus made none other answer, than the same which they could haue made for him; yet the Embassadours, and especially Martius, tooke it in good part, as therewith satisfied; and aduised him to giue the like satisfaction to the Senate. That this might conueniently bee done; a truce was agreed vpon. Thus had Martius his desire; which was, to make the king lose time. For Perseus had all things then in readinesse, and might haue done much, ere the Roman Armie could haue beene in Greece. But by the interposition of this truce, hee no way increased his forces; hee suffred a most conuenient season, of winning vpon the enemie, to slip away; and obtained in recompence nothing else, than leisure and vaine hope. Yet was he pleased herewith, as it had beene with some victory: publishing a copie of the disputation betweene him and the Romans, wherby he gaue men to vnderstand, how much he had the better, and what hope there was of Peace. He sent Embassadours also to the Rhodians, of whose good will to him he was best perswaded; not onely to let them know how much he was superiour in cause; but to intreat them, that they would take vpon them, as moderators, to compound the differences betweene him and the Romans, if perhaps, notwithstanding the goodnesse of his cause, hee should be denied peace. These were poore helpes. For hereby it appeared, that his late standing vpon point of Honour, was no better than meere vanity: his owne safety being the vtmost of his ambition. This his fearefulnesse might seeme excusable, and the blame thereof to appertaine vnto the Greekes, who deceiued his expectation, by being wanting to him in time of a necessitie, that was partly their owne: had it not bin his office, who tooke vpon him as their Champion, to giue such a manly beginning to the warres, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more auerse from him; and were carefull, not to put their shoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many stout partizans, desired him not to craue any thing at their hands, in which they might seeme to do against the good liking of the Romans. The Bœotians also, who had entred of late into a strict societie with the Macedonian, renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a sort, they yeelded themselues as vassals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their submission vnder a generall forme; but caused their seuerall Townes to make couenant apart, each for it selfe; to the end, that being thus distracted into many little Common weales, they might not (were they neuer so desirous to rebell) haue such force to doe hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated in one, vnder the Citie of Thebes. This worke, of separating the Bœotians from Thebes their head, was more than Agesilaus could effect, or Epaminondas would suffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedæmonians. So far more auailable to Thebes, being destitute of helpe from abroad, was the vertue of Epaminondas and a few braue Citizens; than was the societie with king Perseus, against a number not so great as followed the Lacedæmonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whilest the king late still, as being bound by the truce: and hauing done this, he returned to the Citie, where vaunting what he had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though some reprooued it as dishonest) employed againe by the Senate, with commission to deale as he should thinke expedient. Touching the Embassadours which Perseus had sent; audience was giuen to them, for that they should not plainly see how their Master was deluded: but neither excuse, nor intreatie would serue their turne; the Senate being resolued before-hand what to doe. It was enough that they were admitted into the City; & had thirty dayes respite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they, who came last on the same errand, did their message without the walls, in the Temple of Bellona (the vsuall place of giuing audience to open enemies, or to such Commanders, as might not, by reason of some custome, enter the Citie) and had onely the short warning of eleuen dayes, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poore courtesie serue onely to hide the craft of Marcius, as if he had meant none other than good earnest: but it was a likely meane, both to keep a long while from Perseus the knowledge of his businesse, and to stagger his resolution, when hee should need it most firme.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius the Romane Consul, was at Apollonia, in a manner as soon, as the Macedonian Embassadors were with their king at Pella. Which, though it were enough to haue rouzed Perseus, and haue made him lay aside all cowardly hope of getting pardon: yet was he contented to deliberate a while, Whether it were not better to offer himselfe tributary to the Romans, and to redeem their good will with some part of his kingdome, that so hee might enioy the rest; than to put all at once to hazzard. But finally, the stoutest counsel preuailed; which also was the wisest, and so would haue proued, had it beene stoutly and wisely followed. Hee now beganne, as if the warre had not begunne vntill now, to doe what should haue bin done long afore. He caused all his forces to be drawne together; and appointed their Rendeuous at Citium, a Towne in Macedon. All being in readinesse, he did royall sacrifice, with an hundred beasts, to I know not what Minerua, that was peculiarly honoured in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers, and those of his guard, set forward to Citium. His armie he found consisting of nine and thirty thousand foot, and foure thousand horse, whereof about twelue thousand foot, and a thousand horse, were strangers, of sundry nations, most part Thracians; the rest of his owne Macedonians. These hee animated with liuely speeches; laying before them the glory of their ancestors, the insolencie of the Romans, the goodnesse of his cause, the greatnesse of his prouisions, and the many aduantages which they had of the Enemy, especially in numbers. They answered him cheerefully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all cities of Macedon there came likewise messengers, offering to helpe him with money and victuals, according to their seuerall abilities. He gaue them thankes: but answered, That his own prouisions would abundantly suffice, willing them only to furnish him with carts, for his engines and munition.

Out of his owne kingdome he issued forth into Thessalie: knowing that the Romans were to passe through that Country, in their iourney towards him. Some Townes of Thessalie opened their gates vnto him, without making offer to defend themselues; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well manned; and some he wonne by force. Of these last was Mylæ; a Towne thought impregnable, & therefore, not more stoutly than proudly defended by the inhabitants, who gaue contumelious language to the assailants. It was taken by reason of a sally; which the Townesmen rashly made, and being driuen backe, receiued the Macedonians, that entred pell mell with them at the gate. All cruelty of war was practised here: to the greater terrour of the obstinate. So Velatiæ and Connus (townes of much importance, especially Connus, which stood in the streights of Ossa, leading into Tempe) yeelded at the first. Hauing well fortified this passage, the king marched onwards to Sycurium, a town seated on the foot of mount Ossa; where he rested a while, expecting newes of the Enemy.

Licinius the Consul brought with him onely two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes and Attalus his brother came to him in Thessalie, with foure thousand foot, and a thousand horse. Thither also came, from euery part of Greece, such aide as the seuerall Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send: which from the most of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad; Masanissa sent thither his sonne Misagenes, with a thousand foot, as many horse, and two and twenty Elephants. Ariaratbes the Cappadocian, by reason of his affinitie with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his yong sonne, there to be brought vp: yet he did little or nothing in this warre; perhaps because Eumenes himselfe beganne within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise aduised than he had beene in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing the Romanes. Antiochus and Ptolomie (though Ptolomie was then young, and vnder Tutors) had businesse of their owne; the Syrian meaning to inuade the Egyptian: yet each of them promised helpe to the Romanes, which they cared not to perform. Gentius the Illyrian was inclinable to the Macedonian;

yet made good countenance to the Romans, for feare. It was a pretty tricke, wherewith M. Lucretius, the Roman Admirals brother, serued him, for this his counterfeit good wil. This king had foure and fiftie ships, riding in the hauen of Dyrrachium, vncertaine to what purpose: all which Lucretius tooke away, after a very kind sort, making shew to beleeue, That for none other end than to serue the Romans, their good friend Gentius had sent thither this fleet. But whatsoeuer Gentius thought in the beginning, he foolishly lost both his kingdome & himselfe, in the end of this warre, by offering, rather than giuing, his helpe to Perseus.

With none other company than what hee brought ouer the sea, Licinius came into Thessalie: so tyred with a painefull iourney, through the mountainous Country of Athamania, which stood in his way from Epirus; that if Perseus had been ready, attending his descent into the Plaines, the Romans must needs haue taken a great ouerthrow. Hee refreshed himselfe and his wearied armie, by the riuer Peneus; where he encamped, attending his auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender helpe, that could enable him to deale with Perseus. Therefore he resolued, to abide where hee then was, and keepe his trenches, vntill his numbers were sufficiently increased: contenting himselfe in the meane while, to haue gotten quiet entrance into the country. The land of Thessalie, in which these two armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece besides: as hauing beene freed by them from a more heauy yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope or expectation of such a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitfull, and abounding in all things needfull to mans life. In the midst of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautifull valley of Tempe, so exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was often vsed at large, to signifie the most pleasant and goodly places. This valley of it selfe was not great: but adding to it those huge mountaines Ossa & Olympus (famous in Poesie) with their Spurres or Branches, by which it was on all sides enclosed, it occupied the better part of Thessalie. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; vnlesse they would make an hungry iourney, thorow the country of the Dassaretians, as in the former warre with Philip, they had long, in vaine, attempted to doe. Perseus therefore had no small aduantage, by being master of the streights leading into Tempe: though farre greater he might haue had, if by misspending of time he had not lost it. For if in defending the ragged passages of these mountaines, he were able to put the Romans often to the worse; yea to winne vpon them (for a while) euery yeere more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionlesse he might haue done farre greater things, had he seized vpon the streights of Aous, which his father once kept, and defended all the Countrey behind the mountaines of Pindus. Surely not without extreme difficultie, must the Romans haue either trauelled by land, with all their carriages and impediments, through places wherein was no reliefe to bee found; or else haue committed their armies, and all things thereto needefull, vnto the mercie of Seas that were very dangerous; if hee would haue sought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: vpon neither of which courses they once deuised, notwithstanding any trouble which they found in this present warre. It may perhaps bee said, that the Greekes, and others, whom the King must haue left on his backe, would haue made him vnable to defend any places too far from his owne home. But they were all, excepting the Thessalians, better affected now to him, than they had bin to his father in the former warre. The Ætolians, vpon whom the Athamanians depended, grew into suspition with the Romans (as wee shall finde anon) euen as soone as they met with Perseus. The Bœotians, how politikely soeuer Martius had wrought with them, aduentured themselues desperately in the Macedonian quarrell; what would they haue done, if hee at first had done his best? The Rhodians, Illyrians, yea and Eumenes himselfe, after a while began to wauer, when they saw things goe better with Perseus, than they had expected. So that if in stead of discouraging his friends, by suing basely for peace; he had raised their hopes, by any braue performance in the beginning; and encreased the number of his wel-willers, yea & bought downe with money (as he might haue done) some of his enemies, and among them, Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head: then might the Romans perhaps haue bin compelled to forsake their imperious patronage ouer Greece; & to render the liberty, by them giuen, entire; which otherwise was but imaginary. Such benefit of this war, since it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reason haue bin expected at first, from greater aduantages. But as a fearefull companie running from their enemies, till some riuer stay their flight; are there compelled by meere desperation to doe such acts, as done, while the battell lasted, would haue won the victory: so fell it out with Perseus. In seeking to auoid the danger of that warre, whereof he should haue sought the honour; he left his friends that would haue stood by him, & gaue them cause to prouide for their owne safety: yet being ouertaken by necessitie, hee chose rather to set his backe to the mountaines of Tempe, & defend himself with his proper forces; than to be driuen into such miserie, as was inuitable, if he gaue a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that hee kept his footing in Thessalie, it is hard to shew particularly, for that the history of those things is much perished. Wherefore we must be contented with the summe.

The Consul hauing no desire to fight, vntill such time as all his forces were arriued; kept within his trenches, & lay still encamped by the Riuer of Peneus, about three miles from Larissa. That which perswaded the Consul to protract the time, did contrariwise incite the King, to put the matter vnto a hasty triall. Wherefore he inuited the Romanes into the field; by wasting the land of the Pheræans their confederates. Finding them patient of this indignitie; he grew bold to aduenture euen vnto their trenches: out of which if they issued, it was likely, that his aduantage in horse would make the victory his owne. At his comming they were troubled; for that it was sudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themselues to be safely lodged. They sent out a few of King Eumenes his horse, and with them some light armed foot, to entertaine skirmish. The Captaine, and some other of these were slaine: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius, nor Eumenes, found it reasonable to hazzard battell. Thus day after day, a while together, Perseus continued offering battaile: which they still refused. Hereby his boldnesse much increased; and much more his reputation: to the griefe of those who being so farre come to make a Conquest, could ill digest the shame, that fell vpon them by their enduring these brauadoes. The Towne of Sycurium, where Perseus then lay, was twelue miles from the Romanes: neither was there any conuenient watering in that long march, which vsed to take vp foure houres of the morning; but hee was faine to bring water along with him in carts, that his men might not bee both weary and thirsty when they came to fight. For remedy of these inconueniences, hee found out a lodging, seuen miles neerer to the enemy: whom hee visited the next day by the Sunne rising. His comming at such an vnusuall houre, filled the Campe with tumult: in so much as though he brought with him onely his horse and light armature, that were vnfit to assaile the trenches, yet the Consul thought it necessarie, and resolued to giue checke to his pride. Wherefore hee sent foorth his brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many braue Captaines, with all his power of horse, his Velites, and all the rest of his light armature, to trie their fortune: hee himselfe remaining in the Campe, with his Legions in readinesse. The honour of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the victory in a manner entire (though the Thessalians made a good retrait) with little losse of his owne. But he discouered his weakenesse ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly doe, to counsaile giuen by one of his owne temper. For whereas the Romans were in great feare lest he should assault their campe; and to that purpose, vpon the first newes of his successe, his Phalanx was brought vnto him by the Captaines, though vnsent for: he neuertheless tooke it for sound aduice, which indeed was timorous and base, To worke warily, and moderate his victory; by which meanes it was said, that either he should get honest conditions of peace, or at least-wise many companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like, that his good fortune would exalt the hope and courage of his friends. Yet had it beene greater, and had he wonne the Roman Campe, his friends would haue beene the more, and the bolder. But ouer-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: and in suing for it, euen when he had the victory, what else did hee, than proclaime vnto all which would become his partakers, that neither good nor bad fortune should keep him from yeelding to the Romans, whensoeuer they would be pleased to accept him? At this time the ioy of his victory would admit none of these considerations. Hee had slaine of the Roman horse two hundred, and taken of them prisoners the like number. Of their foot hee had slaine about two thousand: losing of his owne no more than twenty horse and fortie foot. The Romane Campe, after this disaster, was full of heauinesse and feare: it being much doubted that the enemy would set vpon it. Eumenes gaue counsaile to dislodge by night, and remooue to a surer place beyond the Riuer Peneus. The Consul, though ashamed to professe, by so doing, in what feare he stood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the losse past, than by standing on proud tearmes, to draw vpon himselfe a greater calamitie. So hee passed the Riuer in the dead of the night, and encamped more strongly on the further side. The Ætolians were sorely blamed for this losse: as if rather a trayterous meaning, than any true feare, had occasioned their flight, wherein the rest of the Greeks followed them. Fiue of them that were men of especiall marke, had been obserued to bee the first which turned their backes: an obseruation likely to cost them deare, at a time of better leisure. As for the Thessalians, their vertue was honoured with reward: so as the Greeks might learne, by examples of either kinde, that if they would shunne indignation, or incurre fauour, then must they aduenture no lesse for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would doe for their owne liberty. Thus fared it with the Consul and his Armie. Perseus came the next day to correct the former dayes errour; which how great it was, he not vntill then found. The Romanes were gotten into a place of safety; whither they could neuer haue attained, if the King had either pressed his victory, or giuen better heed to them that night: his light armature alone being sufficient to haue rowted them whilest they were conueying themselues to the other side of Peneus. But it was vaine to tell what might haue beene done, since there was no remedy. The Romans were beaten, euen the flower of their Citie, the Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were chosen their Senators, and consequently the Generals themselues, Prætors, Consuls, and all that bore office or command among them; yea, they were beaten so shamefully, that they stole away by night, and suffered him to gather vp the spoyles of them without resistance, as yeelding themselues ouercome. With such braue words did the king set out the glory of his action; diuiding the spoyles among his followers. But there was much wanting within him, to haue made his honor sound. He came neerer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopselus, a place in the mid-way betweene Tempe and Lariſſa: as if it were his meaning to presse them somewhat harder. Neuertheless he was easily perswaded to vse the occasion, which he seemed to haue, of obtaining peace. Therefore he sent vnto the Consul, and offered to yeeld vnto the same Conditions, wherein his Father had beene bound to the Romans, if the warre might so take end. It were needlesse here againe to shew the folly of this his course. Towards the accomplishment of this desired peace, there was in the Consul no greater power than to grant a truce, whilest Embassadors might goe to Rome: it resting in the Senate and People to approue the conditions and ratifie the league. And of such a truce granted by Mantius, he had lately found no small discommoditie redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned answer, That other hope of peace there was none, saue that Perseus would yeeld both his kingdome and person, simply and absolutely, to discretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius to bee so resolute in aduersitie. On the other side, it argued a faint heart in Perseus, that hauing receiued an answer so peremptory, he still persisted, making vaine offers of great tribute. Finding that the peace, which he so much desired, could not be purchased with money, the king withdrew himselfe backe to Sycrium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whose forces were well repaired by the comming of Misagenes the son of Masanissa, with the aide before mentioned. This distance betweene the king & them, caused the Romans to waxe the more bold in making their harueſt: about which businesse they ranged all ouer the fields. Their careless demeanor gaue him hope to doe some notable exploit: which he attempted, both vpon their Campe, and vpon those that were abroad. The Campe hee thought to haue fired on the sudden: but the alarme being taken in good season, he failed in the enterprize. As for the forragers, he had a good hand vpon them, if hee could haue withdrawne it, and giuen ouer in time. But whilest he stroue to force a guard, he was visited by the Consul, by whom either in a skirmish of horse, or (for the report is diuers) in a great battell, he was ouercome. This misaduenture, whether great or small, caused Perseus, after a few dayes, to fall backe into Macedon, as being naturally giuen to feare danger, euen where none was, whereby what losse he felt, will appeare hereafter. Hee left all behinde him, saue onely Tempe, weakely guarded: and consequently an easie prey to the Romanes.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went straight vnto Gonnus, hoping to haue taken it, and so to haue gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the worke too hard, he returned backe vnto the Perrhæbians and others, from whom he won some townes, & among the rest, Larissa. There were sundry townes thereabout, bearing the same name of Larissa: so that this which the Consul tooke, may seeme not to haue belonged vnto the Thessalians, vnlesse, perhaps, after his victory, Perseus did greater Acts than we finde recorded, and got some part of Thessalie.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to giue a precise account, for that the histories of them are greatly defectiue. One may thinke it strange, that the Bœotians, whom a Roman Embassadour could terrifie, and bring altogether to his owne will, should not be afraid of a Roman Armie, then on foot in Greece, and a Nauie on their coast. But more strange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the Art of Martius, were more true to Rome, than other petty townes, which by that same distraction of the Bœotians, became within themselues more absolute, than formerly they had beene. The causes hereof were to haue beene sought among the changes, happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now lost. Some of them rebelled, and were throughly punished by Lutetius the Roman Admirall: who got so much by spoyling them, that hee would haue brought others to rebell in like sort, if by extreame oppression hee could haue driuen them so farre. Neither was Licinius the Consul vndiligent in the same kinde. What his doings were, after such time as he was at leisure from Perseus, I finde no where mentioned. Onely this is said in generall; That in the warre which hee made, hee cruelly and couetously demeaned himselfe. Liu. lib. 43.

After the same fashion dealt they, that commanded in the yeere following; Hostilius the Consul, and Hortensius the Admirall, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hostilius shewed more of his industrie, in picking quarrels with the confederates of Rome, than in prosecuting the warre against the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman warre vpon his kingdome, after that the Consul had fought passage in vaine ouer certaine mountaines, Perseus seemed, in a manner, free from it. He was troubled indeede on that side which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Consul sent thither with an Armie of foure thousand, and who, by leuies made vpon the Confederates, doubled this his Armie. But Claudius thinking to haue taken Vscana, a border towne of Illyria, by treason, came thither in such careless order, that the inhabitants which had made shew of treason, with purpose onely to traine him into danger; sallied foorth vpon him, ouerthrew him, and chased him so farre, that hardly he escaped with the fourth part of his company. Yet this towne of Vscana shortly after became Romane: which howsoeuer it happened, Perseus very soone recouered it, and many other places therewithall: Cotys a Thracian King, securing him on the one side of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirote, reuolted from the Romans, on the other. Perseus likewise made a painefull iourney into Ætolia: where he was promised to be admitted into Stratus, that was the strongest Citie in that Region. Of this hope though he were disappointed by those of the Romane faction; yet in his returne home, he tooke in Aperantia, and shortly heard good newes, That Ap. Claudius was againe throughly beaten by Cleuas, one of his Lieutenants. Such successe had the Macedonian warre vnder Hostilius. The same Consul offended much the Greeks, by the strict inquisition which his Embassadours made into mens affection towards Rome. For these Embassadours trauelling thorow all the Cities of Peloponnesus, gaue out speeches tending to shew, That they liked no better of those who sought not by might and maine to aduance their businesse, than of those which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to haue accused by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the steps of Philopœmen; and together with him, his sonne Polybius, who soone after was Generall of the Achæan horse, but more notable by that excellent historie which he wrote, than by his great employments, which he well and honourably discharged. The summe of the accusation should haue beene; That these were not heartie friends vnto the Romans, but such as abstained from raising troubles, more for lacke of opportunitie, than for any loue to the common quiet. But since no color of truth could be found, that might giue countenance to such a tale; it was thought better, for the present, to let it alone, & giue gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Ætolians. They demanded hostages; and found some in the Counsell that approued the motion: as also among Polyb. Legat. 70. Polyb. Leg. 74.

the Acarnanians, there were that entreated to haue Roman garrisons bestowed in their townes. But neither the one nor the other of these propositions tooke effect. They of the Roman faction, accused not only such as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but also the good Patriotes; making it no lesse than a matter of treason, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary side, there wanted not some, who roundly told these pick-thankes of their base flattery; rating them openly, in such sort, that one of them hardly escaped being stoned, euen in presence of the Embassadours. Thus was all full of accusations and excuses: among which the Embassadors carried themselues, as men that could beleeue none ill; though it were well enough knowne what they thought. The best was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and published, to this effect: That it should be free for all men, to refuse obedience to any Roman Magistrate, imposing any burthen for the present warre, vnlesse it were such, as the Senate had likewise thought meete. Of this decree the whole Country was glad: for it was, or seemed, a good remedy of many inconueniences. But they that standing on priuiledge hereof, refused to fulfill euery commandement, were numbred among the Patriotes; which in the end of this warre, proued little better, if not worse, than to haue beene Traytors. The Senate was driuen to set downe this order; by reason of the many & vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magistrates, & especially by the Admirals, Lucretius and Hortensius. Lucretius was condemned in a great sum of money, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loued not to haue their subiects oppressed. Hortensius being still in office, had warning to amend.

Among the great number of Embassages that came to Rome about this time, either to seek redresse of iniuries, or to offer their seruices: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a towne of the lesser Asia, there was presented vnto the Senate, and well accepted, a most base piece of flatterie. These Alabanders brought three hundred horsemens targets, and a crowne of gold, to bestow vpon Iupiter in the Capitol. But hauing a desire to gratifie the Romans with some exquisite token of their dutifull obedience, wherein they would be singular; and being not able to reach vnto any great performance: they built a Temple, vnto the towne Rome, & appointed anniuersarie games to be celebrated among them, in honour of that goddesse. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolomie, & the like vaine men, that would be thought gods; or at the shameless flatery of such as bestowed vpon men, and not the most vertuous of men, diuine honours; when hee sees a towne of houses, wherein powerfull men dwell, worshipped as a goddesse, and receiued (without scorne of the giuers, or shame of the Present) the title of Deitie, at the gift of such a rascall Citie as Alabanda?

After two yeeres of the Macedonian warre, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the warre began; which had beene thought likely to reforme all those Countries, and bring them to what passe the Romans desired; as it did in the end. Perseus had hitherto the better, and was stronger now, than when he liued in peace. He had enlarged his borders on the Illyrian side; his friends, in al parts of Greece, tooke courage daily; and his reputation grew such, as caused those that were before wholly Roman, to suspect what the issue of the warre might proue, and thereupon to become wise for themselues. Contrariwise, Licinius & Hostilius the Consuls, had one after the

the other spent their time in vaine, seeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conquest, by very many losses receiued. The Roman Admiralls had so demeaned themselues, that many Townes, euen of the best affected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the feare was great on the Romans side; and the Armie much lessened, not onely by casualties of warre, but by the facilitie of the Tribunes or Colonels, or else of the Consul himselfe (for they laid the blame one vpon another) in licencing the souldiers to depart. Quintius Martius the new Consul, who succeeded vnto Hostilius, was to amend all this: which neuertheless was more than hee knew how to doe: though he brought with him a strong supply of men. Hee began hotly to set the warre on foot, which a long time had slept And hee began the right way: not seeking to force the streights that were surely guarded, but taking pains to climbe the mountains which were thought able to forbid all passage ouer them, without helpe or need of any custodie. The King heard of his approach; and being vncertaine what way hee meant to take, distributed his owne forces, to the defence of all places which might giue entrance, or permit ascent. But the Consul proceeded in his iourney: with hope, either not to be discouered by the Enemie, or to breake through all opposition, or at leastwise, to fight on as conuenient ground, as they should haue that lay to stop him, and at length, if all failed to make a safe retreat. He sent before him foure thousand of his most expedit foot, to discouer the waies. Two daies was this company troubled, in ouercomming the difficultie of no more than fifteene miles: after which they had sight of the Enemie, that lay to denie their passage. They occupied therefore a safe peece of ground; and sent backe word to the Consul, where they were; intreating him to hasten vnto them: which hee did. The Macedonians were not a whit dismayed at his arriuall; but met him, and fought with him, two or three daies together; each returning to their owne Campe at night, with little losse on either side. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a mountaine, which gaue scarcely roome vnto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to bee employed: all the rest were beholders. In this case, it was impossible to get forwards: yet a shame to returne. Wherefore Martius tooke the onely course remaining; and indeed the best: Part of his men hee left with Popilius, to attend vpon the Macedonians: whilest hee, with the rest, fetcht a compasse about, and sought out wayes that neuer had beene troden. Herein hee found extreame difficultie: which notwithstanding hee ouercame. Besides the troubles commonly incident to such iourneyes, through places vnfit for habitation: hee was compelled, by labour of hand, to make pathes where none were, yea, where Nature might seeme to haue intended, that none should bee. So steepe hee found the discent of the mountaines, in this way which hee tooke: that of seuen miles, which they trauelled the first day, his men were compelled, for the more part, to rowle themselues downe; as not daring to trust their feet. Neither was this the worst. For they met with rockes, that stood one ouer another, so vpright, and cumbersome to get downe; that their Elephants were affraid of the giddy prospect, and casting their gouernours, made a terrible noyse, which affrighted the horses, and bred great confusion. Hauing therefore gone, or wallowed, foure miles of this grieuous iourney; there was nothing more desired by the souldiours, than that they might bee suffered to creepe backe againe, the same way which they had come. But shift was made to let downe the Elephants, by a kinde of bridges, like vnto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was ioyned to the edge of the cliffe; the other sustained by two long postes, fastned in the ground below. Vpon these two postes, or poles (which indeed (not being very strong, since it was intended that they should bee either cut or broken) were fastned two rafters, answerable in length to the distance, betweene the higher and the lower fall: so as the end of one bridge might reach vnto the beginning of another. These were couered with plankes and turfe; that they might seeme continent with the ground; so to make the beastes aduenturous to goe vpon them. If there were a plaine of any good extent from the foote of a rocke, to the next downefall; then might the bridge bee shorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretty way, vpon one of these; the posts vpholding the frame were cut asunder; thereby causing him to sinke downe vnto the next bridge; whence hee was conueyed in like manner, to the third, and onward still to the verie bottome. Thus went they downe sliding, some on their feet, others on their buttocks, till they came to an euen valley. By this it appeares, how throughly prouided the

Romans vsed to beare their iourneys; of things needfull in all occasions: as also what ineſtimable paines they tooke in this deſcent, about the conueyance of themſelues and all their carriages downe the mountaines. The next day they reſted, ſtaying for Popilius and his company, who hardly or perhaps neuer, ſhould haue ouertaken them, if the Enemie had followed, and ſet vpon him from aloft. The third and fourth daies iourneyes were like vnto the firſt: ſaue that cuſtome, and the neereneſſe to their waies end without meeting enemy, cauſed them the better to endure the labour.

Perſeus could not be ignorant of the Romans comming towards him: ſince they fought with his men vpon the paſſage, three daies together; he lying ſo high, that he might weneere haue heard the noyſe. Yet was he ſo poſſeſſed with feare; that hee neither ſtirred to helpe his owne men, or to hinder the Conſul, nor made any prouiſion for that which might fall out; but as one void of counſaile, ſate hearkening after the euent. Foure onely paſſages there were, leading into Tempe: the firſt by Connus, which the Romans were vnable to force: the ſecond and third were the ſame which Martius had attempted in vaine, and another like vnto it: the laſt, by the Citie of Dium out of Macedon. All theſe were ſufficiently guarded: and whoſoeuer would ſeeke any other way, muſt bee faine to take ſuch paines as Martius had vndergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the reſt: whereof only the King had benefit; for that his enemies could not get thither, ſaue through the valley it ſelfe, into which they muſt firſt pierce another way. Dium ſtood vpon the foot of the huge mountaine Olympus, about a mile from the ſea: of which mile, the Riuer Helecon becomming there a lake, and called Baphyras, tooke vp the one halfe; the reſt being ſuch as might eaſily haue beene fortified. Beſides all theſe, there was in the middeſt of Tempe, a paſſage which ten men might eaſily keepe: where the ſpurres of the mountaines, reaching farre into the valley, drew neere to the very bankes of Peneus, a goodly and deepe riuer which ran thorow it. Wherefore nothing had beene more eaſie, than to make the Conſul repent him of his troubleſome iourney: if Perſeus could haue ſeene his owne aduantages. For the Roman Armie was not onely in ill caſe to fight, after the vexation of that miſerable trauaile: but muſt needs haue either periſhed for want of victuals, or bin inforced to return the ſame way that it came; if the King had made good the ſtreight of Dium. To haue returned, and climbed vp with their Elephants & carriages, againſt thoſe rocks, from which, with extreame labour, they could hardly get downe, it ſeemes a matter of impoſſibilitie: eſpecially conſidering, how the enemy from aboue their heads, would haue beaten vpon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they ſtole away from him. It may therefore be thought ſtrange, that the Romans did not rather take their iourney into Macedon, from the ſide of Illyria, whence that kingdome had often beene inuaded, as lying open on that part: than put themſelues to the trouble of breaking into Tempe; whence, after that they were arriued, there was no meanes to eſcape, without enforcing one of thoſe paſſages, which they deſpaired to winne. For hee no ſooner heard that the Enemie was come ouer the mountaines into Tempe; than hee fared like one out of his wittes; ſaying, That hee was vanquiſhed, and had loſt all without battaile. Herewithall he began to take out of Dium, what hee could carry away in haſte; and ſtraight wayes abandoned the Towne. In the ſame vehemencie of amazement, hee ſent a ſtrait commandement to Theſſalonica, that the Arſenall there ſhould be ſet on fire; and to Pella, that his treaſures there ſhould be caſt into the ſea: as if the Romans were like preſently to be maſters of theſe two Cities. Niceas, who was appointed to drowne the treaſure, performed it haſtily as well as he could: though ſoone after, his maſter grew ſorie for the loſſe; and it was all, in a manner, recouered by Diuers from vnder the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to ſet fire on the Kings Arſenall, deferred the execution; foreſeeing that repentance might follow: and ſo he preuented the dammage. Whether Niceas, for his abſolute and blinde obedience, or Andronicus, for his carefull prouidence, merited the greater commendation, or more eaſie pardon; it reſted in the King to interpret. The reward of their ſeruice was this. Perſeus growing aſhamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this haſtie direction; cauſed them both to be ſlaine. Alſo thoſe poore men, which had fetcht his treaſure out of the Sea by their diuing, were payed their wages after the ſame ſort: that ſo there might be no witneſſe of the Kings baſe folly. Such end muſt they feare, who are priuie to diſhonourable actions of great Princes. If Perſeus would haue gone ſurely to worke, for the hiding of his fault; then must he so royally haue behaued himselfe, that no man might beleeue him to be the author of any vnworthy act or counsaile. But his vertue was of no such capacitie. Hee thought it enough to lay the blame vpon others. And therefore, hauing called Hippias away (the Captaine which had stopped the Consul on the top of the mountaine) and Asclepiodatus, from defence of the passages, whereto they were by him appointed: he rated them openly, saying, that they had betrayed vnto the Enemy the gates and bars of Macedon. Of this reproach, if they would discharge themselues, by laying it vpon him, to whom of right it belonged: then might they haue sped as did Nicias and Andronicus.

The Consul Martius had great cause to reioyce, for that the King so hastily relinquished his possession of Tempe, and all the passages leading thereinto; since the Roman Army, this notwithstanding, was hardly able to subsist, for want of victuals. He took Dium without resistance; and thence went forward into Macedon: wherein hauing trauelled about a dayes iourney, and gotten one towne that yeelded, he was compelled by meere lacke of food for his men, to returne back towards Thessaly. His fleet came to him, in this time of necessitie, well appointed to haue holpen him in the warre: but hauing left behinde, at Magnesia, the ships of burthen, which carried the prouisions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had beene carefull to occupy one of the Castles about Tempe, which were forsaken by the Macedonians: for by those waies onely might corne be brought into the Army. To meet the sooner with this corne, which was most desirously expected, he forsooke Dium, and went to Phila; by which foolish iourney (if not worse than foolish) hee lost more, than a little the longer fasting had been worth. It is probable that his carts, with all or the most of his store, were lost among the mountaines: for otherwise it had beene madnesse to put himselfe on such an enterprise, so slenderly prouided, as that without enforcement, or sight of the Enemie, hee should be faine to quite it. Howsoeuer it was: men thought him a coward, or at least a badde man of warre; since he thus recoyled and gaue off, when it most behooued him to haue prosecuted the action.

By vnderstanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recollected himselfe, vnderstood his owne error; sought to hide it by such poore meanes as haue been shewed, and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repossessed the towne of Dium, which he hastily repaired, finding it dis-mantled by the Romans. This done; he encamped strongly by the Riuer of Enipeus: meaning there to stop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Lesse diligence, more timely vsed, would haue beene enough, not onely to haue deliuered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace: but to haue giuen him such a noble victory, as might cause the Romans to seek a good end of the warre vpon faire conditions, and not to begin againe in haste. Yet this recouery and fortification of Dium, was to the Consul an exceeding hindrance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the conquest in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Onely the towne of Heraclea, standing on the riuer of Peneus, fiue miles from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a tricke of climing vpon mens heads, somewhat after the manner of our tumblers. But it made such defence as it could, and was not giuen vp for feare. After this, Martius did set a bold face towards Dium; as if he would haue taken it againe, and haue driuen the king further off: although his intent or hope was nothing like so great: his chiefe care, being to prouide for his wintering. Hee sent the Admirall to make attempt vpon the Sea-Townes, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias, and others. All these were assayed: but in vaine. The fields about Thessalonica were wasted; and some companies, that sundry times aduentured forth of the Towne, were still put to the worse. As for the Towne it selfe; there was danger in comming neere it, either by land or sea; by reason of the engins, which shot from the walls, and reached vnto the fleet. Wherefore the Admirall setting saile from thence, ran along by Ænia, and Antigonea, (landing neere to each of them, and both doing and receiuing hurt) vntil he came to Pallene in the territory of Cassandrea. There king Eumenes ioyned with him, bringing twenty shippes of Warre; and fiue other were sent thither from king Prusias. With this accesse of strength, the Admirall was bold to trie his fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perseus, before the towne: which while the Romans were filling vp, question was made, what became of the earth taken thence, for that it lay not vpon the banke. By this occasion, it was learned, that there were were arches in the town-wall filled vp with that earth, and couered with one ſingle row of bricke. Hence the Admirall gathered hope of making way into the towne, by ſapping the walls. To this worke he appointed ſuch as he thought meeteſt: giuing an alarme to the other ſide of the towne, thereby to ſhadow his attempt, the breach was ſoone made. But whileſt the Romans were ſhouting for ioy, and ordering themſelues for the aſſault: the Captaines within the towne perceiued what was done; and ſallying forth vnexpected, gaue a fierce charge on the companies that were between the ditch and the wall; of whom they ſlew about ſixe hundred, and ſuffered few to eſcape vnwounded. This diſaſter, and the want of good ſucceſſe on that part of the towne which king Eumenes aſſailed (a ſupply in the meane while entring the towne by ſea) cauſed the ſiege to breake vp. Torone was the next place which the Admirall thought meet to attempt: and thence likewiſe he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: whereinto Euphranor, a Macedonian Captaine, was gotten before his comming, with ſuch forces, as were not onely ſufficient to haue defended the Towne, if the Admirall had layed ſiege to it, but to keepe the land about it from ſpoyle; or at leaſt (as they did) to make the enemy pay deare for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his iourney to Demetrias, by Melibœa; whither the Conſul (that he might not be quite without work) had ſent his Lieutenant to beſiege it: and by the terrour of his appearing ſuddenly ouer their heads, cauſed the beſiegers to diſlodge in all haſte, ſetting their Campe on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, ſo far was their ability ſhort of their Enterpriſes; euer ſince their Conſul (whether daſtardly, or careleſſly) moſt vnlike a good Commander, had let goe his hold of Macedon, by forſaking Dium: Yea, it is to be ſuſpected, that ſome greater harme befell them, or at leaſt, that they were in ſome greater danger, than is expreſſed in the broken remaining Hiſtorie of this Warre. For Martius perſwaded the Rhodians by Ageſipolis their Embaſſadour, who came to him at Heraclea about other buſineſſe of leſſe importance, That they ſhould doe well to interpoſe themſelues as mediatours, and ſeeke to finiſh the Warre. Polyb. Leg. 80. Now, although Polybius doe moſt probably coniecture, that this was rather a malicious deuice of Martius, craftily ſeeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their oppoſing the reſolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true feare in him, either of Perſeus, or of Antiochus, who had then an armie on foot: yet ſince he made ſhew of feare, it is like withall, that ſomewhat had happened, which might make his feare ſeeme not counterfeit. And ſo were the Rhodians moued to thinke of him; not onely for that the extraordinary courteſie, both of him and of the Admirall, towards their Embaſſadour, comming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cauſe it; but much more, for that ſhortly after the Embaſſadours of Perſeus, and of Gentius the Illyrian, did ſet out their buſineſſe at Rhodes, not more with the ſtrength of a good fleet, which the Macedonian had gotten, than with the honor of ſome victory, wherein he had lately ſlaine great numbers of the Roman horſe. Polyb. Leg. 87. m Thus much we finde intimated: though the time, place, or other circumſtances of the fight, be not ſpecified. And hereto may be referred, the report of thoſe that were ſent from Rome to view the eſtate of Martius his army. For they found the Conſul wanting meat; the Admirall wanting men; and, for thoſe few that he had, wanting both money and cloathes: and Ap. Claudius the Prætor, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, ſo vnable to inuade Macedon, that contrariwiſe, he was in extreame danger; ſo as either he muſt quickly be ſent for thence, or a new army be ſent thither to him. Wherefore it may ſeeme, that ſome blow had beene taken on the Illyrian ſide, which made all to halt; or at leaſt, that the Romans with greater loſſe, than is before ſpoken of, had beene driuen from ſome of the Townes which they beſieged.

Now although it were ſo, that Martius in very few of his actions, behaued himſelfe like a man of warre: yet in exerciſe of Cunning, which one hath moſt aptly termed, a crooked or ſiniſter kinde of wiſedome, he dealt as a craftſ-maſter, with a reſtleſſe working diligence. This indeed neither proued his ſufficiencie, nor commended his honeſtie: ſince thereby hee effected nothing to his owne benefit; and neuertheleſſe, out of enuie, vaine-glory, or ſuch delight as weake and buſie-headed men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made oppoſition to the good of his Countrey. At ſuch time as Perſeus, by the ſucceſſe of his doings againſt Hoſtilius, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likly to inuade Theſſaly; Archo, Lycortas, and other good Patriotes among the Achæans, iudged it expedient for their Nation to helpe the Romans, as in a time of aduerſitie, whom in proſperity they loued not to flatter. Wherefore Archo propoſed a decree which paſſed: That the Achæans ſhould ſend their whole power into Theſſaly, and participate with the Romans in all danger. So the Armie was leuied; and Polybius, with others, ſent Embaſſadors vnto Martius, to certifie him thereof, and know his pleaſure, Polybius found the Conſul buſie in finding paſſage through Tempe into Macedon. Hee went along with the Armie; and awaited the Conſuls leiſure till they came to Heraclea; where finding the time conuenient, he preſented the Decree, and offered the ſeruice of his Nation, wherein ſoeuer it ſhould bee commanded. Martius tooke this very kindely; but ſaid, That he needed now no manner of helpe. Forthwith Polybius diſpatched home his companions, to ſignifie thus much: tarrying himſelfe behinde in the Campe. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that Ap. Claudius deſired; or rather imperiouſly required, of the Achæans, fiue thouſand men, to be ſent him into Epirus. It was manifeſt, that Appius had need of theſe men; and that if hee were ſtrong in field, he might doe notable ſeruice, by diſtracting the forces of Perſeus. But the Labirynthian head of Martius could not allow of ſuch plaine reaſon. He called vnto him Polybius, to whom he declared, that Appius had no need of ſuch aide, and therefore willed him to returne home, and in any wiſe take order that the men might not be ſent, nor the Achæans be put to ſuch needleſſe charges. Away went Polybius; muſing and vnable to reſolue whether it were for loue to the Achæans, that the Conſul was ſo earneſt in this buſineſſe; or rather for enuie, and to hinder Ap. Claudius from doing any thing, ſince himſelfe could doe nothing. But when Polybius was to deliuer his opinion in the Councell touching this matter: then found hee a new doubt, that more neerely concerned his owne ſelfe, and thoſe of his partie. For as hee was ſure to incurre the great indignation of the Conſul, if he ſhould neglect what was giuen him in charge; ſo was it manifeſt on the other ſide, that the words by Martius vttered to him in priuate, would proue no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they ſhould refuſe to helpe Claudius, alledging that he had no need: In this caſe therefore, hee had recourſe vnto the Decree of the Senate: which exempted men from neceſſitie of doing what the Roman Commanders ſhould require, vnleſſe by ſpecial order from the Senate, the ſame were likewiſe appointed. So for lacke of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred vnto the aduice of the Conſul: by whom it was ſure to be made fruſtrate. Hereby the Achæans were ſauers, of more than an hundred and twentie Talents: though Polybius himſelfe ranne into danger of Appius his diſpleaſure; and for ſuch honeſt dealing in his Countries behalfe, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long yeeres impriſonment. Polyb. Legat. 78.

Whether it were by the like policie of Martius, that king Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this king began when it was too late, to ſtand in feare leſt the fire, which he himſelfe had helped to kindle, would ſhortly take hold on his own lodging; or whether the regard of money were able to ouerſway all other paſſions; it is hard to determine: ſince they that had better means to know the truth, haue not preciſely affirmed any certainty. One report is, that Eumenes did not ſo much as giue any helpe to Martius: but comming to haue ioyned with him, in ſuch friendly manner as hee did with the former Conſuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in ſuch anger, that hee refuſed to leaue behinde him certaine horſe of the Gallo-Greeks, being requeſted to haue done it. If this were true; and that his brother Attalus tarrying behinde with the Conſul, did the Romans good ſeruice: then is the reaſon apparant, of the hatred, borne afterwards by the Senate to Eumenes, and the loue to Attalus. But it is more generally receiued, that Eumenes gaue a willing eare to Perſeus his deſire of accord, for meere deſire of gaine. And it might well be, that couetouſneſſe drew him on, in the courſe, whereinto indignation firſt led him. Howſoeuer it befell; Perſeus cauſed Eumenes to be ſounded, and found him ſo tractable, that hee was bold to ſollicite him by an Embaſſage. The tenour of his aduertiſements, both to Eumenes & Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect loue betweene a king and a free Citie: That the Romans had quarrell alike to all kings, though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and vſed the helpe of one againſt another; that Philip was oppreſſed by them, with the helpe of Attalus; Antiochus, with the helpe of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perſeus aſſailed, assailed, with helpe of Eumenes and Prusias. Herewith hee willed Eumenes to consider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Asia, which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to thinke better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort he admonished Antiochus, not to looke for any good conclusion of his warre with the Egyptian, so long as the Romans could make him giue ouer, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, hee requested both of them, either to compell the Romans to surcease from their war vpon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies vnto all kings. Antiochus lay farre out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more neerely toucht; and as hee felt part of this to be true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should giue answer; he began to offer a bargaine of peace for money. He thought the Romans to be no lesse weary, than Perseus was affraid. Wherefore he promised, for his own part, That if he might haue fifteen hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this war, then would he remaine a Neuter therein: and that for some greater quantitie of money (how much I finde not) he would also bring the Romans to condescend vnto peace: and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to giue hostages. Perseus liked well to receiue the hostages: but not to lay out the money; especially before hand, as was required. He would faine haue peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes onely. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost: but he would lay down the money in the Temple at Samothrace: whence it should be deliuered vnto Eumenes, after that the peace was fully concluded and ratified. The Isle of Samothrace was Perseus his owne: and therefore Eumenes thought the money no neerer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deserued somewhat, howsoeuer the businesse might happen to succeed: so that needs he would haue part of his wages in prest. Thus the two kings did no more, than lose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traytor.

After the same manner delt Perseus with king Gentius the Illyrian. Hee had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainly, and said, That without money he could not stirre. Hereunto Perseus loued not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serue at the last cast, to deliuer him from all his feares. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe, then did his feare vrge him to prodigalitie; so as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents, which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargaine was soone made, and pledges on both sides deliuered for performance. This was openly done by Perseus; to the end that all his Armie might haue comfort, by such accesse of strength to their partie. Presently vpon the bargaine made, Embassadors were sent to Rhodes, from both Perseus and Gentius: who desired the Rhodians, to take vpon them, as arbitrators, between Perseus and the Romans, and to bring the Warre to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Martius the Consul was no lesse desirous of peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promised, that they, by their authority, would make peace; wishing the Kings to shew themselues conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing proud words to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadours; gaue an answer as disdainfull, angry, and menacing, as they could deuise: so as this vain-glory of the Rhodians was throughly chastised; and more throughly should haue beene, if their submission had not been as humble, as their folly was proud. Such vse of Gentius his friendship, made Perseus; without laying out one ounce of Siluer. Now faine he would haue hastened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the Warre: but then must the money be hastened away. Pantauchus the Macedonian Embassadour, who remained with Gentius, exhorted him daily to begin the War by land and sea, whilest the Romans were vnprouided. But finding what it was that made all to stay; he sent word to Perseus. Hereupon ten Talents were sent to Pantauchus: who deliuered it to the young king, as earnest of that which followed. More followed indeed; and sealed vp with the seale of the Illyrians; but carried by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this money came into Illyria, Gentius had layed hands vpon two Roman Embassadours, and cast them into prison. Which Perseus no sooner heard, than he recalled his Treasure-bearers, and sent them with their loade to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of necessitie to make warre with the Romans, whether he were hired thereto or not.

Liu. lib. 44. Plutar. in vit. Æmyl.

There came about the same time, through Illyria, to the aid of Perseus, vnder one Clondicus a petty king, tenne thousand horse and tenne thousand foot, of the Gaules, which were were (as Plutarch hath it) the Baſtarna. Theſe had before-hand made their bargaine, and were to receiue preſent pay at the firſt. At their entry into the Kingdome, Perſeus ſent one to them; deſiring their Captaines to come viſit him, whom he promiſed to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the firſt queſtion that their Generall asked, was, Whether the King hath ſent money to giue the ſouldiers their pay in hand, according to his bargaine? Hereto the meſſenger had not what to anſwer. Why then (ſaid Clondicus) tell thy maſter, That the Gaules will not ſtirre one foote further, vntill they haue gold, as was agreed, and hoſtages. Perſeus heereupon tooke counſaile: if to vtter his owne opinion, before men ſo wiſe that they would not contradict him, were to take counſaile. He made an inuectiue againſt the inciuilitie and auarice of the Baſtarna: who came with ſuch numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdome. Fiue thouſand horſe of them, hee ſaid would bee as many as hee ſhould need to vſe; and not ſo many, that hee ſhould need to feare them. It had beene well done, if any of his counſailours would haue told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole Armie of them, ſince without any danger to the kingdome, they might be let out, by the way of Perrhæbia, into Theſſaly: where waſting the Country, and filling themſelues with ſpoyle, they ſhould make the Romans glad to forſake Tempe, euen for hunger and all manner of want, therein doing the king notable ſeruice, whether they wonne any victory, or not. This, and a great deale more, might haue beene alledged, if any man had dared to giue aduice freely. In concluſion, Antigonus, the ſame meſſenger that had beene with them before, was ſent againe, to let them know the kings minde. He did his errand: vpon which followed a great murmure of thoſe many thouſands that had beene drawne ſo farre to no purpoſe: But Clondicus asked him now againe, Whether hee had brought the money along with him, to pay thoſe fiue thouſand, whom the king would entertaine. Hereto, when it was perceiued, that Antigonus could make no better anſwer, than ſhifting excuſes; the Baſtarna returned preſently towards Danubius, waſting the neighbour parts of Thrace; yet ſuffering this craftie meſſenger to eſcape vnhurt: which was more than hee could haue well expected.

Thus dealt Perſeus, like a carefull Treaſurer, and one that would preſerue his money for the Romans, without diminiſhing the ſumme. But of this painfull Office he was very ſoone diſcharged by L. Æmylius Paulus the new Conſul: who in fifteene daies after his ſetting forth from Italy, brought the kingdome of Macedon to that end, for which God had appointed ouer it a king ſo fooliſh and ſo cowardly.

§. VIII.

Of L. Æmylius Paulus the Conſul. His iourney. Hee forceth Perſeus to diſcampe. Hee will not hazzard battaile with any diſaduantage. Of an Eclipſe of the Moone. Æmylius his ſuperſtition. The battaile of Pydna. Perſeus his flight. Hee forſakes his Kingdome: which haſtily yeelds to Æmylius. Perſeus at Samothrace. He yeelds himſelfe to the Roman Admirall, and is ſent priſoner to Æmylius.

BY the Warre of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much diſhonour. Which, though it were not accompanied with any danger, yet the indignity ſo moued them, that either * they decreed that Prouince to L. Æmylius Paulus, without putting it, as was otherwiſe their manner, to the chance of lot, betweene him and his fellow Conſul; or at leaſt were gladder that the lot had caſt it vpon him, than that ſo worthy a man was aduanced to the dignitie of a ſecond Conſulſhip. Hee refuſed to propound vnto the Senate any thing that concerned his Prouince; vntill by his Embaſſadours, thither ſent to view the eſtate of the Warre, it was perfectly vnderſtood, in what condition both the Roman forces, and the Macedonian, at the preſent remained. This being throughly knowne to be ſuch, as hath been already told; the Senate appointed a ſtrong ſupply, not onely to the Conſul, but vnto the Nauie, and likewiſe to the Armie that lay betweene Illyria and Epyrus; from which App. Claudius was remooued, and L. Anicius ſent thither in his place. Æmylius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the People, as was the cuſtome, ſpake with much grauitie and authoritie. Hee requeſted thoſe that did thinke themſelues wiſe enough to manage this Warre, either to accompany him into Macedon, and there assist him with their aduice; or else to gouern their tongues at home, and not take vpon them to giue directions by heare say, and censure by idle reports: for hee told them plainely, That he would frame his doings to occasions; not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his father L. Æmylius, who died valiantly in the Battaile of Cannæ, might well be liuing in some of their memories: which was enough to make them conforme themselues the more gladly vnto the instructions giuen by a wise and resolute Consul.

All his businesse within the Citie being dispatched, Æmylius was honourably attended, at his setting forth on his iourney; with an especiall hope of men, that hee should finish the Warre: though that he should finish it so soone and happily, was more than could haue beene hoped or imagined. He came to Brundusium: whence, when the wind came faire, he set sayle at breake of day, and arriued safely at the Isle of Corcyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphi: where, hauing done sacrifice to Apollo, after the fifth day he set forwards to the Campe; and was there in fiue dayes more. So are there but fiue of the fifteene dayes remaining, in which he finished the Warre.

Perseus lay strongly encamped at Dium; hauing spared no labor of men and of women to fortifie the bankes of Enipeus, where it was fordable in drie weather: So as there was little hope, or none, to force him; and consequently, as little possibilitie to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconuenience troubling the Romans, & much disabling them to make attempt vpon Dium; was lacke of fresh water. For there were tenne miles betweene Dium and Tempe; all the way lying betweene the Sea shore and the foote of Olympus, without any Brooke or Spring breaking foorth on that side. But Æmylius found present remedy for this, by digging Wells on the shoare; where he found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no shoare that wants them, though they rise not aboue the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking vp his lodging any neerer to the enemie, than the Towne of Heraclea, on the riuer of Peneus; where hee had watering at pleasure, but could performe no seruice of any worth. Yet when the Roman Campe had such meanes to lye close to the Macedonian; as it presently did; the passage onward being defended as hath beene already shewed, seemed no lesse difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessarie to search another way: which by enquirie was soone found out. There was a narrow passage ouer Olympus, leading into Perræbia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a faire iourney. Martius either had not beene informed hereof; or durst not attempt it: or perhaps could not get his Souldiers to make the aduenture; they fearing lest it would proue such a peece of worke as had beene their march ouer Ossa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industry, courage, and abilitie, to command. Hee had reformed, euen at his first comming, many disorders in the Roman Campe: teaching the souldiers among many other good lessons, to bee obedient and ready in execution; without troubling themselues, as had beene their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their Generall. And now hee appointed about fiue thousand men to this enterprise: whereof he committed the charge vnto Scipio Æmylianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his owne sonnes by nature, but adopted; the one of them, by a sonne of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabij. Scipio tooke with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretans; but his maine strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, vpon the mountaine, consisted in a manner, wholly of Archers and Slingers: who, though, at some distance, they might doe notable seruice against those that should climbe vp vnto them; yet when the darkenesse tooke away their ayme, they were like to make a bad nights worke, being to deale with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceale the businesse about which they went, Scipio and Fabius tooke a wrong way, towards the Fleet; where victuals were prouided for their iourney: it being noysed, that they were to runne along the coast of Macedon by sea, and waste the Countrey. All the while that they were passing the Mountaines (which was about three dayes) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set vpon Perseus where he lay, rather to diuert the kings attention from that which was his maine Enterprise, than vpon any hope to doe good, in seeking to get ouer Enipeus. The Channell of Enipeus, which receiued in Winter time a great fall of waters from the Mountaines, was exceeding deepe and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay well-well neere all drie, yet inferued not for those that were weightily armed to fight vpon. Wherefore Æmylius employed none saue his Velites, of whom the Kings light armature had aduantage at first distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towet which Perseus had rayſed on his owne banke, did alſo beate vpon the Romans, and gaue them to vnderſtand, that their labour was in vaine. Yet Æmylius perſiſted as he had begunne, and continued his aſſault, ſuch as it could be, the ſecond day. This might haue ſerued to teach the Macedonians, that ſome greater matter was in hand: ſince otherwiſe a good Captaine, as Æmylius was knowne to bee, would not haue troubled himſelfe with making ſuch braueries, that were ſomewhat coſtly. But Perſeus looked onely vnto that which was before his eyes: vntill his men, that came running fearefully downe the Mountaine, brought word into the Campe, That the Romans were following at their backes. Theſe was all full of tumult, and the King himſelfe no leſſe (if not more) amazed than any of the reſt. Order was forthwith giuen to diſlodge: or rather without order, in all tumultuous haſte, the Campe was broken vp, and a ſpeedy retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were ſo, that they which had cuſtodie of the paſſage were taken ſleeping, or whether they were beaten by plaine force, Scipio and Fabius had very good ſucceſſe in their iourney. It may well be, that they ſlept vntill the Romans came ſomewhat neere to them, and then taking alarme, when their arrows and ſlings could do little ſeruice, were beaten at handy-ſtrokes: ſo as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybius, and an Epiſtle of Scipio, may each of them haue beene true. Thus was an open way cleered into Macedon: which had bin effected by Martius in the yeere fore going; but was cloſed vp againe, through his not proſecuting ſo rich an opportunitie.

Perſeus was in an extreame doubt what courſe to take, after this vnhappy beginning. Some gaue aduice to manne his Townes, and ſo to linger out the Warre: hauing beene taught by the laſt yeeres example, how reſolute the people were in making defence. But farre worſe counſaile preuailed, as generally it doth in turbulent and fearefull deliberations. The King reſolued to put all at once to hazzard of battaile: fearing belike to put himſelfe into any one Towne, leſt that ſhould be firſt of all beſieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures alwayes are iealous) not ouer-carefully reliued. This was euen the ſame that Æmylius, or any inuader, ſhould haue deſired. So a place was choſen neere vnto Pydna, that ſerued well for the Phalanx, and had likewiſe on the ſides of it ſome peeces of higher ground, fit for the Archers and light-armature. There hee abode the comming of the enemie; who ſtayed not long behinde him. As ſoone as the Romans had ſight of the kings Armie, which, with greater feare than diſcretion, had haſted away from them, forſaking the Campe that was ſo notably well fortified: they deſired nothing more, than to giue battaile immediately: doubting leſt otherwiſe the king ſhould change his minde, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Conſul; praying him not to loſe occaſion by delay. But Æmylius told him, that he ſpake like a young man; and therefore willed him to haue patience. The Romans were tyred with their iourney; had no Campe wherein to reſt themſelues; nor any thing there, ſaue onely the bare ground whereon they trode. For theſe, and the like reſpects, the Conſul made a ſtand: and ſhewing himſelfe vnto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of battaile; gaue charge to haue the Campe meaſured out and entrenched behinde the Armie; whereinto, at good leyſure, hee fell backe, without any manner of trouble. After a nights reſt, it was hoped, both by the Romans and by the Macedonians, that the matter ſhould be determined; each part thinking their owne Generall to blame, for that they had not fought the ſame day. As for the king, hee excuſed himſelfe by the backwardneſſe of the enemie; who aduanced no further, but kept vpon ground ſeruing ill for the Phalanx: as on the other ſide, the Conſul had the reaſons before ſhewed, which he communicated to thoſe about him the next day.

That euening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpicius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former yeere beene Prætor, foretold vnto the Conſul, and (with his good liking) vnto the Armie, an Eclipſe of the Moone, which was to bee the ſame night: willing the ſouldiers not to bee troubled therewith, for that it was naturall, and might bee knowne long before it was ſeene. It was the manner of the Romans, in ſuch Eclipſes, to beate Pannes of Braſſe and Baſons, as wee doe in following a ſwarme of Bees; thinking, that thereby they did the Moone great ease, and helped her in her labour. But this prognostication of Sulpicius converted their superstition into admiration of his deepe skill, wherein they saw it verified. Contrariwise, the Macedonians howled and made a great noyse, as long as the Eclipse lasted: rather perhaps because it was their fashion, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodigie betokening their losse; since their desire to fight was no whit lessened by it. I will not here stand to dispute, Whether such Eclipses doe signifie, or cause any alteration in ciuil affaires, & matters that haue small dependance on naturall complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthy of obseruation it is, how superstition captiuates the vnderstanding of the wisest, where the helpe of true religion is wanting. Æmylius, though hee were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moone, that it was no supernaturall thing, nor aboue the reach of humane vnderstanding, so as he should need to trouble himselfe with any deuout regard therof; yet could he not refraine from doing his duty to this Moone, and congratulating with sacrifice hee deliuerie, as soone as she shone out bright againe: for which, hee is commended euen by Plutarch, a sage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpicius perhaps did not assist him in this fooliſh deuotion; yet it is like, that he, being a Senatour, and one of the Councell for Warre, was partaker the next morning in a sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no lesse fooliſh. For a great part of the day was vainely consumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with any Sacrifice, and vouchsafe to shew tokens of good lucke in the entrailes of the beasts. At length, in the belly of the one and twentieth sacrifice, was found a promise of victorie to Æmylius: but with condition, That hee should not giue the onset. Hercules was a Greek, and partiall, as neerer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had beene better to call vpon the new goddesse, lately canonized at Alabanda; or vpon Romulus, founder of their Citie, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Deitie; or (if a God of elder date were more authenticall) vpon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of militarie affaires; and who therefore would haue limited his fauour, with no iniunctions contrarie to the rules of Warre.

Now concerning the Battaile; Æmylius was throughly perswaded, that the King meant to abide it: for that otherwise hee would not haue stayed at Pydna, when, as a little before, his leysure serued to retyre whither hee listed, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Consul thought that hee might wait vpon aduantage, without making any great haste. Neither was it to be neglected, that the morning Sunne was full in the Romans faces: which would bee much to their hinderance all the forenoone. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Aemylius sent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder; there was no likelihood of fighting that day. But about ten of the clocke in the morning, a small occasion brought to passe that, which whereto neither of the Generalls had ouer-earnest desire.

A Horse brake loose at watering, which two or three of the Roman souldiers followed into the riuer, wading after him vp to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further banke; whence a couple of Thracians ranne into the Water, to draw this horse ouer to their owne side. These fell to blowes, as in a priuate quarrell; and one of the Thracians was slaine. His Countrimen seeing this, hasted to reuenge their fellowes death, and followed those that had slaine him ouer the riuer. Hereupon company came in, to helpe on each part, vntill the number grew such, as made it past a fray, and caused both the Armies to be carefull of the euent. In fine, each of the Generals placed his men in order of battaile, accordingly as the manner of his Country, and the Armes, wherewith they serued, did require. The ground was a flatte leuell, saue that on the sides a few hillockes were raised heere and there; whereof each part might take what aduantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better souldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and Consul encouraged their men with liuely words: which the present condition could bountifully afford. But the King hauing finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew himselfe into Pydna: there to doe sacrifice, as hee pretended, vnto Hercules. It is the lesse maruaile, that hee durst aduenture battaile, since hee had bethought himselfe of such a stratageme, whereby to saue his owne person. As for Hercules, he liked not the sacrifice of a Coward: whose vnseasonable deuotion could bee no better than hypocrisie. For hee that will pray for a good good Harueſt, ought alſo to Plow, Sowe, and Weede his Ground. When therefore the king returned to the battaile, he found it no better than loſt: and hee, in looking to his owne ſafetie, cauſed it to be loſt altogether, by beginning the flight.

The eaſt of this day, ſuch as we finde recorded, are, That the Roman Elephants could doe no manner of good; That the Macedonian Phalanx did ſo ſtoutly preſſe onwards, and beat off all which came before it, as Æmylius was thereat much aſtoniſhed; That the Peligni ruſhing deſperately on the Phalanx, were ouer-borne, many of them ſlaine, and the ſquadrons following them ſo diſcouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. Theſe were the things that fell out aduerſe to the Romans; and which the Conſul beholding, is ſaid to haue rent his coat-armour for griefe. If the King with all his power of horſe, had in like manner done his deuoyre; the victorie might haue beene his owne. That which turned the fortune of the battaile, was the ſame which doubtleſſe the Conſul expected, euen from the beginning: the difficultie, or almoſt the impoſſibilitie, of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whileſt ſome of the Romans ſmall battallions preſſed hard vpon one part of it, and others recoyled from it; it was neceſſary (if the Macedonians would follow vpon thoſe which were put to the worſe) that ſome files hauing open way before them, ſhould aduance themſelues beyond the reſt that were held at a ſtand. This comming ſo to paſſe, admoniſhed the Conſul, what was to be done. The long pikes of the Macedonians were of little vſe, when they were charged in flanke by the Roman Targettiers; according to the direction giuen by Æmylius, when he ſaw the front of the Enemies great battaile become vnequall, and the ranks in ſome places open, by reaſon of the vnequall reſiſtance which they found. Thus was the vſe of the Phalanx prooued vnauailable againſt many ſmall ſquadrons, as it had beene formerly in the battaile of Cynoſcephalæ: yea, this forme of embattailing was found vnſeruiceable againſt the other, by reaſon, that being not euery where alike diſtreſſed, it would breake of it ſelfe; though here were little ſuch inconuenience of ground, as had beene at * Cynoſcephalæ. * chap. 4. §. 14.

Perſeus, when hee ſaw his battaile begin to route, turned his bridle preſently, and ranne amaine towards Pella. All his horſe eſcaped, in a manner vntouched, and a great number followed him; the little-harme which they had taken, witneſſing the little good ſeruice which they had done. As for the poore foote; they were left to the mercy of the Enemie: who ſlew aboue twenty thouſand of them; though hauing little cauſe to be furious, as hauing loſt, in that battaile, onely ſome foureſcore, or ſixe ſcore men at the moſt. Some of the foote, eſcaping from the execution, ouertooke the King and his company in a wood; where they fell to raying at the horſemen, calling them cowards, traytors, and ſuch other names, till at length they fell to blowes. The King was in doubt leſt they had ill meaning to himſelfe: and therefore turned out of the common way, being followed by ſuch as thought it good. The reſt of the company diſperſed themſelues: euery one as his owne occaſions guided him. Of thoſe that kept along with their king, the number began within a while to leſſen. For hee fell to deuiſing vpon whom he might lay the blame of that dayes misfortune, which was moſt due to himſelfe: thereby cauſing thoſe that knew his nature, to ſhrinke away from him, how they could. At his comming to Pella; he found his Pages and houſhold ſeruants, ready to attend him, as they had beene wont. But of his great men that had eſcaped from the battaile, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholike time, there were two of his Treaſurers that had the boldneſſe to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their vnſeaſonable admonitions, he ſtabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he ſent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore ſtanding in feare, leſt they that refuſed to come at his call, would ſhortly dare ſome greater miſchiefe: he ſtole out of Pella by night. Of his friends he had with him only Euander (who had beene employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewiſe about 500. Cretians, more for loue of his money than of him. To theſe he gaue of his plate, as much as was worth about fiftie Talents, though ſhortly hee coozened them of ſome part thereof, making ſhew as if hee would haue redeemed it, but neuer paying the money. The third day after the battaile hee came to Amphipolis; where he exhorted the Towne-men to fidelitie, with teares; and his owne ſpeech being hindered by teares, appointed Euander to ſpeake what himſelfe would haue vttered. But the Amphipolitans made it their chiefe care, to looke well to themſelues.

Vpon the first fame of the ouerthrow, they had emptied their towne of two thousand Thracians that lay there in garrison: sending them forth vnder colour of a gainefull employment, & shutting the gates after them. And now to be ridde of the king; they plainly bade Euander to be gone. The king hearing this, had no minde to tarry: but embarking himselfe and the treasure which he had there, in certaine vessells that hee found in the riuer Strymon; passed ouer to the Isle of Samothrace: where hee hoped to liue safe, by priuiledge of the religious Sanctuarie therein.

These miserable shifts of the king make it the lesse doubtfull, how all the kingdome fell into the power of Æmylius, within so few dayes after his victorie. Pydna which was necrest at hand, was the last that yeelded. About sixe thousand of the souldiours, that were of sundry Nations, fled out of the battaile into that Towne; and prepared for defence: the confused rabble of so many strangers hindering all deliberation and consent. Hippias who had kept the passage ouer Ossa against Martius, with Pantauchus, who had beene sent Embassadour to Gentius the Illyrian, were the first that came in: yeelding themselues and the Towne of Berœa, whither they had retyred out of the battell. With the like message came others from Thessalonica, from Pella, and from all the Townes of Macedon, within two dayes: the losse of the head bereauing the whole body of all sense and strength. Neither did they of Pydna stand out any longer, when they knew that the king had forsaken his Countrey: but opened their gates vpon such termes, that the sacke of it was granted to the Roman Armie. Æmylius sent abroad into the Countrey, such as he thought meetest, to take charge of other Cities: hee himselfe marching towards Pella. Hee found in Pella no more than three hundred Talents; the same whereof Perseus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a very little while hee shall haue more.

It was soone vnderstood, that Perseus had taken Sanctuarie, in the Temple at Samothrace: his owne letters to the Consul, confirming the report. Hee sent these letters by person of such meane condition; that his case was pitied, for that he wanted the seruice of better men. The scope of this writing was, to desire fauour: which though hee begged in termes ill beseeming a king; yet since the inscription of his Epistle was, King Perseus to the Consul Paulus; the Consul, who had taken from him his Kingdome, and would not allow him to retaine the Title, refused to make any answer thereunto. So there came other letters, as humble as could bee expected: whereby hee craued and obtained, that some might bee sent to conferre with him about matters of his present estate. Neuertheless, in this conference, hee was maruellous earnest, that hee might bee allowed still to retaine the name of king. And to this end it was perhaps, that hee had so carefully preserued his Treasure, vnto the very last: flattering himselfe with such vaine hopes as these; That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuarie, nor yet neglect those great riches in his possession; but compound with him for money, letting him haue his desire to liue at ease, and to bee called King. Yea it seemes that hee had indeede, euen from the beginning, a desire to liue in this Isle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his consultations about the Warre, he was dehorted by his friends, from seeking to exchange his kingdome of Macedon, for * such a paltrie Iland; and for that he offered to lay vp the money which Eumenes demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But hee findes it otherwise. They vrge him to giue place vnto necessitie, and without more adoe, to yeeld to the discretion and mercie of the people of Rome. This is so farre against his minde, that the conference breakes off without effect. Presently there arriues at Samothrace Cn. Octauius the Roman Admirall, with his fleet: who assayes, as well by terrible threates, as by faire language, to draw the king out of his lurking hole; wherein, for feare of imprisonment, hee had now alreadie imprisoned himselfe. When all would not serue, a question was moued to the Samothracians; How they durst pollute their Temple, by receiuing into it one that had violated the like priuiledge of Sanctuary, by attempting the murder of king Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quicke. The Samothracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and send word to the king, That Euander, who liues with him in the Temple, is accused of an impious fact, committed at Delphi, whereof vnlesse he can cleere himselfe in iudgement, hee must not be suffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reuerence borne to his Maiestie, now past, makes them forbeare to say, that Perseus himselfe is charged with the same crime. But what will this auaile, when the minister of the fact being brought into iudgement, shall (as is to be feared) appeach the author? Perseus therefore willed Euander to haue consideration of the little fauour that can be expected at the Romans hand; who are like to be presidents and ouerseers of this iudgement: so as it were better to dye valiantly, since none other hope remaines, than hope to make good an ill cause; where though he had a good plea, yet it could not helpe him. Of this motion Euander seemes so like well: and either kils himselfe, or hoping to escape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get poyson wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandement. The death of this man, who had stucke to Perseus in all times of neede, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forsake him: so as none are left with him, saue his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be suspected, that they which leaue him vpon this occasion, will tell perillous tales, and say, That the King hath lost the priuiledge of this holy Sanctuarie, by murdering Euander therein. Or if the Romans will affirme so much, who shall dare to gainesay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formalitie, and euen that also lyable to dispute, which preserues him from captiuitie, he purposeth to make an escape, and flye, with his Treasures, vnto Cotys his good friend, into Thrace. Oreandes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one ship; who easily was perswaded to waft the King thence. With all secrecie the Kings money, as much as could be so conueyed, was carried aboord by night; and the king himselfe, with his wife and * children (if rather it were not true, that he had with him onely * Philip his elder sonne, who was onely by adoption his sonne, being his * brother by nature) with much adoe got out at a window by a rope, and ouer a mudde wall. At his coming to the Sea-side, he found no Oreandes there: the Cretians had played a Cretian tricke, and he was gone with the money to his owne home. So it began to waxe cleare day, whileſt Perseus was searching all along the shoare; who had stayed so long about this, that he might feare to be intercepted ere he could recouer the Temple. He ranne therefore amaine towards his lodging: and thinking it not safe to enter in the common way, lest he should be taken; he hid himselfe in an obscure corner. His Pages missing him, ranne vp and downe making enquirie; till Octauius made Proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoeuer, abiding with their master in Samothrace, should haue their liues and libertie, with all to them belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they should presently yeeld themselues to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ion, a Thessalonian, to whom the King had giuen the custodie of his children, deliuered them vp to Octauius. Lastly, Perseus himselfe, with his sonne Philip, accusing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him; rendered himselfe, and made the Roman victory compleate. If he had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of liuing, than of reigning therein, he might well haue brought this Warre to an happier end. Now, by diuiding his cogitations, and pursuing, at once, those contrary hopes of saiuing his Kingdome by armes, and himselfe by flight; he is become a spectacle of misery, and one among the number of those Princes, that haue beene wretched by their owne default. He was presently sent away to Aemylius; before whom he fell to the ground so basely, that he seemed thereby to dishonour the victory ouer himselfe, as gotten vpon one of abiect qualitie, and therefore the lesse to be esteemed. Aemylius vsed to him the language of a gentle Victor, blaming him, though mildly, for hauing, with so hostile a minde, made Warre vpon the Romans. Hereto good answer might haue beene returned by one of better spirit. As for Perseus, he answered all with a fearefull silence. He was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consul termed it) almost assurance, for that such was the mercy of the people of Rome. After these good words, being inuited to the Consuls Table, & respectiuely entreated, he was committed prisoner to Q. Aelius.

Such end had this Macedonian Warre, after foure yeers continuance: & such end therewithall had the Kingdome of Macedon; the glory whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the World then knowne, was now translated vnto Rome.

Gentius, King of the Illyrians, taken by the Romans.

ABout the same time, and with like celeritie, Anicius the Roman Prætor, who succeeded vnto App. Claudius; had the like successe against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Armie of fifteene thousand; with which he was at Lissus, ready to assist King Perseus as soone as the money should come, whereof he had receiued onely ten Talents. But Anicius arrested him on the way; fought with him, ouercame him; and drawe him into * Scodra. This Towne was very defensible by nature, besides the help of fortification, & strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, assisted with the Kings presence, made it seeme vnpossible to be wonne, in any not a very long time. Yet Anicius was confident in his late victory; and therefore presented his Armie before the walles, making countenance to giue an assault. The Illyrians, that might easily haue defended themselues within the Town, would needes issue foorth and fight. They were, it seemes, rather passionate than couragious: for they were beaten; and thereupon foorthwith began dmazedly to treat about yeelding. The King sent Embassadours, by whom, at first, he desired truce for three dayes, that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had layed violent hand on the Roman Embassadours, to haue recourse to such meditation. But he thought his owne fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harme done by him, than the casting of those Embassadours into prison; where they were still aliue. Hauing obtained three dayes respite, he sailed vp a Riuer, within halfe a myle of the Roman Campe, into the Lake of Scodra, as it were to consult the more priuately; though indeede, to hearken whether the report were true, that his brother Caruanetius was comming to his rescue. Finding that no such helpe was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to returne into Scodra. He sent Messengers craning accesse vnto the Prætor: before whom hauing lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonestie, was not so great as his folly present) he fell downe humbly, and yeelded himselfe to discretion. All the Townes of his Kingdom, together with his wife, children, brother, friends were presently giuen vp. So this Warre ended in thirtie dayes: the People of Rome not knowing that it was begun vntill Perpenna, one of the Embassadors that had beene imprisoned, brought word from Anicius how all had passed.

* Called now Scutari.

How the Romans behaued themselues in Greece and Macedon after their victory ouer Perseus.

NOw began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune, and to looke tyrannically vpon those that had beene vnmanly toward them before, whilest the Warre with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadors were still at Rome, when the tidings of these victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them doe their errand againe. This they performed with a bad grace, saying, That they were sent from Rhodes to make an ouerture of peace, forasmuch as it was thought, that this Warre was no lesse grieuous to the Romans themselues, than to the Macedonians and many others: but that now they were very glad, and in behalfe of the Rhodians did congratulate with the Senate and People of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had beene expected. Hereto the Senate made answer, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassage to Rome, not for loue of Rome, but in fauour of the Macedonians; whose partizans they were, and should so be taken. By these threats, and the desire of some (couetous of the charge) to haue Warre proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadours were so affrighted, that in mourning apparell, as humble suppliants, they went about the Citie; beseeching all men, especially the great ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengeance for some foolish words. This danger of Warre from Rome being knowne at Rhodes, all that had beene any whit auerse from the Romans in the late Warre of Macedon, were either taken and condemned, or sent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that slew themselues for feare; whose goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and lesse would haue done, if old M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not vttered a milde sentence, and aduertised the Senate, That in decreeing warre against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselues, and make it thought, that * rather the wealth of that Citie, which they were greedy to ransacke, than any iust cause, had moued them thereto. This consideration, together with their good deserts in the warres of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whom, none of any marke remained aliue, saue those that had beene of the Roman Faction. All which notwithstanding, many yeeres passed, ere by importunate suit, they could be admitted into the society of the Romans: a fauour which till now, they had not esteemed, but thought themselues better without it, as equall friends.

With the like, or greater seueritie, did the Romans make themselues terrible in all parts of Greece. Aemylius himselfe made progresse through the Countrey; visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure: yet not forgetting to make them vnderstand what power he had ouer them. More than fiue hundred of the chiefe Citizens in Demetrias were slaine at one time by those of the Roman faction, and with help of the Roman souldiers. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Consul; the redresse was such, as requited not the pains of making supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed vnto the Romans the liberty of their Countrey, he feasted like a king, with excessiue cheere, yet so, that he had all things very cheape in his Campe: an easie matter, since no man durst be backward in sending prouisions, nor set on them the due price. Embassadours likewise were sent from Rome; some, to giue order for setling the estate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate than was vsual in such cases; and some, to visit the affaires of Greece. The kingdome of Macedon was set at liberty by Aemylius and the Embassadours, his assistants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this liberty was such as the Romans vsed to bestow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had beene payed vnto the kings, was lessened by halfe. As for the rest; the Countrey was diuided into foure parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the other. All the Nobility were sent captiue into Italy, with their wiues and children, as many as were aboue fifteene yeeres old. The antient Lawes of the Countrey were abrogated; and new giuen by Aemylius. Such mischiefe the Senate thought it better to doe, at the first alteration of things in this Prouince, and in the time of Conquest, than otherwise to leaue any inconuenience that should be worse in the future. But concerning the Greekes, that were not subiects to Rome; the things done to them could deserue no better name than meere tyrannie, yea, and shamelesse periury; were it not so, that the familiar custome, among Princes and great Estates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oathes of confederation seeme of no validitie. The Embassadours that were sent to visit the Greekes, called before them all such men of note, from euery quarter, as had any way discouered an vnseruiceable disposition towards the Romans. These they sent to Rome; where they were made sure enough. Some of these had sent letters to Perseus, which fell at length into the Romans hands: & in that respect, though they were no subiects, yet wanted there no colour, for vsing them as traytors, or at least as enemies. But since onely two men were beheaded, for hauing beene openly on the Macedonian side; and since it is confessed, that the good Patriotes were no lesse afflicted in this inquisition, than they that had sold themselues to the king: this manner of proceeding was inexcusable Tyrannie. With the Achæans these Embassadours were to deale more formally: not so much because that Common-wealth was strong (though this were to be regarded by them, hauing no Commission to make or denounce Warre) and like to proue vntractable, if manifest wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of signe, by letters, or otherwise, whereby any one of the Achæans could be suspitiously charged to haue held correspondence with the Macedonian. It was also so, that neither Callicrates, nor any of his adherents, had beene employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their seruice to the Romans, but onely such as were the best Patriotes. Yet would not therefore the Embassadours neglect to vse the benefit of the time: wherein, since all men trembled for feare of Rome, the season serued fitly to ranke the Achæans with the rest.

And

And hereto Callicrates was very vrgent: fearing, and procuring them to feare in behalfe of him and his friends, that if some sharpe order were not now taken, he and his fellowes should be made to pay for their mischieuous deuices, ere long time passed. So the Embassadours came among the Achæans: where one of them, in open assembly of the Nation, spake as Callicrates had before instructed him. Hee said, that some of the chiefe among them, had with money and other meanes befriended Perseus. This being so; he desired that all such men might be condemned, whom, after sentence giuen, hee would name vnto them. After sentence giuen (cried out the whole assembly) what iustice were this? Name them first, and let them answer; which if they cannot well doe, wee will soone condemne them. Then said the Roman boldly, that all their Prætors, as many as had led their armies, were guilty of this crime. If this were true, said Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence, then should I likewise haue beene friend to Perseus: whereof, if any man can accuse me, I shall throughly answer him, either here presently, or before the Senate at Rome. Vpon these words of Xenon the Embassadour laid hold, and said that euen so it were the best way, for him and the rest to purge themselues before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not vntill he had cited aboue a thousand; willing them to appeare and answer before the Senate. This might euen be tearmed the captiuitie of Greece; wherein so many of the honestest and worthiest men were carried from home, for none other cause than their loue vnto their Country; to be punished according to the will of those, who could not endure, that vertue, & regard of the publike liberty, should dwel together in any of the Greeks. At their comming to Rome, they were al cast into prison, as men already condemned by the Achæans. Many Embassages were sent from Achaia (where it is to be wondred, that any such honest care of these innocent men could be remaining: since honestie had been thus punished as a vice, in so many of the worthiest among them) to informe the Senate, that these men were neither condemned by the Achæans, nor yet held to be offendors. But in stead of better answer, it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Countrie, that these men should returne into Achaia. Neither could any sollicitation of the Achæans, who neuer ceased to importune the Senate for their libertie, preuaile at all; vntill after seuenteene yeeres, fewer than thirty of them were enlarged, of whom that wise and vertuous man Polybius, the great Historian, was one. All the rest were either dead in prison; or hauing made offer to escape, whether vpon the way before they came to Rome: or whether out of Layle, after that they were committed thereto, suffered death as malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done vpon the Epirots. For the Senate being desirous to preserue the Macedonian Treasure whole; yet withall, to gratifie the Souldiers, gaue order, That the whole Country of Epirus should be put to sacke. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as also it was performed by Æmylius with mischieuous subtiltie. Hauing taken leaue of the Greekes, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to vse the libertie bestowed vpon them by the people of Rome; hee sent vnto the Epirots for ten of the principal men out of euery Citie. These he commanded to deliuer vp all the Gold and Siluer which they had; and sent along with them, into euery of their Townes, what companies of men he thought conuenient, as it were to fetch the money. But he gaue secret instruction to the Captaines, that vpon a certaine day by him appointed, they should fall to sacke, euery one the Towne wherein to he was sent. Thus in one day were threescore and tenne Cities, all confederate with the Romans, spoyled by the Roman Souldiers; and besides other acts of hostility in a time of peace, a hundred and fiftie thousand of that Nation made slaues. It may be granted, that some of the Epirots deserued punishment, as hauing fauoured Perseus. But since they, among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence, yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had beene already sent into Italie, there to receiue their due; and since this Nation, in generall, was not onely at the present in good obedience, but had euen in this warre, done good seruice to the Romans: I hold this act so wicked, that I should not beleeue it, had any one Writer deliuered the contrary. But the truth being manifest by consent of all; it is the lesse marueilous, that God was pleased to make Æmylius childelesse, euen in the glory of his triumph, how great soeuer otherwise his vertues were.

In such manner dealt the Romans, after their victory, with the Greeks and Macedonians.

ans. How terrible they were to other Kingdomes abroad; it will appeare by the efficacie of an Embaſſage ſent from them to Antiochus; whereof before we ſpeake, we muſt ſpeake ſomewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himſelfe, and of his affaires about which theſe Embaſſadours came.

§. XI.

The Warre of Antiochus vpon Egypt, brought to end by the Roman Embaſſadours.

ANtiochus the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the ſhort time following of his reigne and life. Hee died the ſixe and thirtieth yeere after he had worne a Crowne, and in the ſeuenteenth or eighteenth of Ptolomie Epiphanes: while he attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, or (according to Iuſtine) of Iupiter. He left behinde him three ſonnes, Seleucus Philopater, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Soter; and one daughter, Cleopatra, whom hee had giuen in marriage to Ptolomie Epiphanes, king of Egypt. Seleucus the fourth of that name, and the eldeſt of Antiochus his ſonnes, reigned in Syria twelue yeeres, according to Euſebius, Appian, and Sulpitius: though Ioſephus giue him but ſeuen. A Prince, who as hee was ſloathfull by nature; ſo the great loſſe which his father Antiochus had receiued, tooke from him the meanes of managing any great affaire. Of him, about three hundred yeers before his birth, Daniel gaue this iudgement, Et ſtabit in loco eius viliſſimus & indignus decore regio. And in his place (ſpeaking of Antiochus, the Father of this man) ſhall ſtart vp a vilde perſon, vnworthy the honour of a King. Vnder this Seleucus, thoſe things were done which are ſpoken of Onias the high Prieſt, in theſe words, & other to the ſame effect: What time as the holy City was inhabited with all Peace, becauſe of the godlineſſe of Onias the Prieſt, it came to paſſe, that euen the King did honour the place, and garniſhed the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the ſecond of Macchabees, of Simon of Beniamin, who by Apolonius betrayed the Treaſures of the Temple: and of Heliodorus ſent by the king to ſeize them; of his miraculous ſtriking by God, and his recouery at the prayers of Onias; of the kings death, and of his ſucceſſour Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the reigne of this king, that the books of the Macchabees take beginning. Which books ſeeme not to be deliuered by one and the ſame hand. For the firſt booke, although it touch vpon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing elſe of his ſtorie, nor of the acts of his ſucceſſours, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the brother and ſucceſſour of this Seleucus; from whom downward to the death of Simon Macchabeus (who died in the hundred threeſcore and ſeuenteenth yeere of the Greeks in Syria) that firſt booke treateth. The Author of the ſecond booke, although he take the Storie ſomwhat further off, by way of a Proæme, yet he endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth yeere of the Grecian reigne, and with the death of Nicanor, ſlaine by Iudas: remembring in the fourth Chapter the practice of Iaſon the brother of Onias, who after the death of Seleucus, preuailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his ſucceſſor, for the Prieſthood. It is alſo held by Ianſenius and other graue Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius king of the Spartans ſent Embaſſadours to the Iewes, as to their brothers and kinſmen. Which intelligence betweene them and the Greeks, Ionathan the brother and ſucceſſour of Iudas, remembreth in the Preamble of that Epiſtle, which he himſelfe directed to the people of Sparta by Numenius and Antipater his Embaſſadours, whom he employed at the ſame time to the Senate of Rome; repeating alſo the former Letters word by word, which Arius had ſent to Onias the high Prieſt, whereof Ioſephus addes, that the name of the Lacedæmonian Embaſſadour was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a ſquare Volume, & were ſealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her clawes.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, ſucceeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and ſeuen and thirtieth yeere of the Greeks in Syria. He was the ſecond ſonne of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his kingdome by procuring the death of the King his brother; which alſo he vſurped from his brothers ſonne.

Ptolomie Philometor, his Nephew by his ſiſter Cleopatra, being then very young, had beene about ſeuen yeeres King of Egypt.

Ptolomie Epiphanes, the Father of this King Philometor, had reigned in Egypt foure and twenty yeers; in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the great Antiochus, had agreed to diuide his kingdome between them, whileſt he was a childe. But they found ſuch other buſineſſe, ere long, with the Romans, as made them giue ouer their vniuſt purpoſe; eſpecially Antiochus, who gaue, with his daughter in marriage, vnto this Ptolomie, the Prouinces of Cœloſyria, Phœnice, & Iudæa, which he had won by his victory ouer Scopas, that was Generall of the Egyptian forces in thoſe parts. Neuertheleſſe, Ptolomie adhered to the Romans: whereby he liued in the greater ſecuritie. He left behinde him two ſonnes; this Ptolomie Philometor, and Ptolomie Phyſcon, with a daughter, Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the yonger, by whom ſhee was caſt off, and her daughter taken in her ſtead. Such were the marriages of theſe Egyptian Kings.

Ptolomie Philometor, ſo called (that is, the louer of his mother) by a bitter nickename, becauſe he ſlew her, fell into hatred with his ſubiects, & was like to be chaſed out of his Kingdome, his yonger brother being ſet vp againſt him. Phyſcon hauing a ſtrong party, got poſſeſſion of Alexandria; and Philometor held himſelfe in Memphis, crauing ſuccour of King Antiochus his vncle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who vnder colour to take vpon him the protection of the yong Prince, ſought by all means poſſible to poſſeſſe himſelfe of that kingdome. He ſent Apollonius, the ſonne of Mneſtheus Embaſſadour into Egypt, and vnder colour to aſſiſt the kings Coronation, hee gaue him inſtructions to perſwade the Gouernours of the yong King Philometor, to deliuer the king his Nephew with the principall places of that kingdome into his hands; pretending an extraordinary care and deſire of his Nephewes ſafety and well doing. And the better to anſwer all argument to the contrary, he prepared a forcible armie to attend him. Thus came hee alongſt the coaſt of Syria to Ioppe, & from thence on the ſudden he turned himſelfe towards Ieruſalem, where, by Iaſon the Prieſt (a Chaplin fit for ſuch a Patron) he was with all pompe and ſolemnitie receiued into the Citie. For though lately, in the time of Seleucus, the brother and predeceſſour of Epiphanes, that impious Traitour Simon of the Tribe of Beniamin, Ruler of the Temple, when he would haue deliuered the treaſures thereof to Apollonius Gouernour of Cœloſyria and Phœnicia, was diſappointed of his wicked purpoſe by miracle from heauen; the ſaid Apollonius being ſtrucken by the Angell of God, and recouering againe at the prayer of Onias: yet ſufficed not this example to terrifie others from the like vngodly practices. Preſently vpon the death of Seleucus, this Iaſon, the brother of Onias, ſeeking to ſupplant his brother, and to obtaine the Prieſthood for himſelfe, offered vnto the King three hundred and threeſcore talents of ſiluer, with other rents and ſummes of money. So he got his deſire, though he not long enioyed it.

2 Mat. 4.

Mat. 2. cap. 3.

Mat. 2. c. 4.

This naughty dealing of Iaſon, and his being ouer-reached by another in the ſame kind, cals to minde a by-word taken vp among the Achæans, when as that miſchieuous Callicrates, who had beene too hard for all worthy and vertuous men, was beaten at his owne weapon, by one of his owne condition. It went thus:

One fire than other burnes more forcibly,
One Wolfe than other Wolues does bite more ſore;
One Hawke than other Hawkes, more ſwift does fly.
So one moſt miſchieuous of men before,
Callicrates, falſe knaue as knaue might be,
Met with Menalcidas more falſe than he.

And euen thus fell it out with Iaſon: who within three yeeres after, was betrayed, and ouerbidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred talents more obtained the Prieſthood for himſelfe: Iaſon thereupon being forced to flye from Ieruſalem, and to hide himſelfe among the Ammonites.

From Ieruſalem, Antiochus marched into Phœnicia, to augment the numbers of his men of warre, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Egypt; with which, and with a mighty army of land-forces, He went about to raigne ouer Egypt, that hee might haue the dominion of two Realmes, and entred Egypt with a mighty company; with Chariots and Elephants, with Horſemen, and with a great Nauie, and moued warre againſt Ptolemæus King of Egypt, but Ptolemæus was afraid of him, and fled, and many were wounded to death. He won many ſtrong Cities, and tooke away the ſpoyles of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled

Prophecie of Daniel: He shall enter into the quiet and plentifull Prouinces, and hee shall doe that which his Fathers haue not done, nor his Fathers Fathers. Neuer indeed had any of the Kings of Syria so great a victory ouer the Egyptians, nor tooke from them so great riches. For he gaue a notable ouerthrow to the Captaines of Ptolomie, betweene Pelusium and the hill Cassius, after which he entred, and sackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that Antiochus had smitten Egypt, hee turned againe, and went vp towards Israel and Ierusalem with a mightie people, and entred proudly into the Sanctuary, and tooke away the golden Altar, and the Candlestick for the light, and all the instruments thereof, and the table of the Shew-bread, and the Powring Vessels, and the Bolles, and the golden Basons, and the Vaile, and the Crownes, and the golden Apparell. He tooke also the Siluer, and the Gold, and the precious Iewels, and the secret Treasures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his owne Land, after he had murdered many men. Dan.11.v.24. Hier. in Dan. Mac.1.3.1.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian warre, that Antiochus tooke in hand this Egyptian businesse. At what time he first laid claime to Cæloſyria, iustifying his title by * the same allegations which his father had made; and stiffely auerring, that this Prouince had not beene consigned ouer to the Egyptian, or giuen in dowrie with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approue his right vnto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a faire way to get all Egypt. The Achæans, Rhodians, Athenians, and other of the Greeks, pressed him, by seuerall Embassages, to some good conclusion. But his answer was, that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receiue their king his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolomies, then should the warre be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when he saw, that it was an hard piece of worke to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two brothers consume themselues with intestine war, than by the terror of his armes, threatning destruction vnto both of them, to put into them any desire of comming to agreement. He therfore withdrew his forces for the present; leauing the Ptolomies in very weake estate, the yonger almost ruinated by his inuasion; the elder hated and forsaken by his people. Lib.6. * cap.5.§.2. Polyb.Leg.81. 82.&c.

But how weake soeuer these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to be so strong, that Antiochus might leaue them to the prosecution thereof; and follow, at good leisure, his other businesse at Ierusalem or elsewhere. So after the sacke of Ierusalem, he rested him a while at Antioch, and then made a iourney into Cilicia, to suppresse the Rebellion of the Thracians and other in those parts, who had bin giuen as it were, by way of dowry, to a Concubine of the kings, called Antiochis. For Gouernour of Syria in his absence, he left one Andronicus, a man of great authority about him. In the meane while Menelaus the brother of Simon, the same who had thrust Iason out of the Priesthood, and promised the King three hundred talents for an In-come, committing the charge of the Priesthood to his brother Lysimachus, stole certaine vessels of gold out of the Temple: whereof he presented a part to Andronicus the Kings Lieutenant, and sold the rest at Tyre, and other Cities adioyning. This hee did, as it seemeth, to aduance the payment of the three hundred talents promised; the same being now by Sostratus eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Priest (formerly dispossessed by Iason) had certaine knowledge, being moued with zeale, and detesting the sacriledge of Menelaus, he reproued him for it, and fearing his reuenge, he withdrew himselfe into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adioyning as a suburb to Antioch. In compasse it had about ten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Groue, sweete Springs, banquetting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abused to lust & other such voluptuousnesse. Whether it were well done of Onias, to commit himselfe to the protection of Apollo & Diana, or to claime priuiledge, from the holinesse of a ground consecrated to any of the Heathen gods, I will not stand to discourse. Onely I say for mine owne opinion; that the inconuenience is farre lesse, to hold this booke as Apocryphall, than to iudge this fearfull shift which Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable, or allowable, as the booke seemes to doe. As for this refuge, it could not saue the life of the poore olde man: for Menelaus taking Andronicus apart, prayed him to slay Onias. So when hee came to Onias, hee counselled him craftily, giuing him his right hand with an oath, and perswaded him to come out of the Sanctuarie; so hee slew him incontinently without any regard of righteousnesse. Hereof Mac.1.c.2.4.

when complaint was made to Antiochus after his retraine out of Cilicia, He rebuked Andronichus his garments off purple, and rent his clothes, and commanded him to be led through out the Citie, and in the same place where he had committed the wicked deede against Onias, he was slaine in a murderer. In taking reuenge of this innocent mans death, I should haue thought that this wicked king had once in his life-time done iustice. But presently after this, at the suit of one Ptolomie, a Traytor to Ptolomie Philometer, hee condemned innocent men to death, who iustly complained against Menelaus, and his brother Lysimachus, for a second robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the vessels of gold remaining. Hereby it is manifest, that he was guided by his owne outragious will and not by any regard of iustice: since he reuenged the death of Onias, yet slew those that were in the same cause with Onias; Who, had they told their cause, yea, before the Scythians, they should haue beene heard as innocents. By reason of such his vnstaiednesse, this king was commonly tearmed Epimanes, that is, Mad, in stead of Epiphanes, which signifieth Noble or Illustrious.

Verse 47.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a second voyage into Egypt, and then were there seene throughout all the Citie of Ierusalem, fortie dayes long, horsemen running in the ayre with robes of gold, and as bands of Speare-men, and attropes of horsemen set in aray, encountring and coursing one against another. Of these prodigious signes, or rather fore-warnings of God, all Histories haue deliuered vs, some more, some lesse. Before the destruction of Ierusalem by Vespatian, a star in the forme of a sword appeared in the Heauens directly ouer the City, after which there followed a slaughter like vnto this of Epiphanes, though farre greater. In the Cymbrian warres, Plinie tels vs, that Armies were seene fighting in the ayre from the morning till the euening.

Plin.l.2.c.57.

In the time of Pope Iohn the eleuenth, a fountaine powred out bloud in stead of water, in or neare the Citie of Genoa; soone after which the Citie was taken by the Saracens, with great slaughter. Of these and the like prodigious signes, Vipera hath collected many, and very remarkeable. But this one seemeth to mee most memorable, because the most notorious. All men know, that in the Emperour Nero, the Off-spring of the Cæsars, as well naturall as adopted, tooke end; whereof this notable signe gaue warning.

Mercur. Vipera de Prodig. li. 8. Vipera de Prisco & sacro instituto.

When Livia was first married to Augustus, an Eagle let fall into her armes a white Hen, holding a Lawrell branch in her mouth. Livia caused this Hen to be carefully nourished, and the Lawrell branch to be planted: Of the Hen came a faire encrease of white Poultrie; and from the little Branch there sprang vp in time a Groue of Lawrell: so that afterwards, in all Triumphs, the Conquerors did vse to carry in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Groue, & after the Triumphs ended, to set it againe in the same ground: which branches were obserued, when they happened to wither, to foreshew the death of those persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last yeere of Nero, all the broods of the white Hens died, and the whole Groue of Bayes withered at once. Moreouer, the heads of all the Cæsars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken downe with lightning. That the Iewes did not thinke such strange signes to be vnworthy of regard, it appeares by their calling vpon God, and praying, that these tokens might turne to good.

Sueton. Galba.

Now as the first voyage of Antiochus into Egypt was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein reigning: so was his second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolomie being left in Memphis, not strong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power of their Vncle, thought it the best way to seeke entrance into that royall Citie, rather by perswasion than by armes. Physcon had not yet forgotten the terrour of the former siege: the Alexandrines though they loued not Philometor, yet loued they worse to liue in scarcitie of victuals (which was already great among them, and like to grow extreame) since nothing was brought in from the Countrey; and the friends of the yonger brother saw no likelihood of good issue to bee hoped for without reconciliation. These good helpes, and aboue all these, the louing disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philometor in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the feare wherein he stood of his Vncle. For though Antiochus was gone out of Egypt with his armie; yet had he left behinde him a strong garrison in Pelusium, retaining that Citie, which was the Key of Egypt, to his owne vſe. This conſideration wrought alſo with Phyſcon, and with thoſe that were about him; ſo as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their ſiſter, the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the newes of this accord was brought to Antiochus, he was greatly enraged: for notwithſtanding that he had pretended no other thing than the eſtabliſhment of the King Philometor his nephew, and a meaning to ſubiect his younger brother vnto him, which hee gaue in anſwer to all Embaſſadours; yet he now prepared to make a ſharpe warre vpon them both. And to this end he preſently furniſhed and ſent out his Nauie towards Cyprus, and drew his land Armie into Cœloſyria, ready to enter Egypt the Spring following. When he was on his way as farre as Rhinocorura, he met with Embaſſadours ſent from Ptolomie. Their errand was partly to yeeld thankes to Antiochus for the eſtabliſhing of Philometor in his Kingdome; partly to beſeech him, That hee would rather be pleaſed to ſignifie what he required to haue done in Egypt, which ſhould be performed, than to enter it as an enemy with ſo puiſſant an Armie. But Antiochus returned this ſhort anſwer, That hee would neither call backe his Fleete, nor withdraw his Armie, vpon any other condition, than that Ptolomie ſhould ſurrender into his hands, together with the Citie of Peluſium, the whole Territorie thereto belonging: and that he ſhould alſo abandon and leaue vnto him the Ile of Cyprus, with all the right that hee had vnto either of them, for euer. For anſwer vnto theſe demands, hee ſet downe a day certaine, and a ſhort one. Which being come and paſt, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleete entred Nilus, and recouered as well thoſe places which appertained to Ptolomie in Arabia, as in Egypt it ſelfe; for Memphis, and all about it, receiued Antiochus, being vnable to reſiſt him. The King hauing now no ſtoppe in his way to Alexandria; paſſed on thitherwards by eaſie iourneyes.

Of all theſe troubles paſt, as well as of the preſent danger wherein Egypt ſtood, the Romans had notice long agoe. But they found, or were contented to finde, little reaſon for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a ciuill warre: and wherein Antiochus ſeemed to take part with the iuſter cauſe. Yet they gaue ſignification, that it would bee much diſpleaſing vnto them, to haue the Kingdome of Egypt taken from the rightfull owners. More they could not, or would not doe; being troubled with Perſeus; and therefore loath to prouoke Antiochus too farre. Neuertheleſſe, the Egyptian kings being reconciled, and ſtanding ioyntly in need of helpe againſt their Vncle, who prepared and made open warre againſt them both: it was to be expected, that not onely the Romans, but many of the Greeks, as being thereto obliged by notable benefits, ſhould arme in defence of their Kingdome. Rome had beene ſuſtained with food from Egypt, in the warre of Hannibal; when Italy lying waſte, had neither corne, nor money wherewith to buy ſufficient ſtore. By helpe of the Egyptian, had Aratus laide the foundation of that greatneſſe, whereto the Achæans attained. And by the like helpe, had Rhodes beene defended againſt Demetrius Poliorcetes. Neither were theſe friendly turnes, which that bountifull houſe of the Ptolomies had done for ſundry people abroad, ill followed, or ſeconded, by other as bad in requitall: but with continuance of ſutable beneficence, from time to time encreaſed. Wherefore the two brothers ſent abroad confidently for ayde; eſpecially to the Rhodians and Achæans, who ſeemed moſt able to giue it effectually. To the Romans, Phyſcon and Cleopatra had ſent, a yeere ſince: but their Embaſſadours lay ſtill in Rome. Of the Achæans they deſired in particular, that Lycortas the braue warriour might bee ſent vnto them, as Generall of all the Auxiliaries, and his ſonne Polybius, Generall of the Horſe. Hereunto the Achæans readily condeſcended: and would immediately haue made performance, if Callicrates had not interpoſed his miſchieuous art. Hee, whether ſeeking occaſion to vaunt his obſequiouſneſſe to the Romans; or much rather enuying thoſe Noble Captaines, whoſe ſeruice the Kings deſired; withſtood the common voyce; which was, That their Nation ſhould, not with ſuch ſmall numbers as were requeſted, but with all their power, bee ayding vnto the Ptolemies. For it was not now (hee ſaid) conuenient time to entangle themſelues in any ſuch buſineſſe, as might make them the leſſe able to yeeld vnto the Romans, what helpe ſoeuer ſhould be required in the Macedonian warre. And in this ſentence, hee with thoſe of his faction, obſtinately perſiſted; terrifying others with bigge words, as it were in behalfe of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that Martius

the late Conſull had ſignified vnto him, that the Romans were paſt all neede of helpe: adding further, that a thouſand foota, and two hundred horſe, might well be ſpared, to the ayde of their Benefactours, the Egyptian Kings, without diſabling their Nation to performe any ſeruice to the Romans; for as much as the Achæans could without trouble, raiſe thirtie or fortie thouſand ſouldiours. All this notwithſtanding, the reſolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken, by the violence of Callicrates. For when it was thought that the Decree ſhould haue paſſed, he brought into the Theatre where the aſſembly was held, a Meſſenger with letters from Martius, whereby the Achæans were deſired to conforme themſelues to the Romain Senate, and to labour as the Senate had done, by ſending Embaſſadours to ſet Egypt in peace. This was an aduice againſt all reaſon. For the Senate had indeede ſent Embaſſadours to make peace, but as in a time of greater buſineſſe elſewhere, with ſuch milde words, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely, that the Achæans ſhould doe any good in the ſame kinde. Yet Polybius and his friends, durſt not gaine-ſay the Romain Counſell, which had force of an iniunction. So the kings were left in much diſtreſſe, diſappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perſeus ouercome: and then might the Embaſſadour ſent from the Romain Senate, performe as much as any Armie could haue done.

Audience had beene lately giuen by the Senate, vnto thoſe Embaſſadours of Phyſcon and Cleopatra, which hauing ſtayed more than a whole yeere in the City, brought nothing of their buſineſſe to effect vntill now. The Embaſſadors deliuered their meſſage in the name of thoſe that had ſent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometor, no leſſe than his Brother and Siſter.

In this ambaſſage of Ptolemie, now requeſting helpe from Rome, appeared a notable change of his fortune, from ſuch as it had beene before three or foure yeeres laſt paſt. For in the beginning of theſe his troubles, which beganne with the Macedonian Warre; either he, or Eulæus, or Lenæus (vpon whom the blame was afterwards layed) which had the gouernment of him, thought his affaires in ſuch good eſtate, that not onely hee determined to ſet vpon Antiochus, for Cœleſyria: but would haue interpoſed himſelfe betweene the Romans and Perſeus, as a competent Arbitratour; though it fell out well, that his Embaſſadour was by a friend perſwaded to forget that point of his errand. From theſe high thoughts he fell on the ſudden, by the rebellion of his brother and ſubjects, to liue vnder protection of the ſame Antiochus. And now at ſuch time as by atonement with his brother and ſubiects, he might haue ſeemed to ſtand in no neede of ſuch protection, he hath remaining none other helpe whereby to ſaue both his Kingdome and life, than what can be obtained by their interceſſion which were imployed againſt him. This miſerable condition of him, his brother and ſiſter, ſhewed it ſelfe, euen in the habit of thoſe Embaſſadours. They were poorely clad: the haire of their heads and beardes ouergrowne, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands, branches of Oliue. Thus they entred into the Senate, and there fell, groueling and proſtrate vpon the floore. Their garments were not ſo meane and mournefull, nor their lookes and Countenances ſo ſadde and deiected, but that their ſpeech was than either of the other farre more lamentable. For hauing told in what danger their King and Countrey ſtood; they made a pittifull and grieuous complaint vnto the Senate, beſeeching them to haue compaſſion of their Eſtate, and of their Princes, who had alwaies remained friendly and faithfull to the Romanes. They ſaid that the people of Rome had ſo much heeretofore fauoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of ſuch account and authoritie, with all other Kings and Nations; as if they pleaſed but to ſend their Embaſſadours, and let Antiochus know, that the Senate was offended with his vndertaking vpon the King their Confederate, then would he preſently raiſe his ſiege from before Alexandria, and with-draw his Armie out of Egypt, into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or vſed any delay; then ſhould Ptolemie and Cleopatra, be ſhortly driuen out of their Realmes, and make repaire to Rome, with ſhamefull diſhonour to the Senate, and people thereof, in that, in the extreme dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchſafed to relieue them.

Polyb. Leg. 72.

The Lords of the Senate moued with compaſſion, ſent incontinently C. Popilius Lenas, C. Decimius, and A. Hoſtilius, as Embaſſadors to determine and end the warre betweene thoſe Kings. In commiſſion they had firſt to finde King Ptolemie, and then Antiochus, and to let them both vnderstand, that vnlesse they surceased, and gaue ouer Armes, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate, and people of Rome, whom they found obstinate, or vsing delay. So these Romans, together with the Alexandrine Embassadours, tooke their leaue, and went on ward their way within three dayes after.

Whilest Popilius and his fellowes were on their way toward Egypt, Antiochus had transported his Armie ouer Lusine, some fortie myles from Alexandria. Sooneere was he to the end of his iourney, when the Roman Embassadours met him. After greeting and salutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius: but Popilius filled it with a Roll of paper, willing him to reade those Mandates of the Senate, before he did any thing else. Antiochus did so, and hauing a little while considered of the businesse, he told Popilius, That hee would aduise with his friends, and then giue the Embassadours their answer. But Popilius, according to his ordinary blunt manner of speech, which he had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rodde which he held in his hand, willing him to make him such an answer as hee might report to the Senate, before hee moued out of that Circle. The King astonished at this so rude and violent a Commandement, after hee had stayed and pawsed a while, I will be content (quoth hee) to doe whatsoeuer the Senate shall ordaine. Then Popilius gaue vnto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Egypt, without any good issue of his costly Expedition; euen in such manner as * Daniel had propheſied long before: yea, fulfilling euery particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mischiefe to Ierusalem after his returne; like as if these things had rather beene historified than fore-told by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadors, they stayed awhile, and setled the kingdome of Egypt, leauing it vnto the elder brother, and appointed the younger to reigne ouer Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus, which they felt, as it had beene, in the power of the Egyptian, hauing first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had already giuen an ouerthrow to the Egyptian ships.

§. XII.

How the Romans were dreadfull to all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Prusias, Masanissa, and Cotys. The end of Perseus and his children. The instabilitie of Kings Estates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anicius, and Octauius, With the Conclusion of the worke.

BY this peremptorie demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the ready obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; wee may perceiue how terrible the Romans were growne, through their conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had beene well contented, a yeere before this, to lay aside the roughnesse of his naturall condition, and to giue good language to the Achæans and Aetolians, when hee went Embassadour to those people of Greece, that were of farre lesse power than the King of Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadours which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much lesse vsed any menacing reatnes, though he performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus. Eumenes sent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victory ouer Perseus, and to craue helpe or countenance of the Senate against the Gallo-Grekes, which molested him. Very welcome was Attalus, and louingly entertained by most of the Senatours: who bade him be confident, and request of the Senate his brothers Kingdome for himselfe; for it should surely be giuen him. These hopefull promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that hee either approued, or seemed to approue the motion. But his honest nature was soone reclaymed by the faithfull counsaile of Stratius a Physician; whom Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keepe his brother vpright. So, when hee came into the Senate, hee deliuered the errand about which hee had beene sent; recounting his owne seruices done to the Romans in the late Warre, * where withall hee forgat not to make of his brother as good mention as hee could: and finally requested, That the Townes of Aenus and Maronea might be bestowed vpon himselfe. *By his omitting to sue for his brothers Kingdome, the Senate conceiued opinion, that he meant to craue another day of audience for that businesse alone. Wherefore to make him vnderstand how gracious hee was, they not onely granted all his desire; but in the presents which they gaue vnto him (as was their custome to Embassadours that came with an acceptable message) they vsed singular magnificence. Neuertheless, Attalus tooke no notice of their meaning; but went his way, contented with what they had already granted. This did so highly displease the Senate, that whilest he was yet in Italie, they gaue order for the liberty of Ænus and Maronea: thereby making vneffectuall their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, reuoke. And as for the Gallo-grecians, which were about to inuade the kingdome of Pergamus; they sent Embassadours to them, with such instructions, as rather encouraged than hindered them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate being so manifest; Eumenes thought it worthy of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. He might wel blame the folly of his second voyage thither, for this necessity of the third: since, by his malice to Perseus, hee had layed open vnto these ambitious Potentates the way to his owne doores. No sooner was he come into Italie, than the Senate was ready to send him going. It was not thought expedient to vse him as an enemy, that came to visit them in loue: neither could they, in so doing, haue auoided the note of singular inconstancy: and to entertaine him as a friend, was more than their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no king should be suffered to come to Rome; and by vertue thereof sent him home, without expence of much further complement.

Polyb. Legat. 93.

Prusias king of Bithynia had beene at Rome somewhat before; where hee was welcommed after a better fashion. Hee had learned to behaue himselfe as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or desire. For entring into the Senate, hee lay downe, and kissed the threshold, called the Fathers his gods and sauiours: as also hee vsed to weare a Cap, after the manner of slaues newly manumised, professing himselfe an enfranchised bondman of the People of Rome. Hee was indeede naturally a slaue, and one that by such abiect flattery kept himselfe safe; though doing otherwise greater mischiefe than any wherewith Perseus had beene charged. His errand was, besides matter of complement, to commend vnto the Senate the care of his sonne Nicomedes, whom hee brought with him to Rome, there to receiue education. Further petition hee made, to haue some Townes added to his Kingdome: whereto, because the grant would haue beene vniust, hee receiued a cold answer. But concerning the Wardshippe of his sonne, it was vndertaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Egypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectuall protection the Romans gaue vnto the children of Kings, that were to their patronage commended.

But aboue all other Kings, Masanissa held his credit with the Romans good. His quarrels were endlesse with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more assured. In all controuersies they gaue iudgement on his side: and whereas he had inuaded the Countrey of Emporia, holding the Lands, but vnable to winne the Townes; the Romans (though at first they could finde no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let goe all their hold, and to pay fiue hundred Talents to the Numidian, for hauing hindered him of his due so long. Now indeede had Rome good leysure to deuise vpon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the race of Masanissa himselfe was shortly by them rooted vp. But hereof the olde King neuer dreamed. He sent to Rome one of his sonnes, to congratulate the victorie ouer Perseus; and offered to come thither himselfe, there to sacrifice for ioy vnto Iupiter in the Capitol. His good will was louingly accepted; his sonne rewarded; and hee entreated to stay at home.

Cotys the Thracian sent Embassadours, to excuse himselfe touching the aide by him giuen to Perseus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by hostages; and to entreat, That his sonne, which was taken with the children of Perseus, might be set at libertie, for conuenient ransome. His excuse was not taken; since hee had voluntarily obliged himselfe to Perseus, by giuing hostages, without necessitie: Yet was his sonne giuen backe to him ransome-free; with admonition, to carry himselfe better toward the Romanes in time following. His Kingdome lay betweene Macedon and some barbarous Nations; in which respect, it was good to hold him in faire tearmes.

As for those vnhappy kings, Perseus and Gentius, they were led through Rome, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Æmylius and Anitius. Perseus had often made suite to Æmylius, that he might not be put to such disgrace: but hee still receiued one scornefull answer, That it lay in his owne power to preuent it; whereby was meant, that he might kill himselfe. And surely, had hee not hoped for greater mercie than he found, he would rather haue sought his death in Macedon, than haue bin beholding to the courtesie of his insolent enemies for a wretched life. The issue of the Roman clemencie, whereof Æmylius had giuen him hope, was no better than this: After that hee, and his fellow king, had beene led in chaines through the streets, before the Chariots of their triumphing Victors, they were committed to prison, wherein they remained without hope of release. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot vp towards the Capitol, there to doe sacrifice, he should command the captiues to be had away to prison, and there put to death: so as the honor of the Vanquisher, and miserie of those that were ouercome, might be both together at the vtmost. This last sentence of death was remitted vnto Perseus: yet so, that he had little ioy of his life; but eyther famished himselfe, or (for it is diuersly reported) was kept watching perforce by those that had him in custodie; and so died for want of sleepe. Of his sons, two died; it is vncertaine how. The yongest called Alexander (only in name like vnto the Great, though destined sometimes perhaps by his father, vnto the fortunes of the Great) became a Ioyner, or Turner, or, at his best preferment, a Scribe vnder the Romane Officers. In such pouertie ended the Royall House of Macedon: and it ended on the suddaine; though some eight-score yeeres after the death of that Monarch, vnto whose ambition this whole Earth seemed too narrow.

If Perseus had known it before, that his owne sonne should one day be compelled to earne his liuing by handie-worke, in a painefull Occupation; it is like, that he would not as in a wantonnesse of Soueraignetie, haue commanded those poore men to be slaine, which had recouered his treasures out of the sea, by their skill in the feat of diuing. Hee would rather haue beene very gentle, and would haue considered, that the greatest oppressors, and the most vndertroden wretches, are all subiect vnto the One high Power, gouerning all alike with absolute command. But such is our vnhappinesse; In stead of that blessed counsaile, Doe as ye would be done vnto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicitie; we entertaine that arrogant thought, I will bee like to the most High: that is, I will doe what shall please my selfe. One hath said truly:

—vv— Et qui nolunt occidere quenquam
Posse volunt—— Iuuenal. Sat. 10.

Euen they that haue no murdrous will,
would haue it in their power to kill.

All, or the most, haue a vaine desire of abilitie to do euill without controule: which is a dangerous temptation vnto the performance. God, who best can iudge what is expedient, hath granted such power to very few; among whom also, very few there are, that vse it not to their owne hurt. For who sees not, that a Prince, by racking his Soueraigne authoritie to the vtmost extent, enableth (besides the danger to his owne person) some one of his owne sonnes or nephewes to root vp all his progenie? Shall not many excellent Princes, notwithstanding their brotherhood, or other neerenesse in bloud, be driuen to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot that gouernes one, the most vnworthy of his whole house, yet reigning ouer all? The vntimely death of many Princes which could not humble themselues to such flattery; and the common practice of the Turkish Emperours to murder all their brethren, without expecting till they offend; are too good proofes hereof. Heereunto may be added, That the heyre of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traiterously and barbarously King Edward the second; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, heire apparant to the Crowne of England: which had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortall enemie, to exercise the same vpon the Line of that vnhappie King. Such examples of the instabilitie whereto all mortall affaires are subiect;

subiect, as they teach moderation, and admonish the transitorie Gods of Kingdomes, not to authorize, by wicked precedents, the euill that may fall on their owne posteritie: so do they necessarily make vs vnderstand, how happie that Countrie is, which hath obtained a King able to conceiue and teach, That * God is the soreest and sharpest Schoolemaister that can be deuised for such Kings as think this world ordained for them, without controlment to turne it vpside-downe at their pleasure.

* The true Law of free Monarchies.

Now concerning the Triumph of L. Æmylius Paulus; it was in all points like vnto that of T. Quintius Flaminius: though farre more glorious, in regard of the Kings owne person that was ledde along therein, as part of his owne spoyles; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest and of the Booty. So great was the quantitie of Gold and Siluer carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasurie, that from thence forth, vntill the ciuil Wars which followed vpon the death of Iulius Cæsar, the Estate had no need to burthen it selfe with any Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to haue bin hindred by the souldiers, who grudged at their General, for not having dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate ouer-ruled the People and Souldiers herein, and brought them to reason by seuere exhortations. Thus Paulus enioyed as much honour of his victorie as men could giue. Neuertheless, it pleased God to take away from him his two remaining sons, that were not giuen in adoption: of which, the one died fiue daies before the Triumph, the other three daies after it. This losse he bore wisely: and told the People, That he hoped to see the Common-wealth flourish in a continuance of prosperitie, since the ioy of his victorie was requited with his owne priuate calamitie, in stead of the publike.

About the same time, Octauius the Admirall, who had brought Perseus out of Samothrace: and Anicius the Prætor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius prisoner; made their seuerall triumphs. The glory of which magnificent spectacles, together with the confluence of Embassages from all parts; and Kings, either visiting the Imperiall Citie, or offering to visit her, and doe their duties in person; were enow to say vnto Rome, Suma superbiam, Take vpon thee the Maiestie, that thy deserts haue purchased.

BY this which we haue already set downe, is seene the beginning and end of the three first Monarchies of the world; whereof the Founders and Erectours thought, that they could neuer haue ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was also at this time almost at the highest. We haue left it flourishing in the middle of the field, hauing rooted vp, or cut downe, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the world. But after some continuance, it shall begin to lose the beauty it had; the stormes of ambition shall beat her great boughes and branches one against another; her leaues shall fall off, her limbes wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her downe.

Now these great Kings, & conquering Nations, haue bin the subiect of those ancient Histories, which haue bin preserued, and yet remaine among vs; and withall of so many tragicall Poets, as in the persons of powerfull Princes, and other mighty men haue complained against Infidelitie, Time, Destinie, and most of all against the Variable successe of worldly things, and Instabilitie of Fortune. To these vndertakings, these great Lords of the world haue beene stirred vp; rather by the desire of Fame, which ploweth vp the Aire, and soweth in the Winde; than by the affection of bearing rule, which draweth after it so much vexation and so many cares. And that this is true, the good aduice of Cineas to Pyrrhus proues. And certainely, as Fame hath often beene dangerous to the liuing, so is it to the dead of no vse at all; because separate from knowledge. Which were it otherwise, and the extreame ill bargaine of buying this lasting discourse, vnderstood by them which are dissolued; they themselues would then rather haue wished, to haue stolen out of the world without noyse, than to be put in minde, that they haue purchased the report of their actions in the world, by rapine, oppression, and cruelties: by giuing in spoyle the innocent and labouring soule to the idle and insolent, and by hauing emptied the Cities of the world of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them againe with so many and so variable sorts of sorrowes.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germanes, which had neither greatnesse nor continuance) there hath beene no State feareful in the East, but that of the Turk; nor in the Weſt any Prince that hath ſpred his wings farre ouer his neſt, but the Spaniard; who ſince the time that Ferdinand expelled the Moores out of Granado, haue made many attempts to make themſelues Maſters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treaſures of both Indies, & by the many kingdoms which they poſſeſſe in Europe, they are at this day the moſt powerfull. But as the Turke is now counterpoyſed by the Perſian, ſo in ſtead of ſo many Millions as haue beene ſpent by the Engliſh, French, and Netherlands in a defenſiue Warre, and in diuerſions againſt them, it is eaſie to demonſtrate, that with the charge of two hundred thouſand pound continued but for two yeeres, or three at the moſt, they may not only be perſwaded to liue in peace, but all their ſwelling and ouer-flowing ſtreames may be brought backe into their naturall channels & old bankes. Theſe two Nations, I ſay, are at this day the moſt eminent, & to be regarded; the one ſeeking to roote out the Chriſtian Religion altogether, the other the truth and ſincere profeſſion thereof; the one to ioyne all Europe to Aſia, the other the reſt of all Europe to Spaine.

For the reſt, if we ſeeke a reaſon of the ſucceſſion and continuance of this boundleſſe ambition in mortall men, we may adde to that which hath beene already ſaid; That the Kings and Princes of the world haue alwaies laid before them, the actions, but not the ends of thoſe great Ones which præceded them. They are alwayes tranſported with the glorie of the one, but they neuer minde the miſerie of the other, till they finde the experience in themſelues. They neglect the aduice of God, while they enioy life, or hope it; but they follow the counſell of Death, vpon his firſt approach. It is he that puts into man all the wiſedome of the world, without ſpeaking a word; which God with all the words of his Law, promiſes, or threats, doth infuſe. Death, which hateth and deſtroyeth man, is beleeued; God, which hath made him, and loues him, is alwaies deferred. I haue conſidered (ſaith Salomon) all the workes that are vnder the Sunne, and behold, all is vanitie, and vexation of ſpirit: but who beleeues it, till Death tells it vs? It was Death, which opening the conſcience of Charles the fift, made him enioyne his ſonne Philip to reſtore Nauarre; and King Francis the firſt of France, to command that iuſtice ſhould be done vpon the Murderers of the Proteſtants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therefore Death alone that can ſuddenly make man to know himſelfe. He tells the proud and inſolent, that they are but Abiects, and humbles them at the inſtant; makes them crie, complaine, and repent, yea, euen to hate their forepaſſed happineſſe. He takes the account of the rich, and proues him a begger; a naked begger, which hath intereſt in nothing, but in the grauell that fills his mouth. He holds a Glaſſe before the eyes of the moſt beautifull, and makes them ſee therein, their deformitie and rottenneſſe; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, iuſt, and mighty Death! whom none could aduiſe, thou haſt perſwaded; what none hath dared, thou haſt done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only haſt caſt out of the world and deſpiſed: thou haſt drawne together all the farre ſtretched greatneſſe, all the pride, crueltie, and ambition of man, and couered it all ouer with theſe two narrow words, Hic iacet.

Laſtly, whereas this Booke, by the title it hath, calls it ſelfe, The firſt part of the Generall Hiſtorie of the World, implying a Second and Third Volume; which I alſo intended, and haue hewne out; beſides many other diſcouragements, perſwading my ſilence; it hath pleaſed God to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed; whoſe vnſpeakeable and neuer enough lamented loſſe, hath taught me to ſay with Iob, Verſa eſt in Luctum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem flentium.

FINIS.

To the Reader.

THE vse of Chronological Tables is needfull to all Historie, that reacheth to any length of time; and most of all, to those that are most generall: since they cannot, like Annales, orderly set downe all Occurrents not coherent. This heere following, may serue as an Index to the present Part of this Worke; pointing vnto the seuerall matters, that happened vnto all the time, are farre disioyned in the Relation. Certainely it is not perfect: neither doe I thinke, that any can be. For how vnder the yeeres of the first Patriarch may seeme to haue beene well neere completed, yet in the yeeres of the Kings of Iuda and Israel, were found many fractions, and the last yeere, or yeeres, of one King reckoned also for the first of his Sonne. The same is most likely to haue fallen out in many other places, not specially to be noted. Hereto may be added the diuersity of the Summer Epochaes, which were in vse among the Iewes: * Set lib. 2. chap. 3. & 6.

into the World, and so breeding extreame confusion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a small cause of trouble, to find out so many, and so vtterly disagreeing computations, as haue already gotten authority, what may probably be held for truth. Willing, but a great deale more, (if it be allowed, for excuse of such error, as a more intentiue and perfect Calculator) shall happe to finde heerein. It may serue to free the Booke, and likewise the Reader (if but of meane iudgement) from any notorious Anachronicisme; which ought to suffice. The Booke indeed will need it, euen in that regard; not onely for some errours of the presse, in the numbring of yeeres, but for some hastie mis-reckonings of mine owne; which I desire to haue hereby reformed, in hope that the printing of this Table shall not want carefull diligence. The Reader, if hee be not offended with the rest, shall finde reason to be pleased with this, as tending wholly to his owne ease.

The Titles ouer the Columnes, haue reference to that which followes vnder them; as will readily be conceiued. Woere two Titles or more, are ouer the head, as | Rome / Nabonassar | there doe the numbers vnderneath answer proportionably, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example: The walls of Ierusalem were finished in the 319. yeere from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from Nabonassar. In like manner it is to be vnderstood, That Iehosaphat beganne his reigne in the 3774. of the Iulian Æra, in the 3092. of the World, and in the 99. yeere of the Temple. This needs not more illustration; nor indeed so much, to those that are acquainted with workes of this kinde. To auoid prolixitie, I haue forborne to insert those yeeres, which I finde not signed with some regardable accident: as with the birth or death of some Patriarch; the beginning of some Kings Reigne; some change of Gouernement; some Battaile fought; or the like. So, of the 13. yeeres wherein Syluius Capetus reigned ouer the Latines, I note onely the first; that is, omitting all betweene the 4. of Iehosaphat, wherein Capetus began, vnto the 17. wherein Syluius Auentinus succeeded, and wherein Iehoram first reigned with Iehosaphat his father. For I thought it vaine to haue filled vp a page with 12. lines of idle cyphers; numbring forth 2.3.4.5. and so still onwards, till I had come to the first of Auentinus, and the 17. of Iehosaphat. In setting downe the Kings, there is noted ouer the head of euery one what place hee held in order of succession: as whether he were the first, second, fift, seuenth, or so forth, in ranke, of those that reigned in his Country, without notable interruption: Before the name is the first yeere of his reigne; at the end, or foot of the name (as the space giues leaue) is the whole number of yeeres in which he reigned, in the spaces following vnderneath: those yeeres of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of some other King, or with the yeere of any remarkeable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name, there it is to be vnderstood, that the same yeere belonged, not onely to the King then beginning, but vnto some one, or more, of his foregoers: as the first yeere of Iehoram King of Israel was the same with the second of his brother Ahaziah, and the 22. of his father Ahab. So, where two or three names are found in one space; as in the 3077. yeere of the World, Zimri, Tibni, and Omri: it is meant that euery one of them reigned in some part of the same yeere, which is reckoned the second of Ela, and the first of Omri. Particularly, vnder the yeeres of the Egyptian kings are set downe the yeeres of those Dynasties, which it was thought meet to insert; as likewise, otherwhiles, the day, the moneth vpon which Nabonassars yeere began: which, how it varied from other yeeres, may be found in the place last aboue cited.

Concerning the Æra, or accompt of yeeres, from Iphitus, who began the Olympiads, from Rome built, from Nabonassar, and the like; as much as was thought conuenient hath been said, where due place was, in the Booke it selfe: so as it remaineth only to note, that vnder the title of Olympiads is set downe first the number of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the yeere of that Olympiad: as that Cyrus began his reigne in Persia, in the 55. Olympiad, and the first yeere thereof.

Now, for that the yeeres of the World, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of Nabonassar, and other, had not beginning in one moneth, but some of them in March, some in Aprill, some about Midsummer, and some at other times: the better to expresse their seuerall beginnings, some painefull Chronologers haue diuided them proportionably in their seuerall Columnes; opposing part of the one yeere to part of the other: not (as I haue here done) cutting all ouerthwart with one streight line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour haue I spared, as more troublesome than vsefull; since the more part would not haue apprehended the meaning, and since since the learned might well be without it. It will onely be needfull to obserue, that howsoeuer the Æra of the Olympiads be 24. yeeres elder than that of Rome, and 29. than that of Nabonassar, yet the reigne of some king may haue begun at such a time of the yeere as did not some with this difference. But hereof I take little regard. The more curious will easily finde my meaning: the vulgar will not finde the difficultie. One familiar example may explaine all. Queene Elizabeth began her reigne the 17. of November, in the yeere of our Lord, 1558. She was crowned, held a Parliament, brake it vp, threw downe Images, and reformed many things in Religion; all in her first yeere: yet not all in that yeere 1558. but the greater part in the yeere following; whether we begin with the first of Ianuarie, or with the 25. of March. The like may be otherwhiles found in this Table; but so, as the difference is neuer of a whole yeere.

The Iulian Period, which I haue placed, as the greater number, ouer the yeres of the World, was deliuered by that honorable and excellently learned Ioseph Scaliger: being accommodated to the Iulian yeeres, now in vse among vs. It consisteth of 7980. yeeres, which result from the multiplication of 19. 28. and 15. that is, of the Cycle of the Moone, the Cycle of the Sun, and the yeeres of an Indiction. Being diuided by any of these, it leaueth the number of the present yeere; or if no fraction remaine, it shewes the last yeere of that Cycle to bee current. For example: in the 4498. of this period, when was fought the great battaile of Cannæ, the Prime or Golden number was 14. the Cycle of the Sun 18. and consequently the Dominicall letter F. as may be found by diuiding the same number of the Iulian Period 4498. by 19. for the Prime, by 28. for the Cycle of the Sunne. This Iulian Period, after the present account, alwaies exceedes the yeeres of the World by 682. Besides the former vses, and other themes redounding, it is a better Character of a yeere, than any other Æra (as, From the beginning of the World, From the Flood, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more vncertain position.

More I shall not need to write, as touching the vse or explication of these Tables. Neither was thus much requisite to such as are conuersant in workes of this kinde: it sufficeth if hereby all be made plaine enough to the vulgar.

Of the Creation and Preseruation of the WORLD.

§. I.

THat the inuisible God is seene in his Creatures.

§. II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose Authority is not to be despised, haue acknowledged the World to haue beene created by God

§. III.

Of the meaning of In principio, *Gen.*1.1.

§. IIII.

Of the meaning of the words [Heauen and Earth,] *Gen.*1.1.

§. V.

That the substance of the Waters, as mixt in the body of the Earth, is by Moses vnderstood in the Word [Earth:] and that the Earth, by the Attributes of Vnformed and Void, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

§ VI.

How it is to be vnderstood, that the Spirit of God moued vpon the Waters: and that this is not to be searched curiously.

§. VII.

Of the Light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne; and of the nature of it, and difficultie of knowledge of it: and of the excellencie and vse of it: and of motion, and heate annexed vnto it.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the Waters aboue the Firmament: and whether there bee any Crystaline Heauen, or any Primum Mobile.

A conclusion, repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter; The forming of it; The finishing of it.

That Nature is no Principium per se; nor Forme, the giuer of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any proportion with their effects.

§. XI.

Of Fate, and that the Stars haue great influence: and that their operation may diuersly be preuented or furthered,

§. XII.

Of Prescience.

§. XIII.

Of Prouidence.

§. XIIII.

Of Predestination.

§. XV.

Of Fortune: and of the reason of some things that seeme to be by Fortune, & against Reason and Prouidence.

CHAP. II.

Of Mans eſtate in his firſt Creation, and of Gods reſt.

§. I.

OF the Image of God, according to which Man was firſt created.

§. II.

Of the intellectuall minde of Man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by ſinne.

§. III.

Of our baſe and fraile bodies: and that the care thereof, ſhould yeelde to the immortall ſoule.

§. IIII.

Of the Spirit of life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

§. V.

That Man is (as it were) a little World: with a digreſsion touching our mortality.

§. VI.

Of the free power, which Man had in his firſt Creation to diſpoſe of himſelfe.

§. VII.

Of Gods ceaſing to create any more: and of the cauſe thereof, becauſe the vniuerſall created was exceeding good.

CHAP. III.

Of the place of Paradiſe.

§. I.

THat the ſeat of Paradiſe is greatly miſtaken, and that it is no maruell that men ſhould erre.

§. II.

A recitall of ſtrange opinions touching Paradiſe.

§. III.

That there was a true locall Paradiſe Eaſtward in the Country of Eden.

Why it ſhould be needfull to intreate diligently of the place of Paradiſe.

§. V.

That the Flood hath not vtterly defaced the markes of Paradiſe, nor cauſed Hills in the Earth.

§. VI.

That Paradiſe was not the whole Earth, as ſome haue thought, making the Ocean to bee the Fountaine of thoſe foure Riuers.

§. VII.

Of their opinion which make Paradiſe as high as the Moone: and of others which make it higher than the middle Region of the ayre.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that ſeate Paradiſe vnder the Æquinoctiall: and of the pleaſant habitation vnder thoſe Climates.

Of the change of the names of places: and that beſides that Eden in Cœleſyria, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of Eſay 37. and Ezech. 27.

§. XI.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which ſeemeth to make the foure Riuers to riſe from one ſtreame.

Of the ſtrange fertilitie and happineſſe of the Babylonian ſoyle, as it is certaine that Eden was ſuch.

§. XIII.

Of the riuer Gehon, & the Land of Cuſh: and of the ill tranſlating of Æthiopia for Cuſh, 2. Chron. 21. 16.

§. XIIII.

A concluſion, by way of repetition of ſome things ſpoken of before.

CHAP. IV.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradiſe.

§. I.

THat the Tree of Life was a material tree: and in what ſenſe it is to be taken, that Man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made ſubiect to death.

§. II.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica.

§. III.

Of Becanus his not vnwitty allegorizing of the ſtory of his Ficus Indica.

Of the name of the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill: with ſome other notes touching the ſtory of Adams ſinne.

CHAP.

CHAP. V.

Of diuerse Memorable things betweene the fall of Adam, and the Flood of Noah.

§. I.

OF the cause and reuenge of Cains sinne: and of his going out from God.

§. II.

Of Cains dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his Citie Enoch.

§. III.

Of Moses his omitting sundry things concerning Cains generation.

§. IIII.

Of the diuersities in the Age of the Patriarchs, when they begate their children.

§. V.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that Enoch writ before the Flood.

§. VII.

Of the men of Warre before the Flood.

§. VIII.

That the Gyants, by Moses so called, were indeede men of huge bodies: as also diuers in later times.

CHAP. VI.

Of Idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Relicks of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

§. I.

THat in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

§. II.

That the corruptions themselues were very ancient: as in the Family of Noah, and in the old Ægyptians.

§. III.

That in processe of time these lesser errours drew on greater, as appeareth in the grosse superstitions of the Ægyptians.

§. IIII.

That from the Reliques of ancient Records among the Ægyptians and others, the first Idols & Fables were inuented: & that the first Iupiter was Cain; Vulcan, Tubalcain &c.

§. V.

Of the three chiefest Iupiters, and also the strange story of the third.

§. VI.

Of Cham, and other wicked ones, whereof some got, some affected the name of Gods.

§. VII.

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had farre better opinions of God.

§. VIII.

That Heathenisme, and Iudaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time vnder Iulian miraculously confounded.

Of the last refuges of the Deuill, to maintain his Kingdome.

CHAP. VII.

Of Noahs Floud.

§. I.

OF Gods forewarning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of Noahs Floud.

§. II.

Of the floud in the time of Ogyges: and that this was not Noahs Floud.

§. III.

Of Deucalions floud: and that this was not Noahs Floud; nor the Vmbri in Italy a remnant of any vniuersall Floud.

§. IV.

Of some other Records testifying the vniuersall Floud: and of two ancient Deluges in Ægypt: and of some elsewhere.

§. V.

That the Floud of Noah was supernaturall, though some say it might haue beene foreseene by the starres.

§. VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of matter to make the vniuersall Floud: and what are Cataractæ Cœli, Gen. 7. 11.

§. VII.

Of some remainder of the memory of Noah among the Heathen.

§. VIII.

Of sundry particulars touching the Arke: as the place where it was made; the matter, fashion, and name.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacity.

That the Arke rested vpon part of the Hill

†. I.

A Preterition of some questions lesse materiall: with a note of the vse of this question, to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

†. II.

A proposall of the common opinion, That the Arke rested vpon some of the Hills of Armenia.

†. III.

The first Argument against the common opinion: They that came to build Babel, would haue come sooner, had they come from so neere a place as Armenia.

†. IIII.

The second Argument, That the Easterne people were more ancient in populosity, and in all humane glory.

†. V.

The third Argument; From the wonderfull resistance which Scmiramis found in the East Indies.

†. VI.

The fourth Argument; From diuers considerations in the person of Noah.

†. VII.

Of the senseleſſe Opinion of Annius, the Commenter vpon Berosus, That the Arke rested vpon Montes Caspii in Armenia; & yet vpon Gordiæi, which are three hundred miles distant also in Armenia, and yet in Scythia.

†. VIII.

The fift Argument; The Vine must grow Naturally neere the place where the Arke rested.

An answer to an obiection out of the words of the Text, The Lord scattered them from thence vpon the face of the whole Earth.

An answer to the Obiection from the name of Ararat taken for Armenia; and the height of the Hills there.

†. XI.

Of Caucasus, and diuers farre higher hils than the Armenian.

Of diuers incongruities, if in this Story wee should take Ararat for Armenia.

†. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia vnto the place noted in the Text; and that it is no marualle, that the same ledge of Hils running from Armenia to India, should keep the same name all a-long, and euen in India, bee called Ararat.

†. XIV.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountaines Caucasi, and toward the East Indies, and of other excellencies of the soyle.

†. XV.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first Planting of Nations after the Floud: and of the Sonnes of Noah; Sem, Ham, and Iaphet, by whom the Earth was re-peopled.

§. I.

WHether Shem and Ham were elder than Iaphet.

§. II.

Of diuers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the world; as that all Histories must yeeld to Moses: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and, that the knowne great Lords of the first Ages were of the issue of Ham.

§. III.

Of the Iles of the Gentiles in Iaphets portion: of Berosus his too speedy seating Gomer the sonne of Iaphet in Italie; and another of Iaphets sonnes Tubal, in Spaine: and also of the Antiquity of Longinque Nauigation.

§. IIII.

Of Gog and Magog, Tubal, and Mesech, seated first about Asia the lesse, out of Ezech. Chap. 38. 39.

§. V.

Against the fabulous Berosus his Fiction, That the Italian Ianus was Noah.

§. VI.

That Gomer also, and his Son Togorma, of the Posteritie of Iaphet, were first seated about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spred Westward into Europe; & Northward into Sarmatia.

§. VII.

Of Iauan the fourth sonne of Iaphet; and of Mesch, of Aram, & Meshech of Iaphet.

§. VIII.

Of Ascanez and Riphath, the two Elder sonnes of Gomer.

Of the foure sons of Iauan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

That the seate of Chush, the eldest son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Æthiopia: and of strange Fables, & ill translations of Scripture, grounded vpon the mistaking of this point.

†. I.

OF Iosephus his Tale of an Æthiopesse, wife to Moses; grounded on the mistaking of the seate of Chush.

†. II.

I A dispute against the Tale of Iosephus.

†. III.

Chush ill expounded for Æthiopia. Ezechiel 29.10.

Another place of Ezechiel, chap. 30. v. 9. in like manner mistaken.

†. V.

A place, Esay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted by taking Chush for Æthiopia.

†. VI.

That vpon the like mistaking, both Terhaka in the Story of Senacherib, and Zera in the Story of Asa, are vnaduisedly made Æthiopians.

A farther exposition of the place, Esay 18. 1.

Of the Plantation and Antiquities of Egypt.

†. I.

THat Mizraim the chiefe Planter of Egypt, and the rest of the sonnes of Ham, were seated in order one by another.

†. II.

Of the time, about which the name of Egypt began to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lunarie yeeres, which made their Antiquities seeme the more fabulous.

†. III.

Of certaine vaine assertions of the Antiquitie of the Egyptians.

†. IIII.

Against Pererius, That it is not vnlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within two hundred yeeres after the Creation: at least, that both it, and the most parts of the world were peopled before the Flood.

†. V.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of Pererius.

†. VI.

Of the words of Moses, Genes. 10. v. vlt. whereupon Pererius grounded his opinion.

†. VII.

A conclusion, resoluing of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of Phut, another son of Ham, which peopled Lybia.

§. XII.

Of the eleuen sonnes of Canaan, the fourth sonne of Ham.

OF the bounds of the Land of Canaan; with the names of his eleuen sonnes.

†. II.

Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

Of the Iebusites and Amorites.

†. IIII.

Of the Gergesites, Heuites, & Harkites.

†. V.

†. VI.

Of Zemari.

†. VII.

Of Hamathi.

§. XIII.

Of the sonnes of Chush, excepting Nimrod, of whom hereafter.

†. I.

THat the most of the sons of Chush, were seated in Arabia the happy: and of the Sabæans that robbed Iob: and of the Queen that came to Salomon.

Iosephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the issue of Chush, to haue been seated in the west Æthiopia, disproued out of Ezechiel and Hieremie.

§. XIIII.

Of the issue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, chap. 9. v. 7.

§. XV.

†. I.

OF Elam, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

†. II.

Of Aram, and his sonnes.

†. III.

Of the diuision of the earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sonnes of Heber, &c.

†. IIII.

Of the sons of Ioctan, the other son of Heber.

†. V.

Of Ophir, one of Ioctans sons, and of Peru: and of that voyage of Salomon.

†. VI.

Of Hauilah the soune of Ioctan, who also passed into the East Indies: and of Mesha, and Sepher, named in the bordering of the Families of Ioctan; with a conclusion of this Discourse, touching the Plantation of the world.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Gouernment.

§. I.

OF the proceeding from the first Gouernment vnder the eldest of families to Regall, and from Regall absolute to Regall tempered with Lawes.

§. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Gouernment, with their opposites: & of the degrees of humane societie.

§. III.

Of the good Gouernment of the first kings.

Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vaine vaunt thereof without vertue.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.

THat Nimrod was the first after the Floud that reigned like Soueraigne Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to haue beene of iust authority.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct persons.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Niniue: and that it is probable out of Esay 23.13. that Assur built Vr of the Chaldees.

Of the acts of Nimrod and Belus, as farre as now they are knowne.

§. V.

That wee are not to meruaile how so many kingdomes could be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt; and of Tanais of Scythia.

§. VI.

Of the Name of Belus, and other Names affine vnto it.

§. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images, begun from Belus in Babel.

§. VIII.

Of the warres of Ninus: and lastly, of his Warre against Zoroaster.

CHAP. XI.

Of Zoroaster, supposed to haue beene the chiefe Author of Magicke Arts; and of diuers kindes of Magicke.

§. I.

THat Zoroaster was not Cham, nor the first Inuenter of Astrologie, or of Magicke: and that there were diuers great Magitians of this name.

§. II.

Of the Name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre diuers from Coniuring and Witchcraft.

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the auncient Magicke is not to be condemned; though the Deuill here, as in other kindes, hath sought to obtrude euill things vnder the name and colour of good things.

That Daniels misliking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not iustifie all their practises.

§. V.

The abuse of things, which may bee found in all kindes, is not to condemne the right vse of them.

§. VI.

Of the diuers kindes of vnlawfull Magick.

§. VII.

Of diuers wayes by which the Deuill seemeth to worke his wonders.

§. VIII.

That none was euer raised from the dead, by the power of the deuill: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus: and of his wife Semiramis: and of other her acts.

OF the magnificent building of Niniue by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

The Contents of the Chapters, Paragraphs, and Sections, in the second Booke of the first Part of the Historie of the World.

Of the Time of the Birth of Abraham: and of the vse of this question, for the ordering of the story of the Assyrian Empire.

§. I.

OF some of the successors of Semiramis: with a briefe transition to the question, about the Time of the birth of Abraham.

§. II.

A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to proue Abraham was borne in the yeere 292. after the Floud, and not in the yeere 352.

§. III.

The answer to one of the Obiections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one iourney out of Mesopotamia into Canaan; and it, after his Fathers death.

§. IIII.

The answer to another of the Obiections proposed, shewing that it was not vnlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirtieth yeere.

§. V.

The answer to two more of the Obiections, shewing that wee may haue certaintie of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though wee make not Abraham the eldest sonne: and that there was great cause, why in the storie of Abraham his two Brethren should bee respected.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three Brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not proue that hee was the eldest: together with diuers reasons, prouing that Abraham was not the eldest son of Terah.

§. VII.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides: with an admonition, that they which shorten the times, make all ancient stories the more vnprobable.

§. VIII.

A computation of the times of the Assyrians and others, grounded vpon the times noted in the story of Abraham.

That Amraphel, one of the foure Kings whom Abraham ouerthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to haue beene Ninias the sonne of Ninus.

Of Arioch, another of the foure Kings: and that Ellas, whereof he is said to haue bin king, lyes betweene Cœlesyria, and Arabia Petræa.

Of Tidal, another of the foure Kings.

§. XII.

That Chedorlaomer, the chiefe of the foure Kings, was not of Assyria, but of Persia: and that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

That it is not vnprobable, that the foure Kings had no Dominion in the Countries named, but that they had elsewhere with their Colonies planted themselues, and so retayned the names of the countries whence they came: which if it bee so, wee need not to say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selues with many other difficulties.

CHAP.

CHAP. II.

Of the Kings of Ægypt from the first peopling of it after the Floud, to the time of the deliuery of the Israelites from thence.

§. I.

A Briefe of the Names and Times of the first Kings of Ægypt: with a note of the causes of difficultie in resoluing of the truth in these points.

§. II.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynastes, & otherwise, it appeares that Chams reigne in Egypt began in the yeere after the Flood 101.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not diuers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents; oft-times many vnder one King.

§. IIII.

Of Cham, and his sonne Mizraim, or Osiris.

§. V.

Of the time when Osiris reigne ended: and that Iacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus, the sonne of Osiris.

§ VI.

Of Typhon, Hercules Ægyptus, Orus and the two Sesostres, successively reigning after Mizraim: and of diuers errours about the former Sesostres.
